Then, by a deed of August 14, 1890, the contracts between the company and the Barcelona Construction Co. were put an end to and the contractors released. This deed—after reciting that the first section of the line was nearly completed—assigned to the contractors a large portion of the Government subvention, provided for the payment by the company to the contractors of some £70,000, for the transfer to the company of all the lands the contractors had acquired, and for the assignment to the company of all the rights and interests of the contractors in the funds in the hands of the commissioners. The London commissioners were not parties to this deed, nor had it their active consent.

In September, 1890, there being no contract for the execution of the works, a company called the Aragon and Catalonia Co. was formed by some of the bondholders in order to attempt to keep the works going as a temporary expedient, and an arrangement was made with the company to that effect, under which the Aragon Co. was to be paid the prime cost of the work done, with a commission of 15 per cent. Some £10,500 of the £311,000 in their hands was paid by the commissioners in respect of work done, when, on February 19, 1892, the Foreign, American, and General Investment Trust Co. and three other trust companies, underwriters and holders of bonds, issued a writ to have the trusts under which the money was held by the commissioners performed. The commissioners then did nothing further, but a Mr. Shelford was sent out to Spain to report. On August 5 the above plaintiffs delivered their statement of claim, asking for a declaration that the undertaking could no longer be carried on, and that the money in the hands of the commissioners might be returned to the said plaintiffs. In the meantime, on July 25, a writ was issued by a Mr. Collingham and some other bondholders with larger holdings than the first plaintiffs, who wished the scheme to be carried out, and who asked that the trusts of the deed might be executed by the court.

On the 10th of August the plaintiffs in the first action commenced a second, substantially identical with their first, except that the Aragon Co. were omitted as defendants. These actions, together with two summonses—one to consider a further contract for the completion of sections 1 and 2 of the line, proposed to be entered into with the Aragon Co., and the other a minor matter—were now heard together. The evidence showed that it would take at least three years to complete the works according to the original scheme; that about £34,000 would be required annually (hereunder called the service of the loan) out of the funds to meet the interest and amortization of the debentures during the time the railway was being constructed and for six months after it was finished; that there was no contract existing for the performance of the whole work; and that the concession was liable to forfeiture, a breach of one of the last provisions for the extension of time having taken place. Two estimates of the probable cost of completing sections 1 and 2 of the line were before the court—one by the engineer of the line, Mr. Dawson, amounting to £220,000; and one by Mr. Shelford, which exceeded Mr. Dawson's by £500,000. The centre section was, for the present, proposed to be left in abeyance.

Finlay, Q.C., and Eve, for the plaintiffs in Collingham v. Sloper.—Rescission of the contract with one firm of contractors does not entitle the debenture-holders to a return of their money. The conduct of the Spanish Government is not such as to lead us to apprehend that they will withdraw the concession. It must be shown that the undertaking is practically impossible of fulfilment, which cannot be done.

They referred to Wilson v. Church, 13 Ch. D. 1; National Bolivian Navigation Co. v. Wilson, 5 App. Cas. 176, 28 W. R. Dig. 94.

Sir H. Davey, Q.C., R. T. Reid, Q.C., and Macnaghten, for the plaintiffs in the other actions.—The contract on the faith of which the public were induced to subscribe is at an end, and there is no reasonable probability of obtaining another so as to complete the works in the manner originally proposed. There is therefore a resulting trust in favour of the debenture-holders. The present concession lies at the mercy of the Spanish Government. We cannot be forced to allow our money to be applied under altered conditions. This case is within Wilson v. Church.

Sir H. James, Q.C., S. Hall, Q.C., and Swinfen Eady, for the railway company.—The court has neither jurisdiction or competent knowledge to form an opinion as to what the future resources of the company may be. This case is not like Wilson v. Church, where there was a total failure of consideration.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and Kirby, for Messrs. Sloper and Robinson, two of the London commissioners.

C. T. Mitchell, for Mr. Wilde, one of the London commissioners.

Abraham, for the Aragon Co.

Sir H. Davey, Q.C., in reply.—The debenture-holders here are cestui que trustents under a deed, and the question is whether or not those trusts can be fulfilled, an issue which a court of equity is competent to decide.

NORTH, J.—This is a case of great importance from the amount at stake, and also of great novelty, because, although the case of Wilson v. Church had certain matters in it which looked like those in the present case, yet there are very material and substantial differences between the two cases; and although I am desirous of considering the matter more fully, yet, as time was of vital importance, I think I am justified in giving judgment at once. [His lordship then, in fully stating the facts above set out, said that with regard to the prospectus no one now suggested that it was not perfectly fair and honest. With regard to the giving up of the contracts with the Barcelona Co., he was not satisfied whether or not the company had the power to give them up without the consent of the London commissioners. He had no means of forming an opinion whether it was a desirable bargain or not, but it did not seem to him that the putting an end to the contracts in any way altered the legal relations of the company, the commissioners, and the debenture-holders respectively to one another; though, no doubt, it altered the chance of carrying on the works. The Aragon Co. was in no sense a delusion or a sham, but a fair combination of debenture-holders formed to fill up a gap, and to benefit themselves and others also. His lordship then continued:—] Now the question is what is to be done? Is it a case in which the debenture-holders or the obligation-holders are entitled to have their money returned? I agree altogether in the view put forward by Sir Horace Davey, that it is a case in which they are persons who have entered into a bargain, and that bargain is contained in the prospectus which they approved, and in the resolutions and in the contracts, and it is a case, therefore, in which money has been placed in the hands of trustees for the purpose of being applied to the purposes of the trust. I think it quite clear that it must be applied for the purposes of the trust and for nothing else. The claim made proceeds on the footing that it cannot be applied for that purpose, and that, therefore, it ought to be returned; and there can be no doubt that if it cannot be applied for the purposes of the trust it must not be left in court, either to remain there or to be applied in redeeming such of the obligations as may be first drawn, but that it ought to be divided pari passu amongst the holders of the obligations. If, on the other hand, the trust can be carried out, in that case it must be; and I do not think I am in a position to say, now that the time has arrived at which no latitude can be given to the Saragossa Co., if they are in a position to show at the present time that there is a reasonable prospect, as a matter of business, of carrying out the railway for the purpose of constructing which this money was subscribed.

In the first place, one of the points pressed very strongly is that there has been ample time given, and it is said that the time is running out. It is a very long time since the law was passed, and it is ten years since the concession was granted; on the other hand, it is not a very long time, only three years, since the obligations were issued, and the time, therefore, in that respect is not very long. On the other hand, this has to be borne in mind: that the railway has yet to be made, and it is admitted by Mr. Dawson in the witness box that to complete it according to the scheme originally proposed will require from two and a half to three years. I do not think I am going far wrong in saying that it is quite fair under those circumstances to take three years as the time it would require, and that is assuming also that the money is available for the purpose of doing it. Then, again, these obligations are repayable out of capital until six months after that time, because they are to be repayable out of capital until "completion of the line."

Now a point has been made as to what "completion of the line" means; and as to that I do not think there is the slightest doubt. The words are clear in themselves, and I do not know what "completion of the line" can mean but completion of the whole line. I do not see how completion of part of the line could be completion of the whole. More than that, looking at the scheme it is quite obvious what is meant. The scheme is that the obligation-holders are to subscribe their money on terms that will induce them to lend it, the terms being that interest is to be payable from the first moment, and that the redemption is to commence from the first moment, but there are no means whatever of providing for such payments before the line is completed except out of capital.

[His lordship then showed that the service of the loan for 3½ years would require £120,000 out of the funds in the hands of the London commissioners; that there was no contract before the court for the complete construction of the works, and that the only suggested contract—that with the Aragon Co.—was one under which it was proposed only to complete the 1st and 2nd sections of the line, leaving the 3rd section untouched. His lordship then proceeded:—]

Then I should say this further with regard to that particular contract: although I have said that the Aragon and Catalonia Co. was in my opinion an honest company formed by obligation-holders in order to get over a difficulty, and I do not see that a word can be said against them in that respect, yet when I come to consider that they are the persons who are proposed to be the contractors under this new contract, I must say that I do not see that they are in a position of such substance and such means that they can be looked to as furnishing, by their own status, any guarantee of any kind that even what is proposed—the limited works that are proposed—will be accomplished by them within the time. If we cannot look to the Aragon Co. as sufficient of itself to carry it out, what are the means and resources available for the purpose of carrying out the contract?

Before considering that I should, perhaps, deal with a matter very much pressed on me, which is this: that it is quite obvious that under no possible arrangement of any kind could the work be carried out within the period fixed by the concession, which expires in February, 1894, and, what is more, that there has been a breach of the provisions of the last extension of time already, so that at the present moment it is said this concession is ipso facto forfeited. As regards the position of the parties with reference to the concession it is no doubt a very serious matter. The Government has allowed the concession to last a very long time. Although the concession is forfeited (I am using the language of the law) it is said the Government at the present time are, through their inspectors, inspecting the works, authorizing the expenditure, and, what is more, they are pressing on the works, with a view to carry them out. Well, this statement about the pressing on of the works may mean two things: it may mean that the Government are prepared to waive all the delay that has taken place if the contract is carried on as from this date; and it may also mean this, that the Government are pressing now much more than they ever did, as showing that the concession is forfeited, though, if great indulgence is used and the work is pressed on very much, that forfeiture would not be taken advantage of. The conclusion I have come to myself about it is this, that the Government are desirous of having the work done. They said from the first that it is a matter of public utility, and for their own purposes I am satisfied they would not avail themselves of this right of declaring the concession forfeited if they see their way to getting the end they have desired accomplished, namely, the construction of this work of public utility. And it is obvious that if the present company can reasonably do it in any way it is far more to the advantage of the Government and everybody else that they should carry it on than that the concession should be forfeited, and the Government should be allowed to take this step and then obtain a new concessionaire to take up the work and begin it comparatively afresh. I have not the least doubt that the Government, although they may be in a position to say it is forfeited if they please, will not do anything to forfeit it so long as they see that their own object will be accomplished—namely, the getting of the work done. I have this further test of it, the allowing the work to go on, I mean their not interfering with or stopping the works which have been going on, and to the cost of which they will themselves at the proper time have to contribute, because they have agreed to pay one-fourth of the estimate, and although, for reasons I entirely appreciate, they have not paid the subvention, and have not been asked to make the payment, yet, if in point of fact the works were completed by that company, they would have eventually to make large payments, allowing the work to go on in the meantime.

Under these circumstances I do not feel very much pressed by the argument that the concession has come to an end, and that what the obligation-holders were entitled to was the security of the concession which was in existence, and that de facto, because the time has expired, they are entitled to the return of the money. In my opinion that is not so; but the fact that they are in this perilous condition with the Government, that their right to the continuance of the concession is hanging in the balance is a very important point to consider in looking to what their means are to carry out the railway.

Then we come to the most important question of all, and it is a question that, in my opinion, I am bound to consider. As a matter of business—as a practical matter—can the railway be made by this company with the funds that they have, I will not say in hand, but with the available funds, as to which there is a reasonable probability of their being able to get them? I am told by Sir Henry James that the High Court of Justice has neither jurisdiction nor competent knowledge to form an opinion as to the resources of this company or what it may be able to do hereafter. I agree to a great extent as to that; I feel that I am not competent to a great extent to do so, but there is one thing I think I am bound to do, and I must deal with it—the question not what the possible resources may be, but what the resources at present or in prospect are by means of which there can be any reasonable hope, as a matter of business, that the line could be completed. I think that it is settled for me by the decision of the court in the Bolivian case, because although in that case, as I have said, the circumstances were in many respects very distinguishable indeed from the present case, yet there are certain points in common. One important point of distinction was that the concession was revoked, and in that respect I think the present case is totally different, but the court did not proceed solely on that ground, because, if so, that would be sufficient for the judgment, but they went to other points, and to justify the view taken I will refer to that case. [His lordship then read the judgment of James, L.J., in Wilson v. Church, 13 Ch. D., at pp. 45, 46, from "The purpose" to "of no utility whatever," and the judgment of Cotton, L.J., at pp. 61-63, from "It was said there is an existing contract" to "as a matter of business to be made," and also the judgment of Lord Cairns, L.C., in the House of Lords (5 App. Cas. 184) from "So far as time is concerned" to "would be the result," and continued:—] Under the circumstances it seems to me that I am not only entitled, but bound, as best I can, to arrive at a conclusion as to whether there are resources forthcoming in præsenti or in prospectu out of which there is any reasonable prospect, as a matter of business, that this railway can be made. There is one matter that is of rather great importance before I go to the evidence, which is this: that the persons who are the plaintiffs here, asking to have their money back, are only a very small portion of the holders of the obligations. Altogether they are a substantial proportion—there is £35,000 or thereabouts at stake; but still the proportion is very much smaller than the remainder of the obligation-holders. Then, out of the remainder of the obligation-holders there are a great many whose views I do not know; but I have the view of a number of persons far greater, so far as the extent of their holding goes, than those plaintiffs who do object to the fund being paid out and divided among the holders of the obligations, and who are desirous of having the railway proceeded with. That is a matter that, in my opinion, I ought to give great weight to. I do not say it is a question of majority and minority at all, but when I find a considerable number of persons who have money of their own at stake in the matter, and who, as far as I can see, have no object on the other side to gain by wishing their money to be thrown away, the fact remains that there is a large preponderance of persons who claim that the matter should be continued rather than that it should be discontinued.

That does not, however, relieve me from considering the position of matters, but before dealing with them I should mention one point. As I pointed out, it was originally contemplated that this was to be a through railway, and all calculations of profit are based on the assumption that the money earned will be such as a first-class railway carrying through traffic would produce. If only two out of the three sections are completed there is an end of all hopes of through traffic. That source of income is entirely destroyed, and all that can be relied on in the way of income would be the proceeds of local traffic. Therefore the calculations of profit from an incomplete line must necessarily be very much less than those from a completed line. Again, it is said that in considering what the prospects of the line are which may render it possible to believe that further money can be borrowed on the faith of its completion, there are certain reasons originally existing for the belief that the line would be a financial success which have ceased since the concession was granted; to put it shortly, certain rival companies have obtained a more formidable position, but upon the evidence I do not think there is anything substantial in that. But the fact that at present it is proposed to leave the centre third of the line in abeyance does seem to me a matter of the utmost importance.

[His lordship then considered the resources of the company, and the mode in which it was proposed to apply them. The funds in the hands of the commissioners were £225,000, subject to a charge which reduced them to £195,000. From that must be deducted £10,000 for costs and expenses, and £120,000 for the service of the loan during three and a half years; leaving the moneys in the hands of the commissioners available for the works at £65,000. The total Government subvention on the whole line, deducting charges to which it was subject, was £164,000, spread over a long period, and there was about £50,000 caution money, payable only on completion of the whole line. Some 13,000 obligations were still unissued, which at £10 each would amount to £130,000, but it was idle to ask his lordship to treat that as an existing asset to that extent, considering the position of the company. There was £250,000 callable on the share capital. But being callable on shares to bearer, his lordship could not understand how it could be hoped that one penny of it could be procured. Mr. Shelford's estimate greatly exceeded that of Mr. Dawson's, but in his lordship's opinion Mr. Dawson's was the more correct. Mr. Dawson estimated the cost of completing sections 1 and 2 at £220,000, and considered that to meet that there was £195,000 in the commissioners' hands, and also £34,000, that portion of the subvention that would be due on sections 1 and 2. But his lordship pointed out that, even allowing the £34,000, which was not payable until the whole line was constructed, together with £65,000 in the hands of the commissioners, for, as above stated, not more than that sum was available, only £100,000 in round figures was available to meet Mr. Dawson's estimate of £220,000 for sections 1 and 2. This calculation, however, did not provide at all for the 3rd section, which was essential for through traffic, on which the estimate of profits was based. As to that section, Mr. Dawson's estimated cost was over £500,000. His lordship then continued:—]

Now looking at that as far as a person who is a practical man would look at it, it is a case in which in my opinion there are no available sums at present in hand or in prospect by which the undertaking can possibly be carried out by means of the trust constituted by the contracts and the resolution and the prospectus.

Then it was put that the case of Wilson v. Church is very different, because there was in that case a total failure of consideration. I agree there is a very great difference in that respect. I do not agree that it is literally correct. There was not a total failure of consideration, because a good deal of money had been spent, but still there was a greater failure than in the present case, because a good deal of money has been spent upon this land, and whether it be £80,000 or £100,000, as Sir Henry James suggested, is not, I think, material for this purpose. I do not think the point to be decided is whether there has been failure of consideration at all. The contract is not to be at an end on the ground of failure of consideration, but the question is whether the trust under which the money was deposited can or cannot be carried into effect. Then it was said, Why should the money be returned if one-tenth of the work had been done; if nine-tenths of the work had been done it was said the court would not have thought of any return; and if there has been one-tenth done how can there be said to be any difference so long as the whole has not been done? I am not satisfied with the proposition which supposes that if nine-tenths had been done the money would not be returned. If nine-tenths were done it would require very much less to convince one that there were means available for the completion of the rest. But assuming that the court had come to the conclusion that although nine-tenths were done it was absolutely impossible to complete the rest, and the fund available could not be applied to complete the rest, I am not prepared to admit that the court would not do, in the case where nine-tenths of the expenditure had been incurred, what it would do if only one-tenth had been.

The conclusion I come to is that the obligation-holders are entitled to say that there is no prospect whatever of completing the purposes of the trust, and therefore that the resulting trust (if that is what it is to be called) in their favour ought to have effect given to it, subject, as Sir Horace Davey said, to the payment of whatever are the proper charges on it which have not been satisfied. I think there is the greatest difference between this case and the Belize case, according to the view the judges before whom it came took of it; but I must say, in my opinion, the case does come within the words used by Lord Hatherley in his judgment in that case, where he expressed a much more lenient view with respect to the company than some of the other judges who gave opinions did. He said: "My own opinion is that in the present case there has been a common misfortune, the work has proved to be beyond the strength of those who undertook to perform it, there was a mistake on the part of those who engaged to enter into it in regard to the supply of the necessary means by which alone the money could be raised and by which alone the contract made with the public, as contained in the prospectus, could be carried into effect." I agree with what Sir Henry James said, and I wish to record it that I do not find that the company or the directors have in any case deliberately departed from what was expressed in the prospectus, and it is only by reason of their being unable to carry it out further, that in my opinion the case must be decided in favour of the plaintiffs (the Foreign American, &c., Co.).

Then the question remains as to what is to be done. The right of the persons who have charges on the fund is not in dispute, but there is another matter to be considered, namely, the position of the obligation-holders as a body, having regard to the security they have upon the works as they stand. The statement of claim in the Foreign, &c., Co.'s action only asks for a return of the money and a distribution of the remaining fund, but I do not think I should discharge my duty in this case if I were merely to make a declaration that the parties were entitled to a return of the funds without going on further to deal with the whole matter, including the security, and particularly so for this reason, that I am not satisfied that the obligation-holders, who are the plaintiffs in the first action, would have a right to have their funds returned, except subject to an application of such part of it as ought properly to be applied for preventing the security from becoming wholly and absolutely useless. Let me put an illustration by way of showing my meaning, though the case is not the same. Supposing the line had been nearly completed, and that the money in the hands of the commissioners was sufficient to complete it, but that the company themselves, who saw no benefit whatever coming to them out of the transaction, threw it up and said that the obligation-holders might have their money back, what would be the position of the obligation-holders in that case? I think they would have a right to say, and even any minority of them, not a nominal but a substantial minority that is, would have a right to say, as against a greater number, that the subscription and deposit of their money in order to complete the work which was their security for repayment, did involve an obligation as between themselves that would not enable some of them to throw the undertaking or security over without doing what was necessary to realize in the best way that could be done for the whole, what was depreciated by common misfortune, in other words, that some of the obligation-holders in that case would have a right to say against the wishes of the others, We will have the rest of the money subscribed applied in completing the security to obtain which we advanced our money. That case differs from this one in this way. In that case I am assuming the money would be sufficient to complete the security contemplated. In the present case the whole fund would not suffice; but I think that the obligation-holders are entitled to say there is such a mutuality of interest in the common fund subscribed for the common purpose that they are entitled to have whatever part of the fund may be necessary applied to make the loss by non-completion less than it otherwise would be. I do not mean that they could enter into a different speculation, and say, Let us complete the section to Alcaniz, and have that for our money; but, on the other hand, they are entitled to say, Let us have that usefully laid out under the trust that can be laid out, in order to utilize what has been spent so far as possible in reducing the loss we might otherwise sustain. It might be (I only put this by way of illustration) that the best way of utilizing what has been spent would be to complete the line to Alcaniz, not because it is completing part of the undertaking, but because such an expenditure might produce for the common benefit the best result out of money otherwise almost entirely thrown away.

[His lordship then said that, without expressing it in technical terms, there must be a declaration to the effect that the plaintiffs, the Foreign, &c., Co. (Limited), were substantially right, that the works could not be carried on, and that the said plaintiffs were entitled to have their money back, subject to all charges and liabilities attaching to the fund, and subject also to a consideration of how the money could be best applied, if it could be usefully applied, in order to realize the security; and that the costs of all parties must come out of the fund, including the trial of the actions.]

Minutes of judgment:—Declare that the trusts constituted by the contracts of the 16th of June, 1888, and the 13th of February, 1889, and by the resolutions of the Saragossa Railway Co. passed on the 13th of February, 1889, and by the prospectus issued by the defendant company in May, 1889, all in the pleadings mentioned, ought, so far as they can be performed, to be carried into execution under the direction of the court. And declare that, subject to the payment of any charges on the funds subscribed by the plaintiffs and the other holders of 3 per cent. obligations issued by the Saragossa Co. and to any payments which may be certified to be properly payable thereout, and to the payment of any costs directed to be paid thereout, the said fund is (in the events which have happened) divisible rateably amongst such of the holders of the said obligations as are entitled to the benefit of the same; and that no part of the said fund is to be applied in payment of any such obligation-holders in priority except in respect of obligations which have already been drawn but have not been paid, and interest which has already accrued due and become payable, but has not been paid. And declare that the plaintiffs and the other holders of the said obligations are entitled to a charge on the railways and property comprised in or charged by the said obligations, and the trust deed dated the 6th of October, 1887, for securing the same. Tax the costs of the plaintiffs and defendants of the above actions. And let the defendants Sloper, Robinson, & Wilde pay and retain such costs out of the funds in their hands. And let the following inquiries be made, viz:—(i.) An inquiry what obligations have been issued by the Saragossa Co., and which of them are now outstanding and entitled to the benefit of the trust constituted as aforesaid. (ii.) An inquiry what sums have come to the hands of the defendants, Sloper, Robinson, & Wilde, or any of them, representing moneys subscribed in respect of the said obligations, and what portions of such sums are now in their hands, and let the defendants, Sloper, Robinson, & Wilde, in answering such last mentioned inquiry, make a statement to be verified by affidavit of all disbursements made by them; and any of the parties are to be at liberty to apply with respect to any sum appearing to have been received by the said defendants or any of them, and not now in their hands. (iii.) An inquiry of what particulars the sums subscribed in respect of the said obligations, which have not been received by the said last mentioned defendants, now consist, and whether any and what steps ought to be taken to recover any part thereof which may appear to be outstanding. (iv.) An inquiry what charges or incumbrances, other than the said obligations, affect the railways and property of the Saragossa Co. comprised in or charged by the said obligations or the said deed, including any property acquired for the purpose of the railways which has been or ought to be paid for by means of the funds subscribed by the plaintiffs and the other holders of the said obligations. (v.) An inquiry whether any and what steps should be taken for the purpose of realizing, for the benefit of the plaintiffs and the other holders of the said obligations, the railways, works, lands, rolling stock and other materials acquired for the purpose thereof, and in prosecuting this inquiry regard is to be had to the question whether any further expenditure should be made out of the said fund in completing and equipping the first section of the said railways or any part thereof. (vi.) An inquiry whether any other and what sums are properly payable out of the said fund. Reserve further consideration.

READ v. WOTTON. (a.)

Practice—Action for recovery of possession of premises for breach of covenant—Claim for injunction—Joinder of separate causes of action—Leave of court—R. S. C., ord. 18, r. 2; ord. 36, r. 58.

A writ was issued claiming (1) recovery of possession of premises, (2) arrears of rent and mesne profits, (3) an injunction to restrain nuisance or damage, (4) damages, and (5) costs. The defendants entered an appearance and served notice of motion asking that the writ might be set aside, on the ground that the leave of the court had not been obtained for the joinder of the two causes of action relating (1) to the injunction, and (2) to the recovery of possession of the premises.

Held, that, though a perpetual injunction might be relief inconsistent with the terms of ord. 18, r. 2, yet an interlocutory injunction was within the terms of the rule, being a substitute for damages which might be assessed for the continuing breach between the issue of the writ and the trial of the action.

Motion.

This was a motion by the plaintiff asking for an injunction to restrain the defendants until the trial of the action from doing anything on their premises which might be or become a nuisance to the plaintiff, contrary to the provisions of the lease from the plaintiff to the defendants, and from continuing a waxworks exhibition thereon.

The defendants having entered an appearance and demanded the delivery of a statement of claim, which had not been delivered, served a cross-notice of motion asking that the writ might be set aside, on the ground that the plaintiff had failed to obtain the leave of the court before the issue of the writ for the joinder of the cause of action relating to the injunction with the cause of action for the recovery of possession of the premises, and took this preliminary objection on the hearing of the plaintiff's motion.

The writ was indorsed as follows:—

1. To recover possession of the house, shop, and premises, No. 5, The Parade, London-road, Croydon, Surrey.
2. And for arrears of rent and mesne profits.
3. For an injunction to restrain the defendants, their or either of their servants, agents, undertenants, occupiers, and workmen, from doing or suffering to be done upon the said house and shop and premises, or any part thereof, any act or thing whatsoever which may be or become an annoyance, nuisance, or damage to the plaintiff or any of her tenants in the neighbourhood contrary to the provisions of the lease granted by the plaintiff to the defendants dated the 31st of August, 1886.
4. Damages.
5. Costs.

Keary, for the defendants, argued that there were two distinct causes of action disclosed by the writ: (1) breach of covenant before action brought, which was the ground of the action for recovery of possession, arrears of rent, and damages; and (2) continuing breach after action brought, which was the foundation of the claim for an injunction.—As the requisite leave of the court had not been obtained for the joinder of the two causes of action the writ ought to be set aside: R. S. C., ord. 18, r. 2; Hambling v. Wallani, W. N., 1889, p. 133.

Beddall, for the plaintiff.—In that case there was no claim for damages. Here there is only one cause of action. We claim damages for breach of covenant, and ask for an injunction only as incidental relief: Kendrick v. Roberts, 30 W. R. 365; Gledhill v. Hunter, 28 W. R. 530, 14 Ch. D. 492. In any case the defendants have waived their objection by entering an appearance and demanding a statement of claim.

Keary, in reply.—Damages in ord. 18, r. 2, means damages which have accrued before action brought.

STIRLING, J.—This is an application to set aside the writ in the action, on the ground that it is not in conformity with ord. 18, r. 2, which provides that "no cause of action shall, unless by leave of the court or a judge, be joined with an action for the recovery of land, except claims in respect of mesne profits or arrears of rent or double value in respect of the premises claimed, or any part thereof, and damages for breach of any contract under which the same, or any part thereof, are held, or for any wrong or injury to the premises claimed." Now it is to be observed that in this case there is no statement of claim, and I have to refer simply to the writ. [His lordship read the indorsement on the writ, as above set out, and continued:—] I am called upon to say that that writ is not in conformity with the rules. It appears to me that in the absence of a statement of claim it will fall within the express words of the rule, for it allows to be joined in an action for the recovery of land claims "in respect of mesne profits or arrears of rent or double value in respect of the premises claimed, or any part thereof, and damages for breach of any contract under which the same, or any part thereof, are held." There is in this writ a claim for damages, and under ord. 36, r. 58, "Where damages are to be assessed in respect of any continuing cause of action they shall be assessed down to the time of the assessment." Consequently if it is proved at the trial that there has been a breach of the contract under which the premises are held before action brought, continuing at the time when the action is brought and down to the trial, damages may be assessed, not only down to the issue of the writ, but to the time of assessment. What is claimed is an injunction. If there were a statement of claim there might be relief asked inconsistent with the rule. A perpetual injunction might be inconsistent; but it seems to me that an interlocutory injunction is within the terms of the rule, for it is a mere substitute for the damages which might be assessed for the continuing breach between the issue of the writ and the trial of the action. The claim for an injunction is made "in respect of damages for the breach of any contract under which the premises are held." The writ so understood falls within the terms of the rule, and the preliminary objection therefore fails. The motion to set aside the writ must be dismissed, with costs, to be the plaintiff's costs in any event.

The plaintiff's motion was then heard, and his lordship granted an interlocutory injunction.

Defendants' cross-motion dismissed, with costs.

MOORE v. HIGH BAILIFF OF BROMPTON COUNTY COURT. (a.)

County court—High bailiff—Execution—Implements of trade—Seizure and sale of by high bailiff—Error of judgment by high bailiff—No guilty intent—Liability of high bailiff in summary way as for "misconduct"—County Courts Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 43), s. 50.

The seizure and sale of the implements of an execution debtor's trade by a high bailiff of a county court, in the carrying of an execution under the judgment of the court, even though done recklessly and under a serious error of judgment, but not with any wrongful intent, is not "misconduct" within the meaning of section 50 of the County Courts Act, 1888.

Appeal by the high bailiff of the Brompton County Court from an order made by his Honour Judge Bacnor, sitting at Brompton County Court, by which order the high bailiff was ordered to pay to the present respondent, Mr. Moore, the sum of £22 10s. for damages in respect of "misconduct" in seizing, removing, and selling the implements of the respondent's trade.

The sole question of appeal now was whether the wrongful seizure and sale of trade implements by the high bailiff, in executing a judgment of the court, is "misconduct" within the meaning of the 50th section of the County Courts Act, 1888.

The learned county court judge took time to consider his judgment, and he delivered a written judgment, holding that such seizure and sale of implements of trade was "misconduct" within the meaning of section 50, although there was no wrongful intent, only a serious error of judgment.

A judgment had been recovered against the respondent, Mr. Moore, and an execution under the judgment was levied at his residence on the 25th of July, 1892. Claims were put forward by two claimants to the goods seized, and interpleader proceedings followed. The goods seized on such levy were removed and warehoused by the high bailiff on the 29th of July under circumstances which formed the ground of complaint in the present case. The claims were admitted by the plaintiff, and were allowed by the learned judge, and so disposed of.

Reported by Sir SHERSTON BAKER, Barrister-at-Law.

It was then stated to the judge on behalf of the execution debtor, the present respondent, that an application would be made against the high bailiff, under the 50th section of the County Courts Act, 1888, by the execution debtor for misconduct in the course of the proceedings. By direction of the judge the applicant, Mr. Moore, was ordered to furnish particulars of the misconduct alleged, and five heads of misconduct were furnished. Upon the inquiry, four of these charges were found in favour of the high bailiff, so far as the application under the 50th section was concerned, the judge being of opinion that, although the man in possession was guilty of misconduct, it was not "misconduct" for which the high bailiff would be personally liable under the 50th section. These charges being thus disposed of are not now material.

Upon the fifth charge the learned judge found against the high bailiff, and this was the charge now in question upon this appeal.

The particulars of this charge furnished by the applicant were "that the high bailiff illegally and unlawfully broke into the defendant's dwelling-house on the 29th of July, 1892, and removed the whole of the furniture and effects, including the tools and implements of trade in the said dwelling-house, contrary to sections 147 and 154 of the County Courts Act, 1888."

The judge, in his written judgment, was of opinion that the bailiff had a legal right to remove the whole of the goods, exclusive of the tools in trade, and that the 154th section only prohibits a sale, and not the removal, of goods for five days, and, as to the trade goods or implements of the applicant, that there was an illegal removal and an illegal sale of the same.

The applicant, that is, the present respondent, was a civil engineer and an inventor of patents, but for some time, being crippled and unable to walk, he had supported himself and family by an ingenious patent for making pipe-cleaners, in the manufacture of which he uses a considerable number of small deal boards, two or three feet in length, which must be saturated in oil for a considerable time before they are of use; and eighty-seven of these deal boards were seized by the bailiff and sold for the sum of eight shillings. One of the questions of the present appeal was, whether these deal boards were implements of trade within the meaning of section 147 of the Act, and the learned judge found as a fact that they were implements of trade within the meaning of that section.

The learned judge, in dealing with the question whether the act of misconduct now in question came within section 50, said:—"There can be no doubt that the natural and ordinary meaning of the word 'misconduct' must be restricted by the provisions of the Act generally, and probably by the terms employed in conjunction with it in the same section. It must be restricted, at all events, to acts or omissions in the performance of the duties of the high bailiff under the provisions of this Act, whether performed by himself or his subordinates, in like manner as the same term has been restricted in the construction of the 28th section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, as to the discharge of the bankrupt to acts done by him 'relevant to his bankruptcy.' It also appears to me, after much consideration, that the word 'misconduct' is further restricted in the 50th section, by the terms employed in conjunction with it, to such acts of omission or commission only as are ejusdem generis or in pari materiâ with the wrongful acts specified by such terms, and especially to the term 'extortion,' which precedes it. But I think that the act of selling the trade implements of the applicant after due notice and under all the circumstances was a wrongful act in the nature of extortion or oppression, or at all events ejusdem generis therewith, especially having regard to the fact that the high bailiff was interested in the profits of the sale in respect of his fees. The following definition of extortion seems to me almost literally to include the present case: 'Extortion is an abuse of the public which consists in any officer's unlawfully taking by colour of his office from any man any money or thing of value that is not due, or before it is due' (Blackstone, bk. 4, ch. 1). I think that the act in question was an act of 'misconduct' in the nature of extortion contemplated by the 50th section. I regard the act of the high bailiff only as an error of judgment, though a serious one. The question of damages has, therefore, to be considered, and I think that a jury, upon the evidence before me, would rightly assess them at £22 10s."

The high bailiff appealed.

Section 50 of the Act says: "If any registrar, bailiff, or officer of any court, acting under colour or pretence of process of the said court, shall be not charged with extortion or misconduct, or with duly paying or accounting for any money levied by him, it shall be lawful for the judge to inquire into such matter in a summary way . . . and to make such order thereupon for the repayment of any money extorted . . . and for the payment of such damages and costs as he shall think just, and also, if he shall think fit, to impose such fine, not exceeding ten pounds for each offence, as he shall deem adequate," &c.

E. Morten, for the high bailiff.—The first point is that these deal boards were not 'implements of trade' within the meaning of section 147, but were rather in the nature of plant. In the next place, even if they were implements of trade, the act of seizing and selling them was not an act of 'misconduct' within the meaning of section 50. There are two words in that section on which I rely, "extortion" and "offence," and both have recently been construed judicially under a section analogous to the present section—section 29 of the Sheriffs Act, 1887. These cases are Shoppee v. Nathan & Co., [1892] 1 Q. B. 245, 40 W. R. Dig 233; Lee v. Dangar, 40 W. R. 469, [1892] 2 Q. B. 337; Bagge v. Whitehead, 40 W. R. 472, [1892] 2 Q. B. 355. According to these cases there can be no "misconduct" unless there be mens rea, a guilty mind, or an intention to do wrong. Here there was no guilty intent, as the judge found that there was merely an error of judgment on the part of the high bailiff. There is no "misconduct," therefore, within the meaning of the section.

Atherley Jones, for the respondent.

POLLOCK, B.—This case comes before us by way of appeal from the decision of the learned county court judge, who had thought that the present respondent should recover against the high bailiff a sum for damages in respect of misconduct in seizing and removing and selling the trade implements of the applicant; and the decision is founded upon section 50 of the County Courts Act, 1888. The first question is, Are we content to support the finding of the county court judge because it is a mere finding of fact? The learned judge has taken the greatest pains in endeavouring, as fairly as he could, to carry out what he believes to be the object of this section, and he has expressed his judgment in language so clear that I have not the slightest difficulty in eliminating those parts of his judgment which are findings in point of fact from those which are findings in point of law. There were several charges of misconduct, and the charge which this appeal refers to is in these words: "That you illegally and unlawfully broke into the defendant's dwelling-house, and removed the whole of the furniture and effects, including the tools and implements of trade in the said dwelling-house, contrary to section 147 of the Act." The learned judge has gone very carefully into the question whether these were tools of trade or not, and he came to the conclusion that the goods seized were part of the defendant's tools of trade, and used for that purpose. I do not intend to say more as to this finding of fact by the learned judge, which is, as far as I can see, a perfectly correct finding of fact, and I assume that these things were implements of trade within the meaning of the section.

The next question is whether the act in question is an act of "misconduct" within the section. I should prefer to see language used in this section which would make, as far as possible, the county court judge master of the situation as to whether a wrongful or criminal act, or merely negligence on the part of the bailiff was involved. The section, to say the least, is of a penal character. [His lordship then read the section.] To my mind the words "misconduct" and "extortion," followed by the word "offence," show that this section was meant to deal with offences which were of a penal character; that is to say, acts of misconduct of such a character that they indicate an intentional abuse of the authority possessed by the high bailiff. It seems to me there is a difference between the conduct of a bailiff which is of an intentionally wrong kind, and the conduct of a bailiff which is merely that of negligence. There may be very often acts done which amount to what the learned judge has called "recklessness," but in no sense of the nature of a wrongful act done with any intention. That seems to me to be the proper construction to be put upon this section, and I do not propose to compare it at length with a similar section under which the sheriff's liability is established. I would only observe, as to the words of sub-section 2 of section 29 of the Sheriffs Act, 1887, that the provisions are really wider than the words of section 50 of this Act. The judgments in the case of Lee v. Dangar show that a mere innocent mistake cannot come within the section as "misconduct," but that there must be a wrong motive. All the words used by the learned judges in that case are equally applicable to the present case, which is a case where the Legislature has provided a special remedy.

It seems to me that both sides were carefully considered by the learned judge, and yet I think he has come to a wrong conclusion, and, that being so, our judgment must be to reverse his decision, and with costs.

IN BANKRUPTCY.

Ex parte BLANDFORD. (a.)

Bill of sale — Bankruptcy — Execution — Goods sold privately—Receipt given by sheriff—Bills of Sale Act 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 31), ss. 4, 8, 10.

Goods seized by the sheriff under a writ of execution were sold privately by leave of the court, and a receipt was given by the sheriff to the purchaser in the following form:—"Received from, &c., . . . the sum of £122 1s. 9d., being for the goods, chattels, and effects now in and upon the premises No. 471, Bethnal Green-road, which were seized by the sheriff of the county of London under and by virtue of a writ of fi. fa., and hereby sold as far as he lawfully can or may, without any warranty of title, and with the consent of the defendant, who is a builder, and under an order of the master." The goods were left by the purchaser in the possession of the debtor until the presentation of the bankruptcy petition.

Held, that the document was a bill of sale within the meaning of the Bills of Sale Act, 1878, and, not being registered, must be declared void.

Application by the trustee in the bankruptcy for an order declaring that he was entitled to certain plant and other property claimed by the respondent.

The debtor was a builder, and in July, 1891, an execution was put into his house.

On the 18th of July, 1891, the debtor's goods were sold by the sheriff to a Mr. Burgess, the respondent to the present application, a receipt being given in the following form:—"Received this 18th day of July, 1891, of Henry Brocklehurst Burgess, of No. 1, Bethnal Green-road, leather merchant, the sum of £122 1s. 9d., being for the goods, chattels, and effects now in and upon the premises No. 471, Bethnal Green-road, which were seized by the sheriff of the county of London under and by virtue of a writ of fieri facias issued in the above cause, and hereby sold as far as he lawfully can or may, without any warranty of title, and with the consent of the above-named defendant, who is a builder, and under an order of Master Wilberforce dated this 18th day of July, 1891."

The goods were left in the possession of the debtor until the 23rd of September, 1892, and were used by him in the way of his business.

On the 7th of October, 1892, a receiving order was made against the debtor on a petition presented on the 31st of August, 1892, and the goods were now claimed by the trustee on the ground (1) that the document of the 18th of July, 1891, was a bill of sale, and (2) that the goods had been left in the possession of the bankrupt within the reputed ownership section.

The question as to the document being a bill of sale was the only one argued.

Herbert Reed, Q.C., and Wotton, for the trustee.—It is now settled that although a mere receipt is not a bill of sale, yet where there is a receipt which assures the goods to the buyer, or where the contract is put into writing, it is within section 4 of the Bills of Sale Act, 1878, and requires registration. This is nothing more nor less than a bill of sale from the sheriff. A receipt may or may not be an assurance. In order to be a bill of sale it must be an assurance, but if the parties put their contract into a receipt, then it becomes an assurance.

They referred to Marsden v. Meadows, 29 W. R. 816, 7 Q. B. D. 80; Newlove v. Shrewsbury, 36 W. R. 835, 11 Q. B. D. 41; Ex parte Cooper, In re Baum, 27 W. R. 299, 10 Ch. D. 313; Woodgate v. Godfrey, 28 W. R. 88, 5 Ex. D. 24.

Shearman, for the respondent.—The question is whether this receipt can be said to operate as a contract. If the receipt is not intended by the parties to be a reduction into writing of the contract, it is not a bill of sale. Here it was a purely verbal contract, and in no way depended on the receipt. Under ordinary circumstances a sheriff's receipt for the goods cannot be intended by the parties to be the actual contract of sale.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J.—I have arrived reluctantly at the conclusion that the contention of the trustee is right. I say reluctantly, because I do not believe myself that the transaction here is really within the mischief aimed at by the statute. The transaction here was in fact a real transaction. The sheriff did seize the goods, and he seized them under a real execution. It was not a collusive execution at all, and having seized the goods under a real execution he really did sell them, and they were paid for. According to my view that transaction might have been quite as well carried out without any such receipt as was given in this case. The giving of such a receipt was not in any sense essential to the transaction which took place, and it is plain that the sheriff did sell, and that Mr. Burgess did buy and pay for the goods.

The question I have to decide is whether or not that receipt is a bill of sale within the meaning of the Act of 1878, so that the non-registration of it, coupled with the want of possession by the grantee, avoids the bill of sale and the transaction.

Now it is plain, without going through the decisions, that although in section 4 of the Act of 1878 receipts with or without inventories are referred to, it is not every receipt which amounts to a bill of sale. A receipt does not amount to a bill of sale unless it is an assurance. That conclusion has been arrived at because of the words, "other assurances," which appear in the section. That being so, the question is whether this receipt is an assurance. It is plain that it is not a legal assurance. It does not purport to be a transfer, conveyance, or assignment, or anything of that kind. But then it seems to me from various decisions, and particularly from that of the North Central Wagon Co. v. Manchester, Sheffield, and Lincolnshire Railway Co., 35 W. R. 447, 35 Ch. D. 191, that an assurance may be an assurance within the Act of Parliament although it is not a legal assurance. It is an assurance within the Act of Parliament if it is such a document as would enable the recipient of it in a court of equity to rely on it as being an assurance of title as evidencing such a contract to assign as would entitle him in equity to insist on an assignment or to treat the document as an assignment.

That being so, I have to say whether this document is such an assurance, and it is plain that if the document in question, although in form a receipt, is really an embodiment of the contract made by the sheriff with Mr. Burgess, and was intended by the parties as such, then it is an equitable assurance. It occurred to me that one way of testing whether this receipt is an embodiment of the agreement between the parties is to ask oneself the question whether, if this document had been placed in the hands of a judge at nisi prius, he would have allowed parol evidence to be given of the terms of the contract after this receipt had been given. It seems to me that the judge would have been bound to reject any parol evidence at all. I was at first inclined to come to the contrary conclusion, because all that which is stated about the terms was really not for the purpose of determining what was the bargain between the parties, but to justify the course the sheriff took as an officer of the law. But the words which prevent me from coming to the contrary conclusion are the words, "and hereby sold." In the presence of those words I cannot help coming to the conclusion that the receipt was intended to embody the terms of the bargain between the parties, and, that being so, I have reluctantly come to the conclusion that the document is a bill of sale and not being registered must be declared void. I should have been glad if I could have found any evidence that there was a complete contract before the receipt was given at all. But there is no evidence of such complete oral contract on the affidavits, and the words "and hereby sold," on the face of the receipt make it difficult to infer that there was any prior contract.

I wish to make one more observation as to this particular case. I am somewhat strengthened in my view in the matter by an admission which was made that there was a schedule which, if not attached to the receipt, was handed over with it. If that is so, it goes to prove that the intention of Mr. Burgess in taking the receipt was really to get an assurance or record of the transaction which would enable him to prove his title.

MIDWINTER v. MIDWINTER. (a.)

Divorce—Settlement—Guilty wife—Leasehold property of wife—Restraint on anticipation—Amount settled variable or fixed—Allowance to children for life—Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857 (20 & 21 Vict. c. 85), s. 45.

On a husband's petition, under section 45 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857, for settlement of property to which the wife, who had been found guilty of adultery, was entitled, the registrar reported that the husband's annual income was £350, derived from his business, whilst the wife's income was £1,140, principally arising from leasehold property, but settled without power of anticipation. The registrar recommended that during the respondent's life £250 a year should be settled on the husband, and £60 on each of five children in the custody of the husband, the sixth child, an infant, having been left in the custody of the respondent.

The court confirmed the registrar's report, and refused to make the allowance variable to meet a possible fall in the respondent's income, or to limit the husband's receipt of his allowance to such time as he should be unmarried, or to limit the allowance to the children to the time when they should be under sixteen years of age.

The settlement was executed by the respondent on a subsequent day immediately after the decree for dissolution of the marriage was made absolute.

Motion to confirm the registrar's report as to the settlement of the property of the wife, against whom a decree nisi for the dissolution of the marriage on the ground of her adultery was pronounced on the 19th of June, 1890.

The husband originally presented a petition for the settlement of the wife's property before the decree nisi was made absolute, and the court (Jeune, P.), in the absence of evidence that the wife intended to defeat the order of the court on motion, refused to depart from the ordinary practice of making any order on petition after final decree, or to take any proceedings in anticipation of such decree. The Court of Appeal, [1892] P. 28, reversed this decision, and referred it back to the registrar, who now reported that the petitioner had an income of £350 a year from his business as a furniture dealer, and that the respondent had a life interest under the will of her father in certain leasehold houses producing an annual income of about £1,100, and was also entitled by a post-nuptial settlement to an annual income of £40 arising from the investment of accumulations under her father's will. Both amounts were settled without power of anticipation. The registrar recommended that the respondent be ordered to settle and assign to trustees an annuity of £550 during her life, of which £250 should be for the benefit of the petitioner and £60 for the benefit of each of the five children of the marriage of whom the petitioner had custody—there was a sixth child which, being an infant at the date of the decree nisi, was left in the custody of the respondent—and that these terms should be embodied in a deed on the usual terms.

Inderwick, Q.C. (Priestley with him), on behalf of the petitioner, moved for confirmation of the registrar's report.

Searle, for the respondent.—Before any order is made debts of the respondent, which amount to £1,000, ought to be paid or secured: Wigney v. Wigney, 30 W. R. 722, 31 Ib. 140, 7 P. D. 177, 228. The first substantial objection is that the respondent's income is variable, and the registrar has awarded a fixed sum; next, the court has no power to order maintenance for children beyond the age of sixteen, though under a different section (35) of the Divorce Act, 1857, the principle in Blandford v. Blandford, [1892] P. 148, 40 W. R. Dig. 80, applies; lastly, the husband should not retain his income under this settlement if he marries again.

Inderwick, Q.C., in reply.—The registrar took into consideration the variableness of the wife's income: Benyon v. Benyon and O'Callaghan, 15 P. D. 29, 54, 38 W. R. Dig. 71. In Blandford v. Blandford there was an appeal, but an arrangement was come to, and it never came before the Court of Appeal. That decision was, however, based on Webster v. Webster, 11 W. R. 86; that decision has, however, been misapprehended. I have an office copy of the minutes. There were two daughters, and an order was made for permanent alimony for the wife and £50 per annum for each daughter. One was married at the age of nineteen, and a summons was taken out and an order made by consent to reduce the amount to £25, and when the other daughter came of age in 1879 a summons was taken out to vary and reduce the amount payable to her, which the court refused. In Bacon v. Bacon, 8 W. R. 552, 2 Sw. & Tr. 86, a settlement on children was made of property which came to the wife by will: see also Seatel v. Seatel, 4 Sw. & Tr. 230, 9 W. R. Div. Dig. 18; March v. March and Palumbo, 15 W. R. 799, L. R. 1 P. & D. 440.

JEUNE, P.—I can now decide all the points in this case except one, relating to the debts, which should in some way be secured to the creditors or some allowance made to the wife, but I have not sufficient information to determine that point, and I therefore pass it by for the present.

The income of the wife seems to be about £1,140 and that of the husband £350. The wife's income arises principally under her father's will, by which the property is left subject to restraint on anticipation. The registrar recommends that she should settle £250 a year for the benefit of the husband and £60 for each of the five children who are in the father's keeping, £550 in all, and leaving her £590 roughly speaking a half of her income. The first point sought to be made is that the sum allowed ought not to be fixed, but variable. I confess I was tempted to make some such order as that the wife should retain a certain proportion of her income but one amongst the objections urged to this was, that no such order had ever been previously made; there is also the fact that the income may go up as well as down, and that the husband's income is also variable, and I cannot therefore depart from the usual practice. I pass over the suggestion to restrict the receipt of the income by the husband to the time of his remaining unmarried, because the principle of a dum sola clause is inapplicable.

The more serious question arises as to the children. The question is whether the receipt of income should be limited to the age of sixteen or be for life. It is suggested that since the case of Blandford v. Blandford under section 35 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857, no child should take any benefit after the age of sixteen. It is pointed out that if that be the law a guilty husband is not bound to support his children after the age of sixteen, yet a guilty wife is bound to support them for life. It may be that the result of the two sections is to create an anomaly. I must assume Blandford v. Blandford to be good law, but looking at the two sections it does not follow that whatever construction is put upon section 35 that a similar construction must be put on section 45. Under section 35 the argument is that the charge for custody is limited to the age of sixteen because that is the limit of the common law liability, and that it must be understood from the words of the section that the charge for maintenance and education are limited to the same period, and, therefore, they are not to be taken as extending the common law liability. But there is nothing in section 45 pointing to any limitation, for inasmuch as property can under it be dealt with for the benefit of the husband during the whole of his life, so by analogy property may be dealt with for the benefit of the children during the whole of their life. The case of Bacon v. Bacon is directly in point, Seatel v. Seatel not so much so; the other cases deal more with the amount of the provision. The words of section 5 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1859, are almost the same as at the end of section 45 of the 1857 Act. The authority, therefore, of Bacon v. Bacon is sufficient to say there is no authority for limiting the provision to the age of sixteen. As to the amount of the provision, every case must stand on its own merits, but March v. March and Palumbo and Bacon v. Bacon do seem to me to warrant the amount given by the registrar in this case, and I see no reason for differing from his view. On the assumption that no allowance is made for debts, as to them I want to know how they were incurred, their amount, and when; till I have that information I cannot finally deal with the report. I refer it back to the registrar to make these inquiries and report to me, he will also inquire into all the costs.

March 7.—On further application by the parties the court withdrew the reference to the registrar to inquire as to debts, and approved of a draft arrangement agreed upon by the parties.

March 14.—The decree nisi for dissolution of the marriage was made absolute, whereupon the respondent, Mrs. Midwinter, executed the power of appointment and the settlement as approved on the 7th of March.

Court of Appeal.

From Prob.-Div. & Adm. Div. (Lord Esher, M.R., and Bowen and Kay, L.JJ.) — June 19.

"THE RECEPTA." (a.)

County court—Prohibition—Appeal—Refusal to grant writ of prohibition—Jurisdiction of Court of Appeal—Jurisdiction of judge of the Admiralty Division—County Courts Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 43), s. 132.

By section 132 of the County Courts Act, 1888, "When the High Court, or a judge thereof, shall have refused to grant a writ of certiorari or prohibition to a court, . . . no other court or judge shall grant such writ, but nothing herein shall affect the right of appealing from the decision of the judge of the High Court to the High Court itself."

Held, that this section only applied to proceedings in the High Court, and did not prevent an appeal to the Court of Appeal from the refusal of the High Court to grant a writ of prohibition to a county court.

A judge of the Admiralty Division has jurisdiction to grant a writ of prohibition; and, therefore, where a judge of that division, while sitting in chambers in vacation to hear applications from all divisions of the High Court, refused to grant a writ of prohibition to a county court in an admiralty cause, the court held that he was acting as a judge of the Admiralty Division, and that, therefore, upon his certifying that he did not desire to hear further argument in court, an appeal lay direct to the Court of Appeal, and not to a Divisional Court of the Queen's Bench Division.

Appeal from an order of Barnes, J., in chambers* refusing to grant a writ of prohibition to the City of London Court in an admiralty cause. It appeared that the application was made to the learned judge in vacation when he was sitting in chambers to hear applications from all divisions of the High Court. Two preliminary objections were taken on behalf of the respondents—first, that by section 132 of the County Courts Act, 1888, no appeal lay to the Court of Appeal from the refusal to grant a writ of prohibition; and, secondly, that the appeal ought to have been brought to a divisional court of the Queen's Bench Division.

By section 132 of 51 & 52 Vict. c. 43: "When the High Court, or a judge thereof, shall have refused to grant a writ of certiorari or prohibition to a court, or any such order as in the last preceding section mentioned, no other court or judge shall grant such writ or order; but nothing herein shall affect the right of appealing from the decision of the judge of the High Court to the High Court itself, or prevent a second application being made for such writ or order to the High Court, or a judge thereof, on grounds different from those on which the first application was founded."

Cranstoun, for the respondents.—No appeal lies to the Court of Appeal. By section 132 of the County Courts Act, 1888, when the "High Court" has refused to grant a writ of prohibition, "no other court" shall grant it. The "other court" must mean the Court of Appeal, as it is contrasted with the "High Court." Therefore, no appeal lies.

* It was assumed by the court that the learned judge had certified that he did not wish to hear further argument in court: see Rigg v. Hughes, 32 W. R. 355, 9 P. D. 68.

[(a.) Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Secondly, Barnes, J., when he refused the writ of prohibition, was acting as a judge of the Queen's Bench Division, and therefore the appeal should have been brought to a divisional court of the Queen's Bench Division. The old Admiralty Court had no power to issue a writ of prohibition. It was itself liable to be prohibited, and an inferior court could not have issued the writ. By section 34 of the Judicature Act, 1873, there is transferred to the Admiralty Division all matters within the exclusive cognizance of the Court of Admiralty. The power to grant writs of prohibition is not one of these matters. The practice in prohibition belongs to the Crown side of the Queen's Bench Division, and is a Crown office matter: Mulleneisen v. Coulson, 36 W. R. 811, 21 Q. B. D. 3.

Jones v. Slee, 34 W. R. 692, 32 Ch. D. 585, was also referred to.

Butler Aspinall, for the respondents.—The object of section 132 of the County Courts Act, 1888, was to put an end to the old practice of applicants going from one judge to another when the writ of prohibition had been refused. That was the sole object of the section, and it did not mean to interfere with the ordinary right of appeal given by section 19 of the Judicature Act, 1873. Secondly, sections 3, 5, and 16 of the Judicature Act, 1873, make the Court of Admiralty part of the High Court of Justice, and gives all the judges of the High Court equal power, authority, and jurisdiction. Therefore, Barnes, J., had jurisdiction, as judge of the Admiralty Division, to deal with the application for a writ of prohibition, and the appeal lies direct to the Court of Appeal: Rigg v. Hughes, 32 W. R. 355, 9 P. D. 68.

He also referred to sections 127 and 128 of the County Courts Act, 1888.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—The decision upon the first point taken, depends upon the true construction of section 132 of the County Courts Acts, 1888. When one calls to mind the former practice with regard to applications for writs of prohibition in the old courts, the object and intention of section 132 becomes plain. In old days a person might move for a writ of prohibition in each court successively, and I believe in the chancery courts also, and before each judge, and the Legislature wished to put an end to such an unnecessary multiplication of applications. The object of section 132 was to put an end to that practice. The different courts have now been merged into one court, and I therefore read that section to mean that if a person has applied for a writ of prohibition to a judge or a divisional court of the High Court, and it has been refused, he cannot then apply to another judge or another divisional court of the High Court. Taking that to be the meaning of the section it is clear that it does not interfere with the general right of appeal to this court given by section 19 of the Judicature Act, 1873. It might, however, have been said that the first part of section 132 did away with an appeal from the judge to the Divisional Court, and so the second part of the section was inserted. The whole section deals with the High Court alone, and does not touch the Court of Appeal.

With regard to the other objection, Barnes, J., was sitting as a judge of the High Court, and was exercising jurisdiction as a judge of all the divisions of the High Court. When a case involving admiralty jurisdiction came before him he naturally acted as a judge of the Admiralty Division. The Judicature Acts have given him as such judge all the powers of a judge of the High Court, and therefore the power to grant a writ of prohibition. The appeal from his decision therefore lies here, and this objection also fails.

BOWEN, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I shall take the second objection first. It is said that Barnes, J., when he heard this application, was sitting as a judge of the Queen's Bench Division, and not as a judge of the Admiralty Division; and that consequently the appeal does not lie here, but to a divisional court of the Queen's Bench Division. That contention is based on a misconception of the Judicature Act. The object of that Act was to prevent suitors being bandied about from one court to another, and so courts of common law were clothed with the powers of the Court of Chancery, and in the same way the Court of Chancery was clothed with the powers of courts of common law, and so also with other branches of the High Court. That was the object of the Judicature Acts, and accordingly it was held by Jessel, M.R., in Hedley v. Bates, 28 W. R. 365, 13 Ch. D. 498, that the Chancery Division had power to grant writs of prohibition; and in Jones v. Slee this court dealt with the matter as being within the jurisdiction of the Chancery Division. Why should we deal differently with the Admiralty Division, and drive this unhappy suitor to another court which knows less about the particular question in dispute than the Admiralty Court? It is said that the practice in prohibition cases is Crown practice, and that this shows that it is Queen's Bench Division business. That seems to me to be quite a mistake. In old days an application for a writ of prohibition might have been made in the Court of Common Pleas, and nothing shows better how old things have passed away and been forgotten than the present contention that the practice in prohibition is Crown practice. It is not Crown practice, and there is nothing inherent in the matter of writs of prohibition or in the practice which makes it Crown practice.

Then comes the other point, which seems to me a little more difficult—namely, whether there is any right of appeal to this court. We must assume that Barnes, J., did not desire the matter to be reargued before him in court, and so we must take it as if this appeal comes from his decision in open court. Whether an appeal lies depends upon the true construction of section 132 of the County Courts Act, 1888. I think that the true way to deal with the section is to apply to it the broad line of reasoning stated by the Master of the Rolls. The Judicature Act, 1873, by section 19, has given an appeal from any judgment or order of the High Court, and we must look and see if that general right of appeal has been taken away. The words of section 132 are not such as one could expect to find if an appeal were intended to be taken away. Under the old practice an applicant could go from one court to another in order to try and get a writ of prohibition. Every court in turn might be applied to. The Judicature Act merged all the courts into one court. When one reads the words in section 132, "no other court" shall grant such writ, one naturally asks what other court can be intended except the Court of Appeal? But I think that the inaptitude of the expression used by the Legislature cannot drive us to that conclusion. The Legislature was thinking of divisional courts of the High Court, and its intention was that where one division or divisional court refused to grant the writ no other division or divisional court should grant it, leaving an appeal to the Court of Appeal untouched. That seems to me to be the true meaning of the words. If the arm of this court is to be shortened, it must be done by some clearer words than these. I only desire to add that section 132 is apparently a mere re-enactment of section 44 of the County Courts Act, 1856, substituting the words "High Court" for "superior court" wherever they occur, and as in 1856 there was more than one superior court, what the Legislature must have meant by the words "no other court" becomes more apparent.

KAY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The effect of the Judicature Act was to alter the position of the Court of Admiralty by making it a superior court of co-ordinate authority with the other divisions of the High Court, and giving it the same powers and jurisdiction. It is clear, therefore, that the Admiralty Court, being a branch of the High Court, has jurisdiction to grant writs of prohibition. Admiralty jurisdiction to a limited extent has been conferred upon county courts, and the natural and proper division of the High Court to issue writs of prohibition to county courts in admiralty cases would be the Admiralty Division, though I do not in the least mean to say that other divisions would not have jurisdiction also in the matter. Therefore I think that Barnes, J., had power to deal with this application as a judge of the Admiralty Division, and the appeal, if there is one, lies here.

That brings me to the question whether there is any appeal at all. That depends upon section 132 of the County Courts Act, 1888. I agree with what has been said by my learned brothers that the meaning and purpose of the section is to prevent, when an application for a writ of prohibition has been refused by one division of the court or a judge of the court, another application being made to another division of the court or to another judge of the court. I admit that there is a difficulty in the wording of the section. The words "no other court," read in their largest sense, would include the Court of Appeal. But, notwithstanding that, I think it right to read the section in accordance with what must have been the intention of the framers of the Act, and in the case of Lister v. Wood, 37 W. R. 738, 23 Q. B. D. 229, I see that this court did entertain an appeal from a refusal of the Divisional Court to grant a prohibition. The appeal therefore lies.

Objection overruled.

ST. GOBAIN, CHANNY, AND CIREY CO. v. HOYERMANN'S AGENCY. (a.)

Practice—Writ—Service—"Person carrying on business within the jurisdiction in a name or style other than his own name"—Foreigner resident abroad—Service on manager at place of business within the jurisdiction—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 48a, r. 11.

The defendant was a foreigner residing and carrying on business abroad, but also "carrying on business within the jurisdiction in a name or style other than his own name."

Held, that, on the authority of Russell v. Cambefort, 37 W. R. 701, 23 Q. B. D. 526, ord. 48a, r. 11, did not apply to a foreigner resident abroad; and therefore the writ could not be served, under rule 3, on the defendant's manager at his place of business within the jurisdiction.

Appeal from an order of a divisional court setting aside service of a writ of summons.

The plaintiffs were a French firm carrying on business in Paris. The defendant was G. Hoyermann, a German, who carried on business as a manufacturer of chemicals in Hanover, where he resided. The defendant had an office in Mark-lane, in the City of London, where he carried on business through an agent named Wiskemann, who was authorized by him to enter into contracts for the sale of chemicals, and who managed his business for him in London. The defendant was the sole proprietor of his business, and the business in London was carried on under the name of Hoyermann's Agency.

The action was brought to recover damages for breach of a contract to manufacture and deliver to the plaintiffs 400 tons of sulphate of ammonia.

The writ was served on Wiskemann at the office in Mark-lane. On the application of the defendant a judge at chambers made an order setting aside service of the writ; and this order was affirmed by the Divisional Court (Wills and Charles, JJ.).

By ord. 48*a*, r. 1, "Any two or more persons claiming or being liable as co-partners and carrying on business within the jurisdiction may sue or be sued in the name of the respective firms, if any, of which such persons were co-partners at the time of the accruing of the cause of action."

By rule 3, "Where persons are sued as partners in the name of their firm under rule 1, the writ shall be served either upon any one or more of the partners or at the principal place, within the jurisdiction, of the business of the partnership upon any person having at the time of service the control or management of the partnership business there; and, subject to these rules, such service shall be deemed good service upon the firm so sued, whether any of the members thereof are out of the jurisdiction or not, and no leave to issue a writ against them shall be necessary."

By rule 11, "Any person carrying on business within the jurisdiction in a name or style other than his own name may be sued in such name or style as if it were a firm name; and, so far as the nature of the case will permit, all rules relating to proceedings against firms shall apply."

The plaintiffs appealed.

Vennell, for the plaintiffs.—The affidavits show that the defendant carries on business in England. He is therefore a person to whom rule 11 applies, and he can properly be sued in the name in which he carries on business within the jurisdiction, and if he is so sued, service of the writ may be effected in the way provided in rule 3, which is what was done in this case. Rule 11 applies to a foreigner as well as to a British subject, if he carries on business within the jurisdiction, and does so in a name or style other than his own name. Rules 1 and 11 are intended to apply to all persons, whether subjects or foreigners, who carry on their business in England and so enjoy for their business the protection of the English law. In Russell v. Cambefort, 37 W. R. 701, 23 Q. B. D. 526, it was held that ord. 9, r. 6, which is now superseded by ord. 48*a*, r. 3, did not apply to the case of a foreign firm carrying on business in this country the members of which were foreigners resident abroad. In Grant v. Anderson, [1892] 1 Q. B. 108, 40 W. R. Dig. 190, the Divisional Court held that the decision in Russell v. Cambefort applied to the new rules; but the Court of appeal expressly left that question open. The new rules show an intention to do away with the decision in Russell v. Cambefort. The rule which is now superseded by ord. 48*a*, r. 1, was ord. 16, r. 14, which did not contain the words "and carrying on business within the jurisdiction." The object of introducing those words in ord. 48*a*, r. 1, was to make the new rule applicable to all persons, whether foreigners or not, who carry on business in partnership within the jurisdiction. The words, occurring as they do in rule

(a.) Reported by F. G. RUCKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

1, must be taken to govern the whole order; and rule 3 contains words which clearly show the same intention. Rule 11 must, therefore, be held to be applicable to every individual, whether a foreigner or not, who carries on business within the jurisdiction in a name or style other than his own name. The result is that O'Neil v. Clason, 46 L. J. Q. B. 191, 25 W. R. Dig. 208, is still law. See also Shepherd v. Hirsch, 38 W. R. 745, 45 Ch. D. 231; Pollexfen v. Sibson, 34 W. R. 534, 16 Q. B. D. 792; and Haggin v. Comptoir D'Escompte de Paris, 37 W. R. 703, 23 Q. B. D. 519.

Scrutton, for the defendant.—It may be admitted that the defendant, in a sense, carries on business in England. But he resides in Hanover, and is the owner of a manufactory there. It cannot be suggested that if he carried on the English part of his business in his own name he could be sued here, except by leave under order 11; and the plaintiff has, in fact, tried to get leave under that order, and has failed. But it is suggested that if he puts "& Co." after his name he can be sued here under ord. 48*a*, r. 11, and served under rule 3. Rule 3 is a reproduction of ord. 9, r. 6, with the additional provision that service under the rule shall be deemed good service upon the firm, "whether any of the members thereof are out of the jurisdiction or not." The object of introducing these words was to get rid of the decision of Indigo Co. v. Ogilvy, 39 W. R. 646, [1891] 2 Ch. 31. But there was no intention in framing the new rules to do away with the principle laid down in Russell v. Cambefort. In accordance with that principle the present case cannot be within rule 11, because that rule makes no reference to foreigners. Russell v. Cambefort has been followed in Western National Bank of City of New York v. Perez, Triana, & Co. 39 W. R. 245, [1891] 1 Q. B. 304, and Heinemann v. Hale, 39 W. R. 485, [1891] 2 Q. B. 83.

Lord ESHER, M.R,—In this case I think it is clearly made out that the defendant carries on business in England. He is a manufacturer of chemicals in Germany, but he manufactures chemicals for the purpose of selling them, and the selling of them is his business. He has an office in England where contracts for the sale of the chemicals are made, and he has an agent at that office who makes such contracts on his behalf, having a general authority from him to accept orders without reference to him in each case. He therefore carries on business, perhaps the best part of his business, in England.

This action is brought against him in respect of a contract made by him in the course of that business, which he carries on under the name of Hoyermann's Agency. And the defendant being the only owner of that business, and being a foreigner resident abroad, and not domiciled in England, the action is brought against him, not in his own name, but in the name in which he carries on business in England. If he were an English subject, no doubt this could be done, for he would be within ord. 48*a*, r. 11. But if he were an English subject he would not be within rule 1; for he is not a co-partnership, neither is he one of two or more persons carrying on business together. It is clear that he is not within rule 1 at all. If he is within any of the rules of this order he must be within rule 11.

The question is whether he is within rule 11. That rule applies to "any person carrying on business within the jurisdiction in a name or style other than his own name." The words in themselves are large enough to include a foreigner living abroad who has never been in England at all, but is merely carrying on business by his agents in England. But ought the court so to construe the rule as to include such a person? If the rule had expressly included foreigners the court would have been bound to give effect to it. But where the Legislature uses words which are capable of either including foreigners or being limited to English subjects, in my opinion we ought to adopt that construction which will avoid the result of our legislation disregarding principles of international law.

That is the rule which was laid down in Russell v. Cambefort, which was a decision on ord. 9, r. 6, which is now superseded by ord. 48*a*, r. 3. There Cotton, L.J., laid down the canon of construction to be followed. He said: "No doubt the rule in question is made under the authority of an Act of Parliament, and that has been relied on as giving it as great an effect as an Act of Parliament; but although an Act of Parliament can give jurisdiction to the court against British subjects, as to foreigners Parliament has not, and does not assume to have, jurisdiction against those who are residing abroad, and have not submitted to the jurisdiction of the English courts. . . . Looking at it in that view, I do not think the rule applies to firms consisting of foreigners who have in no way become subject to the English Parliament. . . . It may be that the defendants can be served under order 11, but on that I give no opinion. What I say is that they cannot be served under ord. 9, r. 6, and that they cannot be served as within the jurisdiction. . . . In my opinion we ought not to construe the rule so as to bring within the jurisdiction persons who neither by nationality nor by residence are capable of being made subject to the jurisdiction." That decision seems to me necessarily to involve this, that supposing the case of a single foreigner resident abroad, and supposing such a rule as that which we now have to construe—viz., rule 11 of order 48*a*—such a rule would not apply to such a foreigner, though he carried on business within the jurisdiction under a name other than his own name. That decision overruled two cases—viz., O'Neil v. Clason and Pollexfen v. Sibson—and it has itself never been overruled, but has been recognized in Western National Bank of City of New York v. Perez, Triana, & Co., and also, since the coming into operation of the new rules, by the Divisional Court in Grant v. Anderson.

Then it is said that new words have been introduced in rule 1 which did not occur in ord. 16, r. 14—viz., "carrying on business within the jurisdiction"; and it is suggested that the object of the alteration is to include any co-partners, whether foreigners or British subjects, provided they carry on business within the jurisdiction. And the argument is that the rules of this order ought to be so construed as to make a similar extension in the case dealt with by rule 11—viz., the case of a person trading alone. In my opinion, the alteration in rule 1 has no effect on the application of Russell v. Cambefort to rule 11. We need not give any opinion, on rule 1, as to a firm of two or more foreigners carrying on business in England. We decide that where there is one person, a foreigner resident abroad, but carrying on business in England under a firm name, such a case is not within rule 11.

It was suggested that, looking at rule 1 as part of a scheme for getting at the business assets of a firm, the object of the introduction of the new words was to enable a plaintiff who had obtained judgment against a foreign firm to levy execution against the partnership assets in England though he could not touch the personal estates of the partners. But such a suggestion cannot be applicable to rule 11; the latter words of the section could not have any such effect. In fact, if the construction which we are asked to put upon these rules were to prevail, the result would be that a foreigner carrying on business in England by himself would be more hardly dealt with than a foreign firm of several partners so carrying on business; for the foreign firm could only be made liable to the extent of their partnership assets, whereas, in the case of the single foreigner, there would be no similar limit to his liability. This case is not within rule 11 or rule 3, and the defendant cannot be served with the writ or brought within the jurisdiction of the English court.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—The question is whether this case is within ord. 48*a*, r. 11. It is said that under order 48*a* a new jurisdiction is given over foreigners. We are not called upon to decide whether a foreign firm of more than one partner can be brought into the English court under the rules of this order, though I think that they could not. This is the case of a foreigner carrying on business by himself. Ord. 9, r. 7, was the old rule dealing with the case of a single person carrying on business under a firm name, and that rule is now replaced by rules 11 and 3 of order 48*a*. That old rule was in force when Russell v. Camberfort was decided, and it is clear from that decision that that rule would not apply to a foreigner: see further the judgment of Bowen, L.J., in Western National Bank of City of New York v. Perez, Triana, & Co. I think that that settles this case.

It is said that since then, an alteration has been made by adding the words "and carrying on business within the jurisdiction" to rule 1, and that so the decision in Russell v. Cambefort has been done away with. I do not think so. The reason for the change seems to me to be obvious. An alteration was made in rule 3, and it was necessary to make a corresponding alteration in rule 1. But that alteration cannot affect rule 11. I am therefore of opinion that the appeal must be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

From Q. B. Div. (Lord Esher, M.R., and Lopes and A. L. Smith, L.JJ.) — April 13, 14, 17.

TEMPERTON v. RUSSELL. (a.)

Conspiracy—Trade union—Procuring breach of contract—Contract in way of trade—Intention to injure plaintiff—Malice—Combination to induce persons not to contract with plaintiff—Damage.

The plaintiff, who was a mason and builder, refused to conform to certain rules laid down by three trade unions connected with the building trade. The defendants, who were members of a joint committee of the three trade unions, with the intention of injuring the plaintiff, and so forcing him to conform to the said rules, induced and procured certain persons, who had, as the defendants knew, entered into contracts with him in the way of trade, to break those contracts, in consequence whereof the plaintiff sustained damage. The defendants also, with the like intention, conspired to induce, and did induce, certain persons not to enter into contracts with the plaintiff, in consequence whereof the plaintiff's business fell off.

Held, that the plaintiff was entitled to maintain an action against the defendants, both for the procuring breaches of contract and also for the conspiracy to induce persons not to enter into contracts with the plaintiff.

(a.) Reported by F. G. RUCKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Application by the defendants for a new trial or judgment.

The plaintiff, Joseph Temperton, was a mason and builder carrying on business at Hull; the defendants were members and officers of the Hull branches of certain associations of workmen—viz., the Operative Bricklayers' Society, the Bricklayers' Labourers' Society, and the Operative Plasterers' Society, and of a joint committee thereof.

The plaintiff complained that the defendants maliciously and wrongfully, and with intent to injure the plaintiff, procured and induced certain persons who had entered into contracts with the plaintiff to break such contracts; and that the defendants maliciously and wrongfully, and with intent to injure the plaintiff, intimidated and coerced the said persons to break their said contracts with the plaintiff, and not to enter into new contracts with the plaintiff; and that the defendants unlawfully and maliciously conspired to do the acts aforesaid.

The plaintiff claimed damages and an injunction.

At the trial of the action, which took place before Collins, J., with a jury, the following facts were proved:—

There were in Hull three trade unions consisting of persons employed in the three branches of labour connected with the building trade—viz., the Operative Bricklayers' Society, the Bricklayers' Labourers' Society, and the Operative Plasterers' Society. There was also a joint committee consisting of representatives of these three trade unions. A set of rules was drawn up by these three unions, to which some of the master builders in Hull signified their assent.

Rule 9 was as follows:—"That no member of the Operative Bricklayers' Society shall be permitted under any circumstances to contract for or take by measurement, either in the whole or part, any kind of brickwork, brick pointing, or plastering that may have been contracted for or sub-contracted for under the original contract, nor to take any work of any master builder who is building property for himself; and that no member of this society shall be allowed to work on such jobs. That no member of these societies be allowed to work on any job where labour alone is contracted for."

The plaintiff was in the habit of supplying building materials to Messrs. Myers & Temperton, who were master builders, carrying on business at Hull, and one of whom was the plaintiff's brother. Myers & Temperton conducted their business in a way which was not in accordance with the rules of the unions. On the 6th of September, 1892, the joint committee passed the following resolution:—"That this committee advises the three societies to abstain from using any lime supplied by merchants who are supplying any builders that are working contrary to joint working rule No. 9. And, further, that they refrain from handling or fixing any artificial stonework made by any man who is working contrary to rule 9."

On the 20th of August, 1892, the plaintiff had entered into a contract with one Brentano, a builder, to supply him with certain building materials—viz., concrete heads and sills for fifteen houses. On the 11th of September Brentano, in accordance with a summons, appeared before the joint committee, when he was informed by the defendant Russell that the committee would not allow the men belonging to the unions to fix goods supplied by the plaintiff.

On the 12th of September the committee of the Operative Bricklayers' Society passed the following resolution: "That all the members of the society refuse to use any material that may have been supplied by any builder who is not conforming to rule 9, and that any member using or handling any material, either lime, bricks, or artificial stone will be dealt with by the society in accordance with rule 9." At the same meeting Russell was appointed to act as delegate during the dispute re Myers & Temperton. On the 19th of September Brentano again appeared before the joint committee and answered questions which were put to him with regard to his contract with the plaintiff. He stated that he would not want any of the heads or sills which the plaintiff had contracted to supply him with for a fortnight, and promised not to use any of them until notified by the committee. Subsequently Russell made arrangements with one Goode to supply Brentano with the materials which he required. Brentano thereupon refused to perform his contract with the plaintiff. Evidence was also given with regard to similar cases, in which the plaintiff had entered into contracts with other persons for the supply of building materials, among them being one Gibson, who stated that Russell had told him that the committee meant to bring the plaintiff to his knees before they had done with him, and that he would do no good till he had made his peace with them. The plaintiff gave evidence to show that he had sustained damage through the breaches of contract by Brentano and the others, and that his business had fallen off in consequence of the defendants' conduct.

The learned judge left two questions to the jury, which with the answers were as follows:—(1) Did the defendants, or any of them, maliciously induce the persons named or any of them to break their contracts with the plaintiff? Yes, all the defendants did so. (2) Did the defendants, or any two or more of them, maliciously conspire to induce the persons named and others not to enter into contracts with the plaintiff, and were such persons thereby induced not to make such contracts? Yes, all the defendants did so conspire. The jury gave the plaintiff £50 damages on the first count, and £200 damages on the second count. The learned judge gave judgment for the plaintiff for £250 and costs, and also granted an injunction to restrain the defendants from endeavouring to induce anybody to break contracts with the plaintiff or endeavouring to prevent persons entering into contracts with the plaintiff.

The defendants moved for judgment or a new trial. The grounds of motion were that there was no evidence against the defendants of any facts constituting a cause of action against them, that the learned judge misdirected the jury, and that the verdict was against the weight of evidence.

Tindal Atkinson, Q.C., Robson, Q.C., T. W. Chitty, and H. T. Kemp (F. G. Newbolt with them), for the defendants.—There is no evidence that the breaches of contract on the part of Brentano and the others were in consequence of anything said or done by the defendants. The natural inference is that they were in consequence of the determination of the members of the unions not to work on the plaintiff's materials. The members were quite within their legal rights in coming to this determination. Russell merely communicated to Brentano and the others the intention of the workmen to do what they were entitled to do. There is no evidence that the defendants acted maliciously, so as to come within the principle laid down in Lumley v. Gye, 1 W. R. 432, 2 E. & B. 216, and Bowen v. Hall, 29 W. R. 367, 6 Q. B. D. 333. Moreover, that principle only applies to contracts for personal services. As to the second part of the case, there is no authority which shows that an action lies for conspiring to induce persons not to enter into contracts with another.

Lawson Walton, Q.C., and Montague Lush, for the plaintiff.—There was abundant evidence to justify the finding of the jury that the defendants procured Brentano and the others to break their contracts. And inasmuch as they did this with the object of injuring the plaintiff in his business, they did it maliciously within the rule laid down in Lumley v. Gye and Bowen v. Hall. In Bowen v. Hall the court extended the principle, holding that it was not confined to cases of master and servant or cases of personal service. The judgments of the House of Lords in Mogul Steamship Co. v. McGregor, Gow, & Co., 40 W. R. 337, [1892] A. C. 25, seem to imply that in that case the action would have been maintainable if the defendants had procured breaches of contract. As to the second question, it is actionable to conspire to induce persons not to enter into contracts with another if actual damage results therefrom: Gregory v. Duke of Brunswick, 6 M. & G. 953; Mogul Steamship Co. v. McGregor, Gow, & Co.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—I propose first to state the facts of the case according to the evidence, and then to consider the law applicable to those facts. The first thing that happened was the formation of certain trade unions in the building trade at Hull. Three unions were formed in the three trades which make up the building trade. A trade union means an agreement between a number of persons to become members of a society on certain terms. The members agree to subscribe certain moneys, in return for which they may receive certain benefits, and in consideration of each so agreeing with the others they all agree to subject themselves to certain liabilities. Every member who so enters into the agreement in the hope of partaking of the benefits of the society undertakes to comply with certain conditions; and the main condition is that each individual member, when called upon to do certain things by those in authority, shall obey, and that, if he refuses to obey, he shall forfeit all claim to those benefits. This probably is a description of all trade unions; at any rate, the evidence in this case shows it to be a description of these unions.

These three unions came to the conclusion that it would be for the benefit of the building trade that a certain course of business should be adopted by all persons connected with the building trade in Hull; and, in order to enforce conformity with this policy, they formed a joint committee, who were to act on behalf of the unions and every member of the unions, and were to have authority to determine with regard to the trade how individual members should act. The joint committee had power to delegate their authority to one or more individuals; and in the present instance they delegated it to Russell. Russell became the delegate of the committee, and so the agent of each of the unions, and in a sense the agent of each individual member. He was the person whose business it was to direct the workmen to do or not to do certain things. Now, there having arisen a system of building in Hull which the committee thought inconvenient and contrary to their policy, they drew up a set of rules to meet the difficulty, including rule 9. They had a perfect right to do this so as to bind their own members, they had a right to insist on obedience to their rules from their members, but they had no right to impose on other persons outside the unions obedience to such rules. The firm of Myers & Temperton were a firm of builders in Hull, who had, of course, a right quite independently of the unions of carrying on their business as they pleased, and they carried on their business in a way which was not in conformity with the rules of the joint committee. The committee resolved to coerce Myers & Temperton into complying with their rules; they attempted to induce them to do so, but failed, as Myers & Temperton refused to alter their course of business. The committee then thought they could coerce Myers & Temperton in an indirect way by coercing persons who dealt with them, and who supplied them with the means of carrying on their business. They tried to induce the plaintiff, Joseph Temperton, who was in the habit of doing business with his brother's firm, not to have any further dealings with them. The plaintiff replied as Myers & Temperton had done, refusing to accede to the committee's proposals. They thereupon determined to coerce him into ceasing to do business with his brother's firm by giving him to understand that if any persons connected with the building trade in Hull dealt with him for materials the members of the unions would refuse to work for such persons on any goods supplied by him. The effect of this would be that the plaintiff's business would come to an end. Accordingly they passed a resolution affecting the plaintiff, and began to act upon Brentano and Gibson and other persons who had dealings with the plaintiff. Russell and the committee knew that Brentano had entered into contracts with the plaintiff, and would enter into further contracts with him; and, knowing this, Russell communicated the resolution to Brentano, and let him know that if he went on dealing with the plaintiff harm would come to him in his business, because no workman who was a member of the unions would touch materials supplied by the plaintiff. The object of this was not to hurt Brentano, but to injure the plaintiff in his business so as to force him to comply with the union rules. It is argued that this did not amount to an order to the workmen, but was only a piece of advice or a notice, and that they might do as they liked. That is not the truth. It was an order, an order which the workmen were bound by their undertaking to obey; and they knew that if they did not obey it they would be expelled from the union. It was an order to these workmen that, if Brentano took any goods from the plaintiff, they were to cease working for Brentano. The meaning was that if Brentano carried out his contracts with the plaintiff, or made any further contracts with him, the plaintiff's business would be destroyed and Brentano's also. The intention was to injure the plaintiff in his business and so force him to obey the unions. There is evidence that all the defendants authorized what was done by Russell. The case with regard to Gibson is the same. In each case the defendants acted with the intention of injuring the plaintiff in his trade, and so compelling him to act in accordance with their policy, which they had no right to force upon him.

As to the law applicable to these facts, Bowen v. Hall does away with the notion that there is any difference between the case of master and servant and other cases. There the majority of the Court of Appeal agreed with the majority of the court in Lumley v. Gye. We tried to state the rule of law, and we said that though merely to persuade a person to break his contract may not be wrongful in law or act, yet "if the persuasion be used for the indirect purpose of injuring the plaintiff, or of benefiting the defendant at the expense of the plaintiff, it is a malicious act which is in law and in fact a wrong act, and therefore a wrongful act, and therefore an actionable act if injury ensues from it. We think that it cannot be doubted that a malicious act such as is above described is a wrongful act in law and in fact. The act complained of in such a case as Lumley v. Gye, and which is complained of in the present case, is, therefore, because malicious, wrongful. That act is a persuasion by the defendant of a third person to break a contract existing between such third person and the plaintiff. It cannot be maintained that it is not a natural and probable consequence of that act of persuasion that the third person will break his contract. It is not only the natural and probable consequence, but by the terms of the proposition which involves the success of the persuasion it is the actual consequence." That proposition is quite applicable to this case, where people have been forced, not by violence, but by means of the conditions under which they carry on their business, to break their contracts.

Is there, as has been argued on behalf of the defendants, a difference between the case of forcing a person to break an existing contract and the case of forcing a person not to enter into a contract? I can see no difference. Practically it comes to this: You have a contract with A. B., and to-morrow you are going to enter into another contract with him; if you carry out the one I will destroy your business, and if you enter into another I will do the same. In each case there is the same wrongful intent, and the same effect of doing injury. Is there any authority for drawing a distinction between the two cases? I think that Gregory v. Duke of Brunswick is an authority the other way. That case shows that where persons combine to do an act so as to injure another an action may lie, though it would not be so if the act were done by one person. In Mogul Steamship Co. v. McGregor, Gow, & Co. the House of Lords did not draw any distinction such as that suggested on behalf of the defendants. The judgments in that case seem to show that such a combination, if followed by injury to the plaintiff, is actionable. Lord Bramwell seems to recognize the doctrine that if there is an agreement amounting to a conspiracy to do that which is unlawful, and that conspiracy causes injury to the plaintiff, an action will lie in respect of such conspiracy. And that doctrine appears to me to be equally applicable to the case of persuading persons to break contracts already made with the plaintiff, and to the case of inducing persons not to enter into further contracts with the plaintiff in the future. I am of opinion that in this case there was evidence on which the jury might find that people were prevented from making contracts with the plaintiff by the pressure which was exercised by the defendants, and that the plaintiff's business had fallen off. And the natural inference for the jury to draw was that that pressure was the cause of the falling off of the plaintiff's business. There was, therefore, evidence to go to the jury on both counts, and the jury clearly meant to find in the plaintiff's favour on both counts. I think that there was no misdirection on the part of the learned judge, and that this application must be refused.

LOPES, L.J.—In Bowen v. Hall the broad principle is laid down that if a man induces one of two parties to a contract to break that contract, with the intent to injure the other party or to do himself a benefit, he thereby commits an actionable wrong. In this case the jury, in answer to the first question put to them, found that the defendants did maliciously induce persons who had entered into contracts with the plaintiff to break those contracts. I think there was abundant evidence to support that finding. The second question in the case is as to inducing persons not to enter into new contracts with the plaintiff. The jury were asked whether the defendants maliciously conspired to induce persons not to enter into contracts with the plaintiff, and whether such persons were thereby induced not to enter into such contracts; and they answered in the affirmative. Does that answer amount to a finding of an actionable wrong? I think that it does. The law appears to me to be that a combination by two or more persons to induce others not to deal with a particular individual or enter into contracts with him, if it is done with an intent to injure that individual, and if he is thereby injured, is an actionable wrong. In my opinion there was sufficient evidence in this case to support the second finding of the jury. I therefore think that the verdict must stand, and that this application must be dismissed.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—The plaintiff in this case is a master mason and builder at Hull, who in the course of his business supplies building materials by contract to other persons. He sues the defendants, who are members of a joint committee of the Operative Bricklayers', of the Operative Plasterers', and of the Operative Labourers' societies in that town, firstly, for having unlawfully and maliciously procured certain persons to break their contracts with him; and, secondly, for having maliciously conspired to induce certain persons not to enter into contracts with him, by reason of which acts he was damnified. The jury have found against the defendants upon each of those alleged causes of action, and have awarded £50 damages upon the first and £200 damages upon the second. A motion has been made to us to set aside the verdict, and to enter it for the defendants, upon the ground that there was no evidence to fix any of the defendants with liability for the acts complained of, and that the learned judge at the trial misdirected the jury in point of law. The question he left to the jury as to the first alleged cause of action was, whether the defendants or any of them maliciously induced the persons named to break their contracts with the plaintiff; and he fully explained what was the meaning of the word "maliciously" in this question. He said, "Now, in my judgment, it is perfectly clear law that to induce a person who has made a contract with another to break that contract, in order to hurt the person with whom it has been made, to hamper him in his trade, or to put undue pressure upon him, or to procure some indirect advantage for the person himself—to induce another to break a contract for any of those motives—is in point of law to do it maliciously; therefore, if in this particular case you are of opinion that the plaintiff has satisfied you that any one of the defendants had induced—I will take one particular instance—Brentano, because he comes first, to break his contract with the plaintiff, of the existence of which he was aware, in order to hurt the plaintiff in his trade, . . . and, if his object in doing that was, by hurting him in his trade, to compel him to do something which he did not want to do, . . . that would be 'maliciously' in point of law, and a cause of action would be established." Nothing could be clearer than this direction, and that it is correct in point of law will be seen upon examining the opinion delivered by Crompton, Wightman, and Erle, JJ., in Lumley v. Gye, and the judgment of this court (Lord Selborne, L.C., and Brett, L.J., Lord Coleridge, C.J., dissenting) in Bowen v. Hall.

It is not necessary, in my opinion, in this case to decide the point whether this cause of action will apply if there is no contract in existence, and I reserve that point for decision hereafter.

But it is said that there was no evidence to support the cause of action in the present case. Now, evidence was given in support of the following facts. [The Lord Justice here stated the effect of the material portions of the evidence in detail, so far as it bore upon the dealings of the defendants with Brentano, and then proceeded as follows:—] It was argued for the defendants that the above constituted no evidence that the defendants (who were all members of the joint committee of the three societies, which Russell admitted he represented) had, with knowledge of the existence of any contract, and with the intention of injuring the plaintiff and of crippling him in his trade, induced Brentano to break his contract with him; and it was said that all that the defendants had done was what was done in every strike, i.e., call out the men, and that this was legal. If this had been all, I should have agreed, for it cannot be doubted that, at any rate since the passing of 38 & 39 Vict. c. 86, in 1875, if not from 1871, strikes per se, subject to the exceptions mentioned in sections 4 and 5 of that Act, are legal.

It was argued that, if the defendants were to be held liable in damages in this case, no trade union could hereafter call out their men, for it might be held that by so doing they were inducing the breach of a contract to the injury of one of the contracting parties, if there happened to be one. I do not agree that a strike is analogous to the present case; for, to maintain the cause of action sued on, there must be evidence that the defendant, with knowledge of the existence of a contract, had induced and succeeded in inducing one of the contracting parties to break his contract to the injury of the other contracting party, and there must also be evidence that the intention of the inducer was, by such breach, to do harm to the other contracting party, or, to use Lord Hannen's words in Mogul Steamship Co. v. McGregor, Gow, & Co., that the "real object was to injure the individual." The present is a very different case to that suggested, viz., the merely calling out men on strike, though it does appear to me that, if a strike were used for the purpose and with the intent above mentioned, an action would lie.

In my judgment there is evidence in this case: (1) That the defendants intended to coerce the builders, Myers & Temperton, to obey their edicts; and, to bring this about, they determined to cut off from them the supply of all materials they might require for their trade, and also the supply of men. (2) That, inasmuch as the plaintiff would not fall in with their commands, the defendants then determined to cripple and injure him in his trade by inducing Brentano (together with others who were under contract with the plaintiff) to break the contract which they well knew he had with the plaintiff, so that by those means he might be coerced into obedience. It will be remembered that the defendants Russell and Stephenson in their answer to interrogatories stated that the plaintiff had broken no rules. (3) That the defendants did induce Brentano to break his contract to the loss and injury of the plaintiff. It was, however, insisted that there was no evidence that the defendants knew that Brentano was under contract with the plaintiff; but I do not think that this can be maintained, having regard to the facts that, at the meeting of the joint committee on or about the 11th of September, 1892, the defendant Russell introduced Brentano to the meeting as having a contract with the plaintiff, that the minutes of the meeting of the 19th of September state that Brentano attended to give evidence with regard to a contract made between himself and the plaintiff, and that the defendant Russell in his letter to Goode stated that Brentano had signed a contract with a firm who were in dispute with the building trade—i.e., the plaintiff—and gave the Bricklayers' Society's guarantee to Goode, who was the person they had found to supply materials to Brentano in the place of the plaintiff under his contract with him, Brentano having been induced, or rather forced, to break his contract with the plaintiff. As before pointed out, there was ample evidence that Russell was deputed by the defendants to carry out, if he could, their common intent. In my judgment, not only was there good evidence against the defendants upon this case of Brentano, but I go further, and say that, if the jury had found for the defendants upon this, they would have been wrong. I do not propose to discuss the evidence at length as to the other contractors, who, the jury have found, had been induced to break their contracts with the plaintiff by the action of the defendants; I will only call attention to the evidence of Gibson, whose contract with the plaintiff, it will be noticed, was produced at the meeting of the 19th of September, at which all the defendants were present. He stated that, at the interview which he had with Russell, the latter said that they meant to bring Temperton to his knees before they had done with him, and he would do no good till he had made his peace with them. This expression was very significant as to what the real intentions of the defendants were towards the plaintiff. Upon the first cause of action, in my judgment it is impossible to hold that there was not evidence to support the verdict of the jury.

As regards the second cause of action—i.e., the count for conspiracy—I agree with what has been said by the other members of the court. I think that the direction of the learned judge on that head was correct, as being in accordance with what was said in Bowen v. Hall and Mogul Steamship Co. v. McGregor, Gow, & Co., and that there was evidence to support the verdict of the jury.

ROBSON v. EDWARDES. (a.)

Light—Ancient lights—Prescription Act (2 & 3 Will. 4, c. 71), s. 3—Landlord and tenant—Same landlord—Adjoining tenements.

Plaintiff, having obtained the assignment of a twenty-one years' lease, which had been granted in 1862, of certain houses, just before its expiration, in 1882, agreed with his landlord for a further lease of twelve years, under which he was in possession, no formal lease having been executed. In 1887 the same landlord granted a lease of adjoining premises, which was assigned to the defendant. On motion to restrain interference by the defendant with the plaintiff's lights,

Held, that the fact that the plaintiff's houses had not been continuously occupied by the same tenant was immaterial, and that an absolute and indefeasible right to light had attached to the houses in 1882 by virtue of the Prescription Act, s. 3.

Held also that the fact that the plaintiff was in possession under agreement only, was not material.

In 1862 the plaintiff's father became lessee of certain houses for a term of twenty-one years expiring at Christmas, 1882. In 1880 the plaintiff succeeded his father in possession of the property and the lease was assigned to him. A few days before the expiration of his tenancy plaintiff entered into a written agreement with his landlord for a renewal of the lease for a further term of twelve years expiring in 1894, under which agreement he was still in possession, no formal lease having been prepared. In 1887 the same landlord granted a lease of property opposite to the plaintiff's houses, which in 1891 was assigned to the defendant. Defendant was now building on the said property. This was a motion in the action to restrain the defendant from building in such a manner as to interfere with the light of certain of the plaintiff's windows.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and Bethell, for the plaintiff, relied on section 3 of the Prescription Act, and cited Frewen v. Philipps, 9 W. R. 786, 11 C. B. N. S. 449, and Mitchell v. Cantrill, 36 W. R. 229, 37 Ch. D. 56.

S. Hall, Q.C., and Cave, for the defendant.—The plaintiff could not during his original lease acquire a prescriptive right as against his landlord in respect of the reversion on which his agreement for a further lease was founded. The landlord could not derogate from his grant and interfere with the defendant's holdings, and neither can the plaintiff, his tenant. [They cited Coutts v. Gorham, 1 Moody & Malk. 396; Booth v. Alcock, 21 W. R. 743, L. R. 8 Ch. App. 663; Gayford v. Moffatt, L. R. 4 Ch. App. 133, 17 W. R. Dig. 42.] The defendant is in possession of the legal estate in his lease as a purchaser for value without notice of any easement claimed by the plaintiff, whose right, as it rests on agreement only, is merely equitable.

They cited Allen v. Seckham, 11 Ch. D. 790, 27 W. R. Dig. 118.

NORTH, J., in stating the facts above set out, said that with regard to the plaintiff's tenancy the parties had allowed it to rest in agreement. No actual lease had been prepared, but the rent had been paid upon the footing of the agreement, and the mere fact that a formal parchment deed had not taken the place of the agreement for a lease was, in his opinion, immaterial, and continued:—The question is, What are the legal rights of these parties? Assuming there was no legal right, either actual or inchoate in 1862—because that is the point at which I must begin, as I cannot fix any definite time earlier at which these houses were existing—assuming that there was no right to light in 1862, at any rate when the plaintiff's father went into occupation, a right by statute to have the light coming to these houses over the adjoining lands began to run, and at the end of twenty years from that time that right became absolute and indefeasible under the 3rd section of the Prescription Act. The fact that the premises have not been in the occupation of the same person all along is clearly immaterial. It does not matter what the number of tenants may have been, because the Act says when the access and use of light to and for any dwelling-house, workshop, or other building shall have been actually enjoyed throughout for the full period of twenty years without interruption the right thereto shall be deemed absolute and indefeasible unless it shall appear that the same was enjoyed by some consent or agreement expressly made or given for that purpose by deed or writing. There is no evidence whatever in this case of anything which brings it within the exception. There is no evidence that it was enjoyed by any consent or by any agreement either expressly or otherwise, made relating to it by deed or writing. Therefore the right at the end of twenty years became absolute and indefeasible. The lease granted in 1862 expired on the 25th of December, 1882. At that time, therefore, when that lease expired the twenty years had run, and the right had become absolute and indefeasible to that house as it was then occupied by the plaintiff. What difference does it make that, that lease coming to an end, the ground landlord renewed the lease or agreed to renew the lease to the same tenant? In my opinion it does not make any difference. The contention is that it put an end to the right to light acquired by the twenty years which had expired before Christmas, 1882, and it is said that because that lease ended and a new one was granted no time had run and you must begin to count the twenty years afresh. In my opinion, that is not the law. When twenty years had run the right was acquired absolute and indefeasible in respect of the access of light to that house; and when the house was leased afterwards the right given by law passed with it, not by reason of the lease, though no doubt the person who became tenant went in under the lease, but he did not get the grant to the light by the lease in any sense. He got the house by the lease, and the law gave the tenant, the occupier of the house, the right to the enjoyment of that light at that time.

Then it is said that by reason of the lease of 1887 to the defendant or to the defendant's predecessor something was done which interfered with that. I cannot follow that in the least, because I cannot see how the making of the lease in 1887 could have any effect upon a prior demise by the same landlord as far back as the year 1882, for, as I have said, the agreement to lease, coupled with the possession and the payment of rent under it, come to exactly the same thing as if a formal parchment lease had actually been signed.

The plaintiff, therefore, is, in my opinion, clearly right on the question of law. [His lordship then said that on the evidence the plaintiff was entitled to an injunction, but, on the defendant's undertaking to abide by any order the court might make at the trial as to pulling down, dismissed the motion.]

In re OCEAN QUEEN STEAMSHIP CO. (a.)

Company — Reduction of capital—Jurisdiction — Confirmation of reduction—Companies Act, 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 131), ss. 9, 11, 12—Companies (Winding-up) Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 63), ss. 1, 2, 32 (sub-section (2)), 33—Order of the Lord Chancellor, March 26, 1892.

The judge to whom the jurisdiction of the High Court in the winding up of companies has been assigned by the order of the Lord Chancellor of the 26th of March, 1892, has jurisdiction to confirm a reduction of the capital in the case of a company which may be wound up in the High Court under the Companies (Winding-up) Act, 1890.

The above-named company was incorporated in 1887 under the Companies Acts, 1862 to 1886, as a company limited by shares. By a special resolution confirmed on the 3rd of May, 1893, it was resolved that the capital of the company should be reduced from £25,000 to £8,000, divided into 1,000 shares of £8 each, and that such reduction should be effected by cancelling capital which had been lost or was unrepresented by available assets to the extent of £17 per share upon each of the 424 shares which had been issued and were then outstanding, and by reducing the nominal amount of all the shares in the company's capital from £25 to £8. At the date of the resolution the paid-up capital of the company exceeded £10,000. On the 16th of May, 1893, the company presented a petition to the High Court of Justice, intituled as follows: "In the High Court of Justice, Chancery Division, Mr. Justice Vaughan Williams.—In the matter of the Companies Act, 1867, and in the matter of the Companies Act, 1877, and in the matter of the Ocean Queen Steamship Co., Limited and reduced," praying that the special resolution, and the reduction to be effected thereby might be confirmed, and that the addition of the words "and reduced" to the company's name might be dispensed with.

B. B. Swan, for the petition.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J.—I have already considered the question of jurisdiction in the recent case of In re Mining Shares Investment Co., ante, p. 376, and have satisfied myself that I have jurisdiction to make the order. The company must use the words "and reduced" as part of its name for one calendar month, and the usual advertisements must be issued.

COOLE, Appellant.

Metropolis—Buildings—Commencement of new building —Notice to district surveyor—Building "used for the purposes of" a canal — Exemption — Metropolitan Building Act, 1855 (18 & 19 Vict. c. 122), ss. 6, 38.

By section 38 of the Metropolitan Building Act, 1855, two days before any building is commenced notice in writing, stating certain particulars, is required to be given by the builder to the district surveyor.

By section 6, "buildings belonging to any canal, dock, or railway company, and used for the purposes of such canal, dock, or railway under the provisions of any Act of Parliament," are exempt from the operation of the first part of the Act (including section 38).

A canal company, under their statutory powers, erected a building upon one of their wharves and let it to tenants who used it, in the course of their business, as a place for chopping up firewood. The company were not carriers, but received tolls in respect of the passage of barges over their canal; and it was arranged between them and the tenants that all the wood to be chopped in the building should be carried to the wharf in barges along the canal.

Held, that the building was not "used for the purposes of the canal" within the meaning of section 6 of the Metropolitan Building Act, 1855, and that it was the duty of the builder to give notice to the district surveyor before commencing to build.

Case stated by a metropolitan police magistrate.

The appellant appeared before the magistrate at the Clerkenwell Police Court on the 22nd of November 1892, upon a summons which charged that the appellant, being the builder engaged in erecting a building at No. 38, Graham-street, in the parish of St. Mary, Islington, in the county of London and within the metropolitan police district and within the limits of the Metropolitan Building Act, 1855, and in the district of South Islington, did neglect to give to the respondent, the district surveyor, two days before such building was commenced, due notice in writing stating the situation, area, height, and intended use of the building about to be commenced, and other the particulars of such proposed work, and stating his name and address, but did execute such work before giving any such notice, contrary to the statute.

The appellant was the secretary of the North Metropolitan Railway and Canal Co., a corporation created by statute and carrying on business under the statute 45 & 46 Vict. c. cclxii. for the purposes therein mentioned. By that statute the company acquired the undertaking of the company of Proprietors of the Regent's Canal which was incorporated by statute 52 Geo. 3, c. cxcv., which statute together with the statute 59 Geo. 3, c. lxvi. and subsequent statutes relating to the canal remain in full force and apply to the North Metropolitan Railway and Canal Co. except in so far as they are by the said statute 45 & 46 Vict. c. cclxii. expressed to be varied or repealed.

At No. 38, Graham-street was a wharf belonging to the company and used by them for the purposes of their said business, having been constructed by them under the above-mentioned statute of 59 Geo. 3, c. lxvi. in 1820 upon land acquired for the purposes of the company under that Act. The building complained of was built upon a part of the wharf. It was a wooden erection about sixty feet long without any concrete floor, and was, in the opinion of the respondent, dangerous to the public. It was commenced on the 16th of August, 1892, and on its completion was on the 15th of September, 1892, let at a rent to the Philanthropic Firewood Institution, and occupied by that institution as a place for chopping firewood. The blocks of wood of which the firewood was made were conveyed over the company's canal in barges in the ordinary way of the company's business, an arrangement having been made with the Institution that the canal only should be used for the conveyance of the wood to the building. The company received tolls for the passage of barges over their canal, but was not a carrying company.

No notice under section 38 of the Metropolitan Building Act, 1855, of their intention to erect the building in question was given by the company. That section imposes upon the builder the duty of giving to the district surveyor two days before a building is commenced a notice in writing, stating the particulars mentioned in the section, and by section 41 the builder is made liable to a penalty if he neglects to give such notice. Section 6 exempts from the operation of the first part of the Act (which comprises sections 6-68) "the buildings belonging to any canal, dock, or railway company and used for the purposes of such canal, dock, or railway under the provisions of any Act of Parliament."

The appellants contended before the magistrate that the building in question was not within the provisions of section 38 of the Metropolitan Building Act, 1855, but was exempted therefrom by section 6. The magistrate held that the building, not being occupied directly by the canal company and not being used for the purposes of the canal itself, did not come within the exemption in section 6, and, therefore, that notice should have been given under sections 38 and 40 of the Act. He therefore convicted and fined the appellant. The question for the court was whether the conviction was right in law.

C. Mathews, for the appellant.—This building is exempt from the provisions of section 38 of the Metropolitan Building Act, 1855. It is "used for the purposes of the canal" within the meaning of section 6. Although the canal company do not themselves occupy it, it enables them to earn increased tolls by means of the carriage of the wood to the building along the company's canal: these tolls would not accrue to the company if they had not erected the building. The object of section 38 is to insure that buildings shall be erected under the supervision of a competent architect. This company have statutory powers to appoint their own architect and engineer (52 Geo. 3, c. cxcv., s. 42), and the building was erected under the supervision of those officers and under the powers of the company, contained in their special Acts, of making their wharves more commodious (59 Geo. 3, c. lxvi., s. 2).

He cited North Kent Railway Co. v. Badger, 6 W. R. 246, 27 L. J. M. C. 106.

R. Cunningham Glen, for the respondent, was not called upon to argue.

POLLOCK, B.—This case raises a question of some importance, and was very properly brought before the court, but I have no doubt that the decision of the magistrate was right. By section 38 of the Metropolitan Building Act, 1855, notice is required to be given to the district surveyor before a building is commenced or altered to any important extent. That, of course, is a provision which is intended to insure that buildings shall be safely and properly built. There are certain buildings to which this provision does not apply. The object and intention of the Act is clear. It is that where Parliament has assigned certain areas of land to public companies for public purposes those companies ought to be allowed to deal with those areas for the purposes of their Act and of their business without being subject to the restrictions which the Metropolitan Building Act would impose upon them. By section 2 of 59 Geo. 3, c. lxvi., the canal company were empowered to make and build "quays, wharves, warehouses, erections, sheds, buildings, and other conveniences adjoining thereto, and also such other works as may be necessary and requisite for rendering the same commodious for the use of such locks and basins, and for the accommodation and convenience of persons resorting with barges and other vessels thereto." The intention there is not to enable the company to act as carriers themselves but to give them power to make quays and other conveniences without which their waterway would be comparatively useless. If we turn to the Metropolitan Building Act, 1855, we find that the words used are almost correlative, because the exemption applies to "the buildings belonging to any canal . . . company and used for the purposes of such canal."

In this case the wood which is chopped up in this building is carried to it along the canal; but it does not follow from that that the building is used for the purposes of the canal. What often happens in these cases is this: the land which was originally acquired for a wharf upon which to unload goods is found to be more than is necessary for the purposes of the canal, and then an advantageous offer is made to the company for the use of the land, and they grant a lease of it and erect buildings upon it in order that a profit may be made in the first instance, at all events by the lessees, who use the land and the buildings upon it for their own purposes. In the present case this philanthropic Institution use the wharf and the building for chopping wood, and they have incidentally made an arrangement which in effect gives the company a monopoly in respect of the carriage of the wood. That being so, although the existence of the building does no doubt bring gain to the company, it cannot be said to be "used for the purposes of the canal." Although in this case the business carried on by the Institution is small, and the increased value which is put upon the wood after it is brought to the building is not great, the case is the same as if a large manufactory had been built upon this wharf with expensive machinery making products of great value, such as pianos or artistic pottery; in that case it certainly could not be said that the manufactory was "used for the purposes of the canal," although the company would make a profit by means of the goods which passed along their canal. I think that the magistrate took a correct view of this case, and that we should give judgment for the respondent.

KENNEDY, J.—I agree. I do not think that a building upon the bank of a canal which is used for purposes of manufacture is used for the purposes of the canal company's business simply because materials will certainly or probably be carried to the manufactory along the company's canal.

"THE ALNE HOLME." (a.)

Charter-party—Demurrage—Strike clause—Strike of labourers preventing discharge of all lighters available for lighterage of cargo.

The plaintiffs' ship was chartered to carry a cargo of timber to Sharpness and there deliver the same under a charter-party by which it was provided that the cargo should be discharged with the customary steamer discharge of the port, any time lost by reason of strikes, lock-outs, or combinations of workmen, whether partial or general, not to count as part of the aforesaid discharging time, and that if, through any default of the merchants or charterers, who were to observe the usual custom of the wood trade, the vessel be longer detained, demurrage to be paid at the rate of fivepence per gross register ton per like day, and pro rata per hour for any part of the last of such days. The vessel arrived at Sharpness, which is within the port of Gloucester, at a time when there was a strike in the port of Gloucester amongst the labourers in the shipping trade, and owing to the continuance of such strike all the timber lighters which would otherwise have been available to take on board the cargo and take it up the canal to Gloucester were detained at Gloucester with the loads of timber they had last taken up the canal still laden on board them, so that nothing could have been done to discharge the plaintiffs' ship until the strike had come to an end. After the strike had come to an end the discharge of the plaintiffs' ship duly commenced, and was completed with all reasonable despatch, except on one day, when the discharge was delayed by matters bearing no reference to the strike. The plaintiffs, as the owners of the ship, instituted an action in a county court having admiralty jurisdiction against the charterers to recover for over five days' demurrage for the alleged detention of the ship at Sharpness; but the county court judge, being of opinion that the strike clause in the charter-party operated to free the defendants from liability for demurrage during the continuance of the strike above mentioned, gave the plaintiffs judgment for demurrage only in respect of the day the delay on which had had no relation to the strike. The defendants appealed.

(a.) Reported by C. F. JEMMETT, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Held, on appeal, that, as four days and twenty-two hours out of the entire number of days and hours in respect of which the plaintiffs had claimed demurrage had been lost by the strike, the judgment of the court below was right, and must be affirmed.

This was an appeal from a county court having admiralty jurisdiction.

By the decree appealed from the judge of the county court of Glamorganshire, holden at Cardiff, had, in an action arising out of an agreement made in relation to the use or hire of the steamship Alne Holme, and in relation to the carriage of goods therein, and in which action Messrs. Hine Brothers, the owners of The Alne Holme, were plaintiffs, and claimed £127 5s. 11d. damages by way of demurrage, and Messrs. Thomas Adams & Sons, the charterers of the said vessel, were defendants, given judgment in favour of the plaintiffs for £22 5s. 10d., with costs, that is, for one day's demurrage and costs ordered to be paid under the judgment as due to the plaintiffs as damages to which they were entitled under a charter-party of The Alne Holme, entered into between the plaintiffs and the defendants on the 15th of July, 1890, and in which were the following material provisions:—

"It is this day mutually agreed between Messrs. Hine Brothers, owners of the . . . . steamship . . . Alne Holme . . . and Thomas Adams & Sons, of Birmingham and Gloucester, merchants, that the said ship . . . shall proceed to Tornea . . . and there load . . . a full and complete cargo . . . to consist of deals battens, and not exceeding one-fourth of cargo loaded . . . and being so loaded shall therewith proceed to Sharpness (thence to such dock and berth as may be ordered by the charterers or their agents after receiving notice of arrival) . . . and deliver the same always afloat. . . . Cargo to be loaded and discharged with the customary steamer despatch of the port and in the ordinary working hours thereof. Vessel to work at night if required by . . . receivers of cargo. Sundays, general holidays, Bank holidays, any time lost by reason of strikes, lock outs, combinations of workmen—whether partial or general—not to count as part of the aforesaid . . . discharging time. If through any fault of the merchants or charterers the vessel be longer delayed, demurrage to be paid at the rate of 5d. per gross register ton per like day, and pro rata per hour for any part of the last of such days. . . . The usual custom of the wood trade of each port is to be observed by each party in cases where not specially expressed."

The defendants in the court below appealed to this court on the ground that the above-mentioned decree was against the evidence, and was wrong in law, the judge of the court below having given judgment for one day's demurrage, whereas they contended that he ought to have given judgment for the full amount of the plaintiffs' claim for five days and twenty-two hours' demurrage, the vessel having been delayed for four days and twenty-two hours by reason of the being for that time after her arrival at Sharpness no lighters in attendance on her in which her cargo could have been discharged.

March 7.—The appeal was now heard before a divisional court of the Admiralty Division (Jeune, P., and Barnes, J.).

Brynmor Jones, Q.C., and Holman, for the appellants.

Cur. adv. vult.

March 22.—BARNES, J., delivered the following judgment on behalf of JEUNE, P., and himself:—This is an appeal from the decision of his Honour Judge Owen, the judge of the Glamorganshire County Court, holden at Cardiff, in an action brought by the owners of the steamship Alne Holme, a vessel of 1,070 tons gross register, against the charterers of that vessel to recover £127 5s. 11d. for five days, twenty-two hours' demurrage at the rate of £22 5s. 10d. per day for the alleged detention of the vessel at Sharpness. The county court judge gave judgment for the plaintiffs for £22 5s. 10d., that is, for only one day's demurrage with costs. The appellants contend that they are entitled to judgment for the whole five days claimed. The claim in this case arises under a charter-party dated the 15th of July, 1890, made between the plaintiffs and the defendants for the carriage of a cargo of timber by The Alne Holme from Tornea in Finland to Sharpness. The learned county court judge, upon an intimation from us that it would assist us if he would furnish us with a copy of his judgment, has been good enough to send us a copy thereof, from which it appears that he found that The Alne Holme arrived at Sharpness on Wednesday, the 13th of August at 10 a.m.; that the discharge of the cargo began on Saturday, the 16th of August, and was finished on Tuesday, the 26th of August; that at the time when the vessel arrived at Sharpness there was a strike in the port of Gloucester amongst the labourers in the shipping trade, which strike had been in existence for several weeks; that the strike came to an end on the evening of the 15th of August, and the men began work on the following morning; that the customary mode of discharging timber vessels at Sharpness is to discharge them into timber lighters, by which the timber is taken up the canal to Gloucester; and that by reason of the long continuance of the strike of the labourers whose business it was to discharge the loaded lighters all the timber lighters were at Gloucester loaded with timber, and the consignees could not get them unloaded there; that according to the customary steamer discharge the vessel could have been discharged but for the strike in four and a half days; that nothing could have been done as to discharging the vessel until the strike had come to an end; and that after the strike had come to an end the defendants, except on one day, that is on the 20th of August, did all that could have been reasonably expected to discharge the vessel. He also found that occasionally timber vessels were discharged at Sharpness on to the bank, and their cargo then taken away by railway, but that this is only done when the vessel so discharging has a quay berth; that no quay berth was available for the vessel; and that she was moored to a buoy in the dock, with her stern to the quay wall at one end of the dock in a place between the dock entrance and a graving dock, which was unfitted for the discharge of cargo, and at which the discharge of cargo is never allowed and could not be made. He also held on the evidence that Sharpness is within the port of Gloucester, and on this point referred to Nielsen v. Wait, 14 Q. B. D. 516, 33 W. R. Dig. 199. With reference to the suggestion that the cargo might have been discharged where the vessel lay, or rafted, he observed that the plaintiffs have no evidence that the suggested mode of discharge on the bank could have been followed, or would have been allowed, and that the defendants' evidence satisfied him that this was not a customary mode of discharge, and that it would not have been allowed in this case by the dock authorities; and that no evidence was given that rafting was a customary mode of discharging timber vessels at this port, or that it could have been done with this cargo. It is to be noticed that one witness said the cargo would have been spoilt by rafting, and that he had never known such a cargo to have been rafted.

We see no reason to take a different view of the facts from that adopted by the learned county court judge, who had the witnesses before him.

The main point urged by Mr. Brynmor Jones, who argued very ably for the appellants, was that, even if the facts were taken as above stated, the case fell within the decisions of Kay v. Field, 8 Q. B. D. 594, 30 W. R. Dig. 192; 31 W. R. 332, 10 Q. B. D. 241, and Grant v. Coverdale, 8 Q. B. D. 600, 30 W. R. Dig. 191; 11 Q. B. D. 543, 31 W. R. Dig. 177; 32 W. R. 881, 9 App. Cas. 470, and that as the strike only prevented lighters from being discharged at Gloucester, it did not prevent the discharge of the ship at Sharpness within the meaning of the charter-party. On the other hand, Mr. Aspinall, for the respondents, argued that the case was one of a similar nature to that of Hudson v. Ede, 15 W. R. 1,111, 16 Ib. 940; L. R. 2 Q. B. 566, 3 Ib. 412.

It is unnecessary to discuss at any length the distinction between the two former cases and the latter, because that has been fully done in the judgments of the Court of Appeal, who reversed the decision of Pollock, B., and also in the judgment delivered in the House of Lords in Grant v. Coverdale. It is sufficient to note that in the two former cases the place of loading was the East Bute Dock, and that there were several distinct modes of loading, one of which was interrupted by frost, and thus affected the particular charterer, but would not have affected most of the shippers who used the East Bute Docks, whereas in the latter case the only way in which cargo could have been brought to the vessel was interrupted by ice. The late Kelly, C.B., in delivering judgment in Hudson v. Ede, said: "My brother Willes has observed, and we agree with him in opinion, that whenever there was no access to the ship by reason of ice from any one of the storing places from which merchandise was conveyed direct to the ship, the exception in the charter-party would apply." And Lord Selborne's judgment in Grant v. Coverdale has the following passage:—"The case of Hudson v. Ede was referred to. I understand that case as proceeding upon the same principles, but as containing an admission of this distinction, that where there is in a proved state of facts an inevitable necessity that something should be done in order that there should be a loading at the place agreed upon, as, for instance, that the goods should be brought down part of a river from the only place from which they can be brought, even though that place is a considerable distance off, yet it being practically, according to known mercantile usage, the only place to which they can be brought to be loaded, the parties must be held to have contemplated that the goods should be loaded from that place in the usual manner unless there was an unavoidable impediment."

In the present case the only customary mode of discharge of such a cargo as that of The Alne Holme was by lighters, in which the timber is lightered to Gloucester, and it is clear to us that the parties contemplated that the discharge should take place in that manner; and, in fact, it was the only possible way in which it could be done. There is no question that the discharge in this manner was delayed by the strike, and for this delay the charterers, in our opinion, are not responsible. It was urged upon us that the vessel might have been sooner discharged at Sharpness; but this could only have been done, if at all, in one of four ways—first, by lighters, which, under the circumstances, was impossible, owing to the strike; secondly, by rafting, but this, if possible, was not a customary mode of discharging a cargo, and would have spoilt the cargo; thirdly, it was said it might have been put ashore, but this again was not customary, and could not have been done; and, fourthly, that the vessel might have discharged at a quay at Sharpness, but the charter provided that she should be discharged at a dock and berth as might be ordered by the charterers or by their agents, after receiving notice of arrival, or so near thereto as she might safely get, and, if ordered to a quay, there was no quay berth available, and the vessel could not have got to the quay probably without longer delay than she experienced, according to the evidence; and discharge of timber on to the quay was not a customary mode of discharge. In truth, it was never contemplated that she should discharge at a quay berth, and the discharge into lighters was the mode of discharge accepted by both parties.

Applying the principles of the cases cited to the present case, we are of opinion that the loss of time was caused by the strike within the meaning of the charter-party, and that the charterers are excused.

A further point was made for the defendants that the clause in this charter-party, "to be discharged with the customary steamer dispatch of the port," was substantially the same as that in the case of Castlegate Steamship Co. v. Dempsey, 40 W. R. 533, [1892] 1 Q. B. D. 854. In that case the charter-party provided that the cargo was "to be discharged with all despatch as customary, and ten days on demurrage, over and above the said laying days, at 6d. per net. register ton per day." By the custom of the port of discharge a dock company undertook the work of discharging cargo, and by reason of a strike of dock labourers the discharge of the cargo was delayed. It was held that the effect of the charter-party was not to fix any definite time within which the cargo must be discharged, but to provide that it should be discharged with all reasonable despatch, having regard to the circumstances and the manner of discharging cargo customary to the port of discharge; and, therefore, that, the charterers were not liable to the shipowners in respect of the delay which occurred in discharging the cargo. The language in the charter, in the present case, is slightly different from that in the charter in the case just referred to, and the latter charter had no strike clause. The Master of the Rolls and Lopes, L.J., both point out that in the case before them the dock company did both the shipowners' and charterers' work, though it is suggested that it would have made no difference had it been otherwise. As, however, there is a strike clause in the present case, it is unnecessary to give any decision as to what would have been the case had it been omitted.

The plaintiffs further alleged that after the strike was over the defendants ought to have sent more lighters to the vessel than they did; but the judge has found, as a fact, that after the strike had come to an end they did all that they could reasonably have been expected to do to discharge the vessel, except on one day, the 20th, and there is nothing to show that he has improperly found this fact.

The appeal must, therefore, be dismissed with costs.

Counsel for the respondents invited us to allow him to prosecute a cross-appeal against the judgment for one day's demurrage; but as the only ground upon which he could question the judgment on this point was admitted by him to depend upon a question of fact, and the amount was under £50, no appeal against the judgment lies in favour of the defendants. It was said, however, that as the plaintiffs had chosen to bring the case before the court, the court had power, upon the plaintiffs' appeal, to alter the judgment adversely to the plaintiffs. No authority was cited for any such proposition, and, as this court has only an appellate jurisdiction, the only question before it is whether or not the plaintiffs' appeal is to succeed or fail, and we do not consider that we can entertain what is really a cross-appeal by the defendants, when they have no right to originate an appeal.

HUNTINGTON v. ATTRILL. (a.)

(On appeal from the Supreme Court of Appeal for Ontario.)

International law—Penal and private actions—Foreign judgment.

No proceeding which has for its object the enforcement by the State of punishment for breaches of its laws will be enforced by a foreign tribunal when the penalties attached to them are recoverable at the instance of the State, or of a member of the public as a common informer; but it is otherwise where an individual as such has a remedy for an infraction of the municipal law. It is, moreover, the duty of the tribunal, when a penalty of this nature is sought to be enforced through its instrumentality, to decide whether the foreign judgment which imposes the fine or other obligation is or is not penal in the sense of international law above stated.

This was an appeal from the Supreme Court of Appeal for Ontario, dismissing the appellant's action. The various sections considered of the Act of the New York State Laws, 1875, c. 611, the facts, and the whole course of the proceedings will be found stated in their lordships' judgment.

Sir H. Davey, Q.C., Finlay, Q.C., and Pollard, for the appellant.

Sir R. Webster, Q.C., Gore, and Askwith, for the respondent.

The judgment of their lordships (Lord HERSCHELL, L.C., Lord WATSON, Lord BRAMWELL, Lord HOBHOUSE, Lord MORRIS, Lord SHAND) was delivered by

Lord WATSON.—The appellant, in June, 1880, became a creditor for money lent to the Rockaway Beach Improvement Co. (Limited), which carried on business in the State of New York, being incorporated pursuant to chapter 611 of the State Laws of 1875. Section 21 of the Act provides that "if any certificate or report made, or public notice given, by the officers of any such corporation, shall be false in any material representation, all the officers who shall have signed the same shall be jointly and severally liable for all the debts of the corporation contracted while they are officers thereof."

The respondent was, in June, 1880, a director and in that capacity an officer of the company within the meaning of the statute. On the 30th of that month he, along with other officers of the company, signed and verified on oath, as prescribed by section 37, a certificate setting forth that the whole capital stock had, at its date, been paid up in cash.

(a.) Reported by CHARLES H. GRAFTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

In the year 1883 the appellant instituted a suit against the respondent before the Supreme Court of New York State for the unpaid balance of his loan to the company, alleging that the certificate contained representations which were material and false, and that the respondent had incurred personal responsibility for the debt as provided by section 21. The respondent defended the action, but, a verdict having been found against him, the court, on the 15th of June, 1886, gave final judgment, ordering him to pay to the appellant the sum of 100,240 dollars.

Having failed to recover payment the appellant, in September, 1886, brought an action upon his decree in the Common Pleas Division of the High Court of Justice for the Province of Ontario, where the respondent resided. The only plea stated in defence was to the effect that the judgment sued on was for a penalty inflicted by the municipal law of New York; and that the action being one of a penal character ought not to be entertained by the courts of a foreign state.

Street, J., who tried the case, being of opinion that the enactments of section 21 were strictly punitive and not remedial, dismissed the action with costs. The judges of the Appeal Court were equally divided in opinion, the result being that the appeal taken from his decision was dismissed. The Chief Justice (Hagarty) and Osler, J., were of opinion that the statutory remedy given to the appellant, as a creditor of the company, being civil only, and not enforceable by the State or by the public, was not a penal matter in the sense of international law. Burton, J., was of the same opinion, but held himself precluded from giving effect to it for reasons which he thus explains: "The courts of the State of New York have placed an interpretation upon this particular statute in which we should not have agreed, but those decisions are the law of the State of New York, and with that we are bound. I am of opinion, therefore, that on that uncontested expert testimony this is a penal statue there, and the judgment obtained upon it cannot be enforced here." In the conclusion thus stated Maclennan, J., expressed his concurrence. But the learned judge, in that respect agreeing with the court of first instance and differing from the other members of the Court of Appeal, held that the enactment was in itself undoubtedly penal, inasmuch as it was "passed in the public interest, providing a punishment for an offence," and that "it makes no difference that what exacts from the offender is given to persons who are ordinary creditors of a company in payment of their respective debts."

Their lordships cannot assent to the proposition that, considering whether the present action was penal in such sense as to oust their jurisdiction, the courts of Ontario were bound to pay absolute deference to the interpretation which might have been put upon the statute of 1875 in the State of New York. They think to construe and apply an international rule, which is a matter of law entirely within the cognizance of a foreign court whose jurisdiction is invoked, judicial decisions in the State where the cause of action arose are not precedents which must be followed, although the reasoning upon which they are based must always receive careful consideration, may be conclusive. The court appealed to must examine for itself, in the first place, the substance of the right sought to be enforced; and, in the second place, whether its enforcement would, either directly or indirectly, involve the execution of the penal law of another State. Were any other principle to guide its decision, a court might find itself in the position of giving effect in one case and denying effect in another, to laws of the same character, in consequence of the causes of action having arisen in different countries; or in the predicament of being constrained to give effect to laws which were, in its own judgment, strictly penal.

The general law upon this point has been correctly stated by Story, J., in his Conflict of Laws and by other text writers; but their lordships do not think it necessary to quote from these authorities in explanation of the reasons which have induced courts of justice to decline jurisdiction in suits somewhat loosely described as penal, when these have their origin in a foreign country. The rule has its foundation in the well-recognized principle that crimes, including in that term all breaches of public law punishable by pecuniary mulct or otherwise, at the instance of the State Government, or of someone representing the public, are local in this sense, that they are only cognizable and punishable in the country where they were committed. Accordingly no proceeding, even in the shape of a civil suit, which has for its object the enforcement by the State, whether directly or indirectly, of punishment imposed for such breaches by the lex fori, ought to be admitted in the courts of any other country.

Their lordships have already indicated that, in their opinion, the phrase "penal actions," which is so frequently used to designate that class of actions which, by the law of nations, are exclusively assigned to their domestic forum, does not afford an accurate definition. In its ordinary acceptation the word "penal" may embrace penaties for infractions of general law which do not constitute offences against the State; it may for many legal purposes be applied with perfect propriety to penalties created by contract; and it therefore, when taken by itself, fails to mark that distinction between civil rights and criminal wrongs which is the very essence of the international rule. The phrase was used by Lord Loughborough and Buller, J., in a well-known case (Folliott v. Ogden, 1 H. B., at p. 135, and Ogden v. Folliott, 3 T. R. 734), and also by Marshall, C.J., who in The Antelope, 10 Wheaton, 123, thus stated the rule with no less brevity than force: "The courts of no country execute the penal laws of another." Read in the light of the context, the language used by these eminent lawyers is quite intelligible, because they were dealing with the consequences of violations of public law and order, which were unmistakably of a criminal complexion. But the expressions "penal" and "penalty," when employed without any qualification, express or implied, are calculated to mislead, because they are capable of being construed so as to extend the rule to all proceedings for the recovery of penalties, whether exigible by the State in the interest of the community, or by private persons in their own interest.

The Supreme Court of the United States had occasion to consider the international rule in Wisconsin v. The Pelican Insurance Co., 127 U. S. (20 Davis) 265. By the statute law of the State of Wisconsin a pecuniary penalty was imposed upon corporations carrying on business under it who failed to comply with one of its enactments. The penalty was recoverable by the Commissioner of Insurance, an official intrusted with the administration of the Act in the public interest, one half of it being payable into the State Treasury, and the other to the commissioner, who was to defray the costs of prosecution. It was held that the penalty could not be enforced by the Federal Court, or the judiciary of any other State. In delivering the judgment of the bench, Gray, J., after referring to the text-books, and the dictum by Marshall, C.J., already cited, went on to say: "The rule that the courts of no country execute the law of another applies not only to prosecutions and sentences for crimes and misdemeanours, but to all suits in favour of the State for the recovery of pecuniary penalties for any violation of statutes for the protection of its revenue or other municipal laws, and to all judgments for such penalties."

Their lordships do not hesitate to accept that exposition of the law, which, in their opinion, discloses the proper test for ascertaining whether an action is penal within the meaning of the rule. A proceeding, in order to come within the scope of the rule, must be in the nature of a suit in favour of the State whose law has been infringed. All the provisions of municipal statutes for the regulation of trade and trading companies are presumably enacted in the interest and for the benefit of the community at large; and persons who violate these provisions are, in a certain sense, offenders against the State law, as well as against individuals who may be injured by their misconduct. But foreign tribunals do not regard these violations of statute law as offences against the State, unless their vindication rests with the State itself, or with the community which it represents. Penalties may be attached to them, but that circumstance will not bring them within the rule, except in cases where these penalties are recoverable at the instance of the State, or of an official duly authorized to prosecute on its behalf, or of a member of the public in the character of a common informer. An action by the latter is regarded as an actio popularis pursued, not in his individual interest, but in the interest of the whole community.

The New York Statute of 1875 provides for the organization and regulation of corporations formed for the purpose of carrying on all kinds of lawful business with the exception of certain branches therein specified. It confers rights and privileges upon persons who choose to form a trading association, and to become incorporated under its provisions, with full or with limited liability; and, in either case, it varies and limits the rights and remedies which, under the common law, would have been available to creditors of the association, as against its individual members. On the other hand, for the protection of those members of the public who may deal with the corporation, the Act imposes upon its directors and officers various stringent obligations, the plain object of which is to make known, from time to time, to all concerned, the true condition of its finances. Thus they are required (section 18) to publish an annual report, stating the amount of capital, the proportion actually paid in, the amount and nature of existing assets and debts, the names of the shareholders and the dividends, if any, declared since last report; and (section 37) to certify the amount of capital stock paid in within thirty days after payment of the last instalment. In both cases the consequence of the report or certificate being false in any material representation is, that every director or officer who vouched its accuracy becomes, under section 21, liable personally for all the debts of the corporation contracted during his period of office.

The provisions of section 21 are in striking contrast to the enactments of section 34, which inflicts a penalty of 100 dols. upon every director or officer of a corporation with limited liability who authorizes or permits the omission of the word "limited" from its seal, official publications, or business documents. In that case the penalty is recoverable "in the name of the people of the State of New York by the district attorney of the county in which the principal office of such corporation is located, and the amounts recovered shall be paid over to the proper authorities for the support of the poor of such county." It does not admit of doubt that an action by the district attorney would be a suit in favour of the State, and that neither the penalty nor the decree of a New York court for its amount could be enforced in a foreign country.

In one aspect of them, the provisions of section 21 are penal in the wider sense in which the term is used. They impose heavy liabilities upon directors in respect of failure to observe statutory regulations for the protection of persons who have become or may become creditors of the corporation. But, in so far as they concern creditors, these provisions are in their nature protective and remedial. To use the language of Osler, J., they give "a civil remedy only to creditors whose rights the conduct of the company's officers may have been calculated to injure, and which is not enforceable by the State or the public." In the opinion of their lordships these enactments are simply conditions upon which the Legislature permits associations to trade with corporate privileges, and constitute an implied term of every contract between the corporation and its creditors.

A number of American authorities were cited in the course of the argument, which may be briefly noticed, seeing that they were made the subject of comment in both courts below. With one exception they do not appear to their lordships to have a direct or material bearing upon the point raised in this appeal.

In Steam Engine Co. v. Hubbard, 101 U. S. (11 Otto) 188, the facts were these. The law of Connecticut, in the event of the president and secretary of a corporation intentionally neglecting to issue a certain certificate, made them jointly and severally liable "for all debts contracted during the period of such neglect." Under that provision an action was brought by a creditor of the corporation against its president, for a debt contracted before the period of neglect began, which remained unpaid during its continuance. There was no question as to enforcing the claim in another State. The Supreme Court of the States held that the enactment was penal, and therefore to be strictly construed; and also that the president was not liable, inasmuch as the debt was not contracted during the period of his default. The decision appears to be absolutely right; but their lordships apprehend that the canon of construction applied in that case would be equally applicable to the case of a penalty stipulated by bond, or in a mercantile contract.

Flash v. Conn, 109 U. S. (2 Davis) 371, another decision of the Supreme Federal Court, was relied on by the appellant. In that case a New York Statute of 1848 had provided that, until the whole capital stock of the corporation was paid up, every stockholder should be liable to its creditors to an amount equal to the amount of stock held by them. It was decided that the claim of a creditor under that provision was contractual and not penal, and might therefore be enforced by an action at law. The result appears to be inevitable, because the liability was not imposed in respect of failure to perform any duty prescribed by the Act; but it throws no light upon the present question.

The respondent, in his argument, placed great reliance upon Merchants' Bank v. Bliss, 35 N. Y. (8 Tiffany) 412, which was decided in 1866. The statute of 1848, already referred to, required the trustees of the corporation to make a report at a stated time, and, in the event of their failure to do so, rendered them jointly and severally liable for all its debts then existing, or which might be contracted before the report was actually made. The suit was by a creditor against a defaulting trustee, and the only question raised was this—whether the action was for a "liability created by statute, other than penalty or forfeiture," within the meaning of the Statute of Limitations, or "for a penalty or forfeiture, when action is given to the party aggrieved"? The Supreme Court of New York decided that the liability belonged to the second category, and that suit was consequently barred by the lapse of three years. In another case—Wiles v. Suydam, 64 N. Y. 173—the same court held that a similar claim by a creditor, being for a statutory penalty or forfeiture, could not be joined in a declaration with a claim upon contract. Their lordships see no reason to question the propriety of these decisions, but it is hardly necessary to say that a delict may give rise to a purely civil remedy, as well as to criminal punishment. Although a right of action is given to the party aggrieved, it does not follow that the law of nations must regard his action as a suit in favour of the State.

Attrill v. Huntington, 70 Maryland, 191, is, however, an authority upon the very point raised in this appeal. During the dependence of the present action the appellant preferred a bill in equity, before the Supreme Court of the State of Maryland, to set aside certain transfers of stock by the respondent, upon the allegation that they were fraudulently made in order to defeat his claims under the decree of June, 1886. The primary judge granted the relief craved, but the Court of Appeal, by a majority of five judges against two, reversed his decision and dismissed the bill, holding that the decree, being for a penalty, could not be enforced beyond the limits of the State of New York. Their lordships are constrained to differ from the reasons assigned by Bryan, J., in delivering the judgment of the majority, which do not appear to them sufficiently to recognize the distinction, from an international point of view, between a suit for penalty by a private individual in his own interest, and a suit brought by the Government or people of a State for the vindication of public law. The distinction is clearly pointed out in the opinion of the dissentient judges as expressed by Stone, J., in whose reasoning their lordships concur.

Being of opinion that the present action is not, in the sense of international law, penal, or, in other words, an action on behalf of the Government or community of the State of New York for punishment of an offence against their municipal law, their lordships will humbly advise Her Majesty to reverse the judgments appealed from, and to give decree in favour of the appellant, with costs in both courts below. The appellant must have the costs of this appeal.

In re MILLARD'S SETTLED ESTATES. (a.)

Settled land—Tenant for life—Improvements—Scheme approved by trustees—Payment—Capital money arising under the Act—No capital money in hands of trustees—Prospective authorization of payment out of money to arise in the future—Settled Land Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 38), ss. 21, 26.

Under section 26 of the Settled Land Act, 1882, the court has no power to prospectively authorize payment for improvements out of capital money to arise in the future, when the trustees have no capital money in their hands at the time.

Decision of Kekewich, J., affirmed.

Appeal from a decision of Kekewich, J., at chambers.

Certain persons, who together constituted the tenant for life of settled land under a settlement (created by the will and three codicils dated respectively the 31st of October, 1876, the 17th of January, 1881, the 27th of September, 1884, and the 21st of October, 1884, of Charles Paul Millard, who died on the 2nd of April, 1885), took out an originating summons asking that two persons, who were the trustees of the settlement for the purposes of the Settled Land Acts, 1882 to 1890, might be at liberty to apply the sums thereinafter mentioned out of the capital money arising under the said Acts in or to come to their hands subject to the settlement in payment of the works thereinafter mentioned (i.e., roads and sewers), being improvements to be executed upon the settled land pursuant to two schemes which had been approved by the trustees.

The trustees had no capital money arising under the Acts in their hands, and the application was prospective upon money being realized by a sale of the property upon which the improvements were to be made. There was evidence that the improvements, if carried out, would greatly enhance the selling value of the property, and it was proposed to pay for the improvements out of the moneys to be received on the sale. It was intended that, if the court should allow the application, the money should be advanced, in the first instance, by one or others of the tenants for life, and be afterwards recouped to them out of the proceeds of sale. There appeared to be no prospect of the trustees being able to get the required money by sale of any portion of the property, as it was heavily mortgaged.

Kekewich, J., dismissed the summons, being of opinion that no such payment as was asked for should be sanctioned where the trustees had no capital moneys in their hands or immediately coming to their hands.

The applicants appealed.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and Eve, for the appellants.—The question is whether the trustees must have capital money in their hands before it is competent to the court to authorize the expenditure. If they must, the matter is brought to a deadlock, so far as the Settled Land Acts are concerned, if the doubt expressed by the court in In re Hotchkin's Settled Estates, 35 W. R. 463, 35 Ch. D. 41, to the effect that the expense of improvements on lands which have been sold cannot be afterwards paid out of capital money is a valid one; for they have no money to pay for the improvements without selling the land first. [LINDLEY, L.J.—If that is so, they can borrow the money they want under the Settled Estates Act.] The words "is in the hands of trustees," in sub-section 2 of section 26, mean "in their hands at the time when the money shall be called for." Round v. Turner, W. N., 1889, p. 38, is against the appellants, but that was an application under a different section (sub-section 10 of section 21), and was perhaps a little misconceived; it was a very speculative matter to find out how much would be required to carry on a farm for eight months. It is true the object in the present instance could be attained by borrowing under the Settled Estates Act, but that only shows that it is not contrary to the general scope of legislation on this subject to give what is now asked for.

(a.) Reported by ARTHUR LAWRENCE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Willoughby Williams, for the trustees, was not called upon to argue.

LINDLEY, L.J.—I do not think it would be right for the court to accede to this application. It is asked to authorize, prospectively, the trustees to expend capital money when they get it in the future. The appellants' counsel have not been able to produce a single case in which what we are asked to do has ever been done. The registrar informs us that he has never seen such an order as we are asked to make, and Kay, L.J., whose opinion we have consulted, and who has had great experience in these matters, says he thinks the court has no authority to make it. The position of the trustees is that they cannot get the money to do the improvements by selling a part of the property. Have we power, then, to make this prospective order? Section 21 says, "Capital money arising under this Act, subject to payment of claims properly payable thereout, and to application thereof for any special authorized object for which the same was raised, shall, when received, be invested or otherwise applied wholly in one or partly in one and partly in another or others of the following modes," one of those modes being "(iii.) in payment for any improvement authorized by this Act"; and then section 25 says that among the "improvements authorized by this Act" is "the making or execution on or in connection with and for the benefit of settled land of" inter alia, roads and sewers. What we have to construe is section 26: that section says, "(1) Where the tenant for life is desirous that capital money arising under this Act shall be applied in or towards payment for an improvement authorized by this Act, he may submit for approval to the trustees of the settlement"—that has been done here—"or to the court, as the case may require, a scheme for the execution of the improvement, showing the proposed expenditure thereon. (2) Where the capital money to be expended is in the hands of trustees, then after a scheme has been approved by them"—as it has been here—"the trustees may apply that money in or towards payment for the whole or part of any work or works or operation comprised in the improvement, on (i.) a certificate of the Land Commissioners certifying that the work or operation, or some specified part of it, has been properly executed, and what amount is properly payable by the trustees in respect thereof; . . . or on (ii.) a like certificate of a competent engineer or able practical surveyor nominated by the trustees and approved by the commissioners or by the court; or on (iii.) an order of the court directing or authorizing the trustees to so apply a specified portion of the capital money." When you look at these provisions, you see that the certificates referred to in sub-clauses (i.) and (ii.) cannot be prospective, they must certify not prospectively, but that the work has been properly done. Then on what evidence ought the court to make the order referred to in sub-clause (iii.)? I do not think the court ought to make it prospectively any more than the certificates are to be prospective. I cannot find in the Act anything which authorizes the court to make a prospective order as is here asked for, and, addressing my mind to the general aspect of the Act, I think the court ought not to make it. The appeal must therefore, in my opinion, be dismissed.

LOPES, L.J.—I agree. We are asked to make an order for the expenditure of money when it shall be received. I do not think we have any jurisdiction to make the order. The words "when received" in section 21 seem to me very strong in favour of the view I take, and then again the words "in the hands of trustees" in section 26. This seems to me to mean that capital money which is to be authorized to be expended must be in their hands at the time. How are you to tell whether the money is properly payable or whether the work is properly done, prospectively? I think there is no jurisdiction to make the order.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—I agree, and have nothing to add.

Appeal dismissed.

MILLER v. HANCOCK. (a.)

Landlord and tenant—Negligence—House let in flats—Staircase in occupation and control of landlord—No covenant to keep stairs in repair—Personal injury caused by stairs being out of repair—Liability of landlord.

The defendant, who was the owner of certain premises in the City of London, let the different floors as offices to separate tenants. The only mode of access to the offices was by means of a staircase, which was not let to the tenants, but which remained in the occupation and control of the defendant. The leases to the tenants contained no covenant by the defendant to keep the staircase in repair. The plaintiff went to the office occupied by one of the tenants on business, and, when coming down the stairs, fell and was injured owing to the stairs being out of repair.

Held, that there was a duty on the defendant, both towards the tenants and towards those persons who came to the premises on business with them, to keep the stairs in a reasonably safe state of repair; and that, therefore, the defendant was liable to the plaintiff.

Application by the defendant for judgment or a new trial in an action tried before Lawrance, J., and a jury.

The defendant was the owner of certain premises in the City of London, consisting of a first and second floor, let out in separate tenements as offices, and one room on the third floor, and also a staircase leading from the entrance on the ground floor to the floors above. This staircase was the only mode of access to the offices on the first and second floors. The offices on the first and second floors were let to two separate tenants, but the leases contained no covenant by the defendant to keep the staircase in repair, nor was any reference made to the staircase in the leases.* A caretaker, who was selected and paid by the tenants, looked after the staircase, and the defendant allowed her to occupy the room on the third floor rent free. The defendant did not reside or carry on business on the premises.

The plaintiff, who was a collector in the employment of a railway company, was in the habit of calling once a month upon the tenant of the offices on the second floor for the purpose of collecting the account due to the company, and upon the occasion in question, while coming down the stairs after having called for the account, he fell and was injured.

* The court, as will be seen from the judgments, came to the conclusion that the staircase was left in the occupation and control of the defendant.

(a.) Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The plaintiff, alleging that the stairs were out of repair, and that the accident was caused thereby, brought an action against the defendant to recover damages for personal injuries.

It was admitted that when the lease was granted to the tenant of the second floor offices the stairs were in good repair.

The jury found a verdict for the plaintiff, and the learned judge entered judgment accordingly.

R. M. Bray, for the defendant.—The defendant is not liable to the plaintiff. The defendant has not covenanted with his tenants to repair or keep in repair the staircase. He was, therefore, under no obligation to the tenants to repair the staircase, and would not be liable to them. A stranger like the plaintiff can stand in no better position than the tenants. The defendant impliedly granted an easement over the staircase to the tenants, and there is no obligation imposed by law upon the owner of the servient tenement to repair. The owner of the dominant tenement may himself repair: Gale on Easements, 5th ed., pp. 528, 529.

He cited Smith v. London and St. Katharine Docks Co., 16 W. R. 728, L. R. 3 C. P. 326; Colebeck v. Girdlers' Co., 24 W. R. 577, 1 Q. B. D. 234; Ford v. Metropolitan Railway Co., 34 W. R. 426, 17 Q. B. D. 12.

Moyses, for the plaintiff, was not called upon.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—The defendant is the owner of a building in the City, consisting of certain storeys, each floor being let out as a separate tenement to different tenants. He did not let the staircase so as to make it part of the tenants' premises. The staircase was the only way by which the tenants had access to their premises. Under these circumstances the first question is, In whose possession and control was the staircase? In my opinion it was in the possession and control of the landlord. The whole house was his, and therefore the parts which he did not let he kept in his possession and control.

The next question is, What were his duties towards his tenants under those circumstances? The right which the tenants had to the use of the staircase was an easement granted by him of such a kind that he was bound to keep the staircase in a reasonably safe condition as the means of access to each tenement. There was an implied obligation to keep the access to the tenements in reasonably safe repair, otherwise the enjoyment of the tenements would be of no value; for instance, if the staircase were allowed to fall into ruin, the means of access to the tenements would be gone. Further, the landlord must know that the tenements which he has so let will be of no use to business people unless persons with whom the tenants have business have access to the tenements. The landlord must know that those persons would go up and down the stairs. He has, therefore, a duty towards those persons. That duty is to keep the staircase, which he knows they will use, in a reasonably safe state of repair. The case of Smith v. London and St. Katharine Docks Co. is a clear authority on the point. The ship there came into the defendants' docks under a contract with the shipowner. The ship was laid alongside another ship which was lying alongside the quay. The ordinary way of getting off and on the ship was by means of a gangway. The gangway was placed there, not only for the use of the passengers and crew, but also for the use of all persons having business with the ship. The judges there said that the dock company must have known that, and that that knowledge imposed a duty upon them to keep the gangway reasonably safe. Precisely the same reasoning applies here, and renders this defendant liable to this plaintiff. The appeal must therefore be dismissed.

BOWEN, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The defendant is the owner of premises let out in flats. The plaintiff is the collector in the employment of a railway company, who in the course of his duty had to call upon the tenant of one of the flats on business. While coming down the stairs he slipped and broke his leg. The duties and liabilities seem to me to be perfectly clear both upon reason and upon authority. The defendant let the flats to tenants. It was clear that the staircase leading to the flats remained in the occupation and control of the defendant as owner of the house. The fact that the caretaker who looked after the stairs was paid by the tenants is immaterial. Once it is clear that the staircase remained in the occupation and control of the defendant we know his duties towards his tenants with regard thereto. The tenants could only use the flats by using the staircase. The defendant granted the tenants an easement over the staircase for the purpose of the reasonable enjoyment of the flats.

Under such circumstances we must see what is the law as to the liability to repair the staircase. It was argued that the person who has the enjoyment of the easement may repair the subject-matter himself, but cannot call upon the grantor of the easement to do the repairs. That seems to be true generally, but there can be no doubt that the grantor may bind himself to repair. Once we recollect the facts, and the way in which alone the flats could be enjoyed, it is obvious that both parties must have intended that the landlord should keep the staircase in a reasonably safe state of repair, both for the tenants and also for those persons who go to the flats on business with the tenants. One cannot imagine a lease of this sort having any real validity or efficacy, or otherwise than as futile and absurd, unless the landlord were to keep the staircase in repair so as to make it reasonably safe for use. What is that but an implied contract to repair? It shows that the grantor of an easement may bind himself to repair. The landlord has given the tenants the right to use the staircase, and he knows that persons will come upon the premises for the purposes of business with the tenants, and those persons know that they will be shielded from carelessness as to the condition of the premises by the responsibility of the person upon whose shoulder rests the duty of doing the repairs. The case accordingly falls within the principle of Smith v. London and St. Katharine Docks Co. The present plaintiff came upon the premises on business with the tenant of the second floor, and that being so the law imposed a liability upon the defendant towards the plaintiff in respect of the unsafe condition of the staircase.

KAY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The question is whether, under the circumstances of this case, the duty of keeping the staircase in a reasonably safe state of repair lies upon the landlord. It is clear that the staircase was not let, but was retained in the possession of the landlord. The tenant had a right to use the staircase, and it may be that to preserve the easement the tenant could repair the staircase if the landlord did not. But that does not touch the question whether it was not the duty of the landlord as between himself and the tenant, and as between himself and persons using the staircase on business with the tenants, to keep the staircase in a condition in which it might safely be used by them. I shall only say that under the peculiar circumstances there was such a duty on the landlord as between himself and the persons I have named, and, that duty not having been fulfilled, the defendant is liable to the plaintiff.

Appeal dismissed.

FERRAND v. HALLAS LAND AND BUILDING CO. (a.)

Local Government—Sewer—Vesting in local authority—Sewer not made by a person for his own profit—Public Health Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), s. 13—Pollution of stream—Rivers Pollution Act, 1876 (39 & 40 Vict. c. 75), s. 3.

The defendants, who were not the local sanitary authority, made a sewer into which, by means of house drains, the ordinary sewage of sixty-nine cottages belonging to the defendants was, with the sanction of the sanitary authority, conveyed and discharged into a stream. The plaintiff, the owner of land on both sides of the stream below the out fall from the sewer, brought an action against the defendants for an injunction to restrain them from polluting the stream.

Held, that the sewer, being made for the ordinary purpose of draining the cottages, was not a sewer made by any person for his own profit, or by any company for the profit of the shareholders, within the meaning of section 13 of the Public Health Act, 1875; that it was, under that section, therefore, vested in and under the control of the local authority; and that the defendants were not liable.

Per curiam.—Assuming that the value of the premises was enhanced to the owners by the construction by them of the sewer, that was not the kind of "profit" contemplated by the exception in section 13.

Appeal by the defendants from a judgment of Bruce, J., at the trial of the action without a jury at the Leeds Assizes.

The action was for an injunction to restrain the defendants from causing or allowing sewage to pass from their cottages into a stream called Cullingworth Beck so as to pollute it.

The plaintiff was the owner of an estate consisting of a mansion and farm lands, which latter, used mainly for the purpose of pasturing cattle, were situate on the banks of Cullingworth Beck.

The defendants were the owners of land in the neighbourhood of and higher up the same stream, and had erected upon it, in 1891, sixty-nine cottages. Each of these cottages was drained separately by a house-drain, which discharged into a long sewer running the whole length of the cottages and finally emptying the sewage into the above-mentioned stream. The whole of these drainage works had been constructed by the defendants. Previous to their construction certain plans were submitted to the local authority, and were signed by the chairman as approved by that body.

By section 13 of the Public Health Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), it is provided as follows:—"All existing and future sewers within the district of a local authority, together with all buildings, works, materials, and things belonging thereto . . . . except (1) sewers made by any person for his own profit, or by any company for the profit of the shareholders . . . shall vest in and be under the control of the local authority."

By section 3 of the Rivers Pollution Act, 1876, "every person who causes to fall or flow, or knowingly permits to fall or flow, into any stream any sewage matter, shall be deemed to have committed an offence against this Act. . . . A person other than a sanitary authority shall not be guilty of an offence under this section in respect of the passing of sewage matter into any sewer belonging to or under the control of any sanitary authority, provided he has the sanction of the sanitary authority for so doing."

The learned judge found as a fact that the stream was polluted by the defendants, and held that the sewer in question had been constructed by the defendants for their own profit within the meaning of the exception in section 13 of the Public Health Act, that it was consequently not vested in or under the control of the local authority, and that the defendants were, therefore, liable for the pollution. He also held on the facts that the defendants had not obtained the sanction of the local authority for the scheme carried out, that they were not, therefore, protected by the proviso in section 3 of the Rivers Pollution Acts, and had committed a breach of the provisions of that section; and he entered judgment for the plaintiff for a perpetual injunction.

The defendants appealed.

Forbes, Q.C., and C. M. Atkinson, for the defendants.—The only question of law is whether the judge was right in holding that the sewer in question was made by the defendants for their own "profit," so as to bring it within the exception in section 13 of the Public Health Act, 1875. If the construction put upon the section by the learned judge were correct, it would reduce the Act to a practical absurdity, for it is based upon the idea that the value of houses is enhanced by their being drained, and that the drains are therefore made for a "profit." But if that were the sense in which the Legislature used the word in the exception no house would be within the rule. You might have in this case some sixty different owners, and it would lead to enormous difficulties. The intention was to make an accessible body responsible, so that any grievance could be dealt with without confusion or difficulty. If the primary purpose of the use of the sewer is the making of a private profit apart from the ordinary drainage of premises, then it would be within the exception. [Lord ESHER, M.R.—I am disposed to think that it is not the primary but the substantial purpose that must be looked at.] In any case the substantial, and, in fact, only, purpose here was the getting rid of the ordinary sewage of those premises, which was not, therefore, a purpose of "profit" within the section. The learned judge therefore was wrong in holding that the defendants were responsible under the Public Health Act, and also on the facts, in holding that they did not come within the proviso in section 3 of the Rivers Pollution Act.

They cited Bonella v. Twickenham Local Board, 35 W. R. 578, 36 Ib. 50; 18 Q. B. D. 577, 20 Ib. 63.

Tindal Atkinson, Q.C., and Kershaw, for the plaintiff.—The injunction was rightly granted. If a sewer is made for the use of the owner's houses only it increases their value and his profits, and it is intended that he should be responsible for them under the Public Health Act. If he allows the sewage of other people's premises to drain into his sewer, his position, no doubt, is different, but profit does not mean "pecuniary" profit merely. Assuming that the sewer is here vested in the local authority, the defendants, nevertheless, are liable, as they were the constructors of the sewer, and it is their act which continues to send the sewage into it, and so into the river. Further, they are liable at common law even if the works were, in fact, sanctioned by the local authority, which, it is contended, they were not, and that liability is not excluded by the statute.

Cur. adv. vult.

May 16. — Lord ESHER, M.R.—In this case the question is whether or not the learned judge at the trial ought to have granted the injunction which the plaintiff asked for. That question depends largely on facts. But when the reasonable inference which is to be deduced from the facts is ascertained it becomes a question of law whether the injunction ought to be granted.

The defendants, being owners of land near a stream called the Cullingworth Beck, built a row of sixty-nine workmen's cottages. Before doing so they established the means of draining the cottages, by laying sewers and drains, of which they laid plans before the proper local authority. Some question was raised in argument as to what these plans showed, and as to whether they were really approved by the authority, but they bore the signature of the proper officer, and it must be taken that they were approved by the local authority as showing the system of draining these cottages, which was by means of drains from each cottage joining the long drain or sewer, which went the whole length of the cottages, and finally emptied the sewage into the Cullingworth Beck. The position, therefore, is that the defendants have laid two kinds of drains on their own land, approved of by the local authority, and the question is, What is the effect of the provisions of the Public Health Act upon that state of things?

Now, under that Act there are two kinds of drains, for, according to the definition, a drain means a drain for the purpose of draining one house only, and communicating with a sewer or a cesspool, and a "sewer" includes drains of every description except drains to which the definition of "drain" in the Act applies. Now the long drain laid by defendants is not one to which the definition of "drain" applies, and it is, therefore, a sewer. What, then, is the effect of this state of things? The answer to that question depends upon the true construction of the 13th section of the Act, which provides that all existing and future sewers within the district of a local authority, together with all buildings, works, materials, and things belonging thereto, shall vest in and be under the control of the local authority, with certain exceptions, amongst which are "sewers made by any person for his own profit or by any company for the profit of the shareholders."

The question of law, therefore, is, whether this sewer of the defendants was made by them for their own profit, and so came within the exception in the Act. In the first place it was made for the purpose of draining their own cottages, and no others. Does that constitute it a sewer made for "profit"? It is said it does, because it enhances the value of the cottages, which on sale would fetch more, or would let for a higher rent, by reason of their being drained, than they would if they were not. Both these things may be open to doubt. If there are large works in the neighbourhood, contiguity to which may be of importance to working men, it might make very little difference. But assume that it would; does that give the kind of profit which is meant by the exception? If it were so, then every house in the country is in that predicament, and every sewer is within the exception, and beyond the control of the local authority. The local authority could, however, then, say this, "You have made a good drain, but it is not made according to our ideas, and as we have a right in our discretion to have it so made, you must lay another alongside according to our satisfaction."

In my opinion that reduces the Act to nonsense, and therefore it seems to me that it is not the true construction of the section. We must hold, therefore, that when there is a sewer such as this one in question here, which takes the drainage from these cottages and carries it away, and which has been acceded to by the local authority, it is not within the exception, but is within the substantive part of the section, and is vested in and under the control of the local authority. What is the result of that view in this case? Why, the moment the sewage has passed from the house drains into the sewer, the owner of the drains has lost all property in it and all control over it, he cannot stop it nor can he then divert it. It would, therefore, be beyond all reason to grant an injunction against him to prevent it going into the Cullingworth Beck; that would not be possible. Therefore, on the facts, I am of opinion that the learned judge ought to have held that the facts gave rise to a state of law on which he could not grant an injunction. The appeal must therefore be allowed.

LOPES, L.J., delivered the following written judgment:—It is admitted that the injunction granted in this case is right, if the plaintiff has any cause of action against the defendants. But it is said the defendants are not liable.

The plaintiff is owner of lands on both sides of the Cullingworth Beck. The defendants have erected sixty-nine cottages on lands of theirs near the Beck, and constructed the drains of the cottages in such a manner as to drain sewage from the cottages into the Beck, whereby the water of the Beck was polluted, and the plaintiff, as riparian owner, injured. So far a strong primâ facie case is made against the defendants both at common law and under section 3 of the Rivers Pollution Act, 1876, which says: [the Lord Justice read the section, and continued:—] The defendants relied on the last paragraph of this section, and said the sewage matter complained of passed along a drain communicating with a sewer belonging to, and under the control of, the sanitary authority of the district, and that they had the sanction of the sanitary authority for its so doing. I think this was made out. The plans had been approved by the sanitary authority; those plans clearly indicated the nature and direction of the drainage, and I doubt not that all that, was done under the supervision and with the knowledge of the surveyor of the authority. The sewage passed along a drain used for the drainage of more than one building, and which was, therefore, within the definition of "sewer" contained in the definition section of the Public Health Act, 1875. Section 13 of that Act says: "All existing and future sewers within the district of a local authority, together with all buildings, works, materials, and things belonging thereto, shall vest in and be under the control of the local authority"; except, amongst other sewers, "sewers made by any person for his own profit or by any company for the profit of their shareholders."

The plaintiff contended that the sewer in question was made by the defendant company for their own profit or for the profit of their shareholders.

This is the material question in this case. I am of opinion that the sewer was not made by the company for their own profit or for the profit of their shareholders. A sewer made for profit, in my opinion, means, not a sewer made for the mere purpose of drainage, not a sewer made for the mere purpose of discharging matter not to be in any way utilized but which it was essential to get rid of for sanitary purposes; but a sewer made for the purpose of realizing a profit above and beyond and independently of any sanitary purpose. Such, for instance, as a sewer made to collect feculent matter with a view of utilizing it for manure.

It was said that all drainage to buildings was made for a profit, because the value of the buildings was enhanced thereby. Such a construction would make it almost impossible for any sewer to vest in the local authority, because all buildings would have as necessary incidents of their existence drainage attached to them, and the exception in section 13 of the Public Health Act, 1875, would be almost a nullity, as an exception—more cases would fall within the exception than the rule.

I presume the Legislature thought that all sewers dealing with mere drainage and disposing of it for mere sanitary purposes ought to vest in and be under the control of the sanitary authority, and be maintained at the expense of the ratepayers; but directly a sewer was made for the profit of the individuals or individual such a burden ought not to rest upon the ratepayers at large. The Public Heath Act, 1875, was "an Act for consolidating and amending the Acts relating to public health" and had nothing to do with private enterprize. The same construction was put upon the words "sewer made for profit" by Kay, L.J., in the case of Acton Local Board v. Batten, 28 Ch. D. 283, 33 W. R. Dig. 128, with which case I entirely agree. It was also the view adopted by the Divisional Court in Bonella v. Twickenham Board of Health, 18 Q. B. D. 783, a case subsequently affirmed in the Appeal Court in 20 Q. B. D. 63, and Lord Esher, at p. 66, says: We are of opinion that that sewer" (a sewer made by the owners of a building estate for the drainage of their houses in the street) "did not come within the exception in section 43 of the Public Health Act, 1848, or that in section 13 of the present Act (that is the Public Health Act, 1875), not being a sewer made by any person for his own profit or by any company for the profit of their shareholders."

I am unable to distinguish that case from the one before me. No injunction in these circumstances can, therefore, go against the defendants, and the appeal must be allowed.

A. L. SMITH, L.J., also delivered a written judgment as follows:—The plaintiff is a riparian owner upon the Cullingworth Beck, and the defendants are a building society who have recently built sixty-nine cottages for mill hands, together with a sewer which passes down Parkside-road and Victoria-street into the Beck. Into the sewer the defendants pass the sewage from the cottages by means of house drains and thence it passes down the sewer into the Beck. The plaintiff seeks an injunction to restrain the defendants from passing the sewage into this sewer and thence into the Beck. There was a claim for nominal damages for the pass, but this was not insisted upon. The defendants in answer allege that the sewer is not their property, that it is vested in the Wilden Local Authority by section 13 of the Public Health Act, 1875; that by section 21 of that Act they are entitled to drain their cottages into the sewer; and that section 3 of the Rivers Pollution Prevention Act, 1876, does not apply to this case because they have the sanction of the local authority for doing what they have done, which distinguishes their case from that of the Kirkheaton Local Board v. Ainley, ante, p. 99, [1892] 2 Q. B. 274, in which case the defendants had obtained no such sanction.

It appears to me that if the sewer be vested in the local authority, and the defendants have the sanction of the authority to do what they have done, then this action is not maintainable against them; for if it were, every householder whose house is drained into a sewer which is vested in, and is under, the control of a local authority, would be liable to be proceded against for what the local authority might do with the sewage which flowed out of the mouth of the sewer, although the householder is unable to direct as to how and in what way such sewage is to be dealt with. It is immaterial who orginally constructed the sewer. When once the sewer was vested in the local authority they are the persons liable for injury caused by the effluent from the sewer, and not the persons who drain into the sewer, as they are entitled to do by reason of the provisions of the Public Health Act, 1875.

Section 13 of the Act of 1875 enacts that "all existing and future sewers within the district of a local authority, . . . except, amongst others, sewers made by any person for his own profit and by any company for the profit of the shareholders, shall vest in and be under the control of the local authority." Now, what is the meaning of this exception? It is not disputed that but for this exception the sewer would have vested in the local authority.

The making of a sewer by a person wherein to drain his house might well be said to be for his own use and for his own benefit or advantage, but these are not the words; the words are a "sewer made for his own profit." It seems to me that the true meaning of the words is "a sewer out of which profit can be made by the person making it," and the true fact that a house may become enhanced in value by reason of having a sewer instead of a cesspool into which to drain, is not the true meaning of the exception. Huddleston, B., in the case of Bonella v. Twickenham Local Board of Health, gave, by way of example as to what he thought would be a sewer made by a person for his own profit, the case of a person making a sewer for the purpose of collecting and carrying the sewage to his sewage farm, or for the purpose of collecting and conveying sewage to be converted into manure at some particular place. I will give an instance. It will be noticed that a sewer need not necessarily convey sewage matter to constitute it a sewer. It would be none the less a sewer within the Act of 1875 if it conveyed rain or surface-water. The draining off of rain or surface-water collected from different premises by different feeders into one main drain would constitute the main drain a sewer within the meaning of the Act. In some manufacturing districts this is done, and the water is collected and passed on and distributed upon payment among different receivers. A sewer made for this purpose would, in my opinion, be within the exception.

It is, however, not necessary to speculate as to what would or would not be a sewer made by a person for his own profit, for I am clearly of opinion that a sewer made merely for the purpose of draining premises and for no other purpose (as in the present case) is not a sewer made for profit within the meaning of the exception; firstly, because it does not come within the ordinary meaning of the words used, and, secondly, as was pointed out by Kay, J., in The Acton Local Board v. Batten, 28 Ch. D., at p. 285, and by Fry, L.J., in Bonella v. Twickenham Local Board of Health, 20 Q. B. D., at p. 65, if it did, the exception would in reality eat up the rule. Lord Esher in that case held that a sewer made for the purpose of draining houses in a street was not within the exception, and in this I agree. This case was not cited to my brother Bruce, though the case of The Acton Local Board v. Batten was attempted to be distinguished.

In my judgment this sewer is not within the exception, and, consequently, did vest in the local authority.

As to whether the defendants had the sanction of the local authority for doing what they did, matters stood thus: It was proved that the defendants submitted plans to the local authority, that those plans showed the proposed sewer running down the centre of Park Side-road and Victoria-street, and that some discharge communications were to be made from the proposed cottages to the sewer, and that their plans were signed by the chairman of the local authority, and were passed by the board approving of the plans. It was not disputed by Mr. Atkinson for the plaintiff, and, even if not admitted, it is clear, that the proposed new sewer, as set out upon the approved ground plan, showed that this sewer was to debouch, as it in fact does, into Cullingworth Beck; and I cannot doubt, taking the elevation plans (also approved) in conjunction with the ground plan, that the true inference is that the local authority sanctioned the defendant draining these houses into the proposed new sewer; and the suggestion now made by the plaintiff that the local authority thought that the houses were going to be drained into cesspools is without foundation, for, if so, why was the sewer to be made? The local authority sanctioned the sewer which has been made, and it is not true to say that they did not know what the sewer was for when they constructed it. Section 3 of the Pollution of Rivers Prevention Act does not, therefore, apply to the defendants.

The plaintiff, in my opinion, has sued the wrong defendants. In my judgment, for the reasons I have given, this appeal must be allowed, and judgment entered for the defendant, with costs here and below.

SCALES v. HEYHOE. (a.)

Practice—Parties—Deceased person—No legal personal representative—Proceeding in absence—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 16, r. 46.

On the true construction of ord. 16, r. 46, it is necessary, in order to bind the estate of a deceased person who has no legal personal representative, that the order of the court should state that the judge has proceeded in the absence of any person representing or entitled to represent the estate of the deceased person, or has appointed some person to represent such estate.

A testator bequeathed his residuary personal estate to trustees upon trust, after the decease of the survivor of his wife and his sister, Sarah Scales, to pay one moiety of the annual interest to his nephew, William Scales, during his life, and the other moiety of such interest to his niece, Susan Scales, during her life. And in case the said William Scales or the said Susan Scales should leave any lawful issue him or her surviving, then the testator directed that all such residuary personal estate should after the decease of the survivor of them, the said William Scales and Susan Scales be equally divided between and amongst such lawful issue in equal shares and proportions; but in case neither of them should have any lawful issue him or her surviving, then the testator directed that all such residuary personal estate should be equally divided between and amongst all his next of kin that might be living at the decease of the survivor of them, the said William Scales and Susan Scales, according to the statute for the distribution of the estates and effects of persons dying intestate.

This will was construed in In re Richerson, Scales v. Heyhoe, 40 W. R. 233, [1892] 1 Ch. 379.

The testator died in 1864, leaving his sister, Sarah Scales, his heiress-at-law and sole next of kin. Sarah Scales survived the testator's wife and died in 1872 intestate, leaving her daughter, the said Susan Scales, her son, the said William Scales, and her grandchild, the plaintiff, Sarah Jane Scales, the daughter of a deceased son, her sole next of kin.

Susan Scales died in 1879, and by an order made in August, 1890, on an originating summons to which the present trustees of the will were plaintiffs and William Scales defendant it was declared that the said William Scales was entitled as from the death of the said Susan Scales by implication during his life to the moiety of the income of the testator's residuary personal estate bequeathed to the said Susan Scales during her life as well as to the other moiety of such income. It appeared on the statement of facts that Sarah Scales had no legal personal representative. The said Sarah Jane Scales was not made a party to the summons, though the trustees had notice that she had some claim.

In July, 1890, Sarah Jane Scales commenced the present action for the administration of the testator's estate. In February, 1892, she took out administration to the estate of Sarah Scales, and, having amended her writ in April, 1892, she claimed a declaration that the order of August, 1890, was not binding on her either in her own right or in her representative capacity, and contended that there was an intestacy as to the income of the moiety of the said Susan Scales during the life of the said William Scales.

William Scales died in October, 1890.

Levett, Q.C., and Sargant, for the plaintiff.—The plaintiff is not bound by the order of August, 1890. It does not appear on the face of the order that the attention of the judge was called to her claim, and ord. 16, r. 46, cannot be relied on. On the construction there was an intestacy.

Farwell, Q.C., and Kenyon Parker, for the representatives of William Scales, relied on ord. 16, r. 46, and cited Curtius v. Caledonian Fire and Life Assurance Co., 30 W. R. 125, 19 Ch. D. 534. They also contended that the order was right.

Byrne, Q.C., and Marcy, for the trustees.

CHITTY, J.—The plaintiff was not a party to the proceedings in chambers on the summons. No fault is to be imputed to the trustees on this account, for although they were aware that the plaintiff had some claim in the matter she did not insist on being made a party, and the summons was heard and disposed of in her absence.

The question is whether the plaintiff is bound by the order made on the summons. It is true that she had not at the date of the order on the summons clothed herself with the right as legal personal representative of her grandmother, Sarah Scales, the testator's sole next of kin, but it is the ordinary practice of the court to allow the person entitled to take out representation to be added as a party, and in the event of its being shown that the deceased's estate is entitled to some interest the order does not go till letters of administration have been taken out. In my opinion the plaintiff is not bound by the order of the 11th of August, 1890.

On the true construction of rule 46 of order 16 it is necessary that the order of the court should state that the judge has proceeded in the absence of any person representing or entitled to represent the deceased's estate, or has appointed some person to represent it, and my opinion is founded on the language of the order itself. There need not be a separate order to this effect; but it must appear on the face of the order that the court dispensed with the representative. This is apparent from the terms of the rule. The words "the order so made and any order consequent thereon" apply, of course, to the case where the court appoints some person to represent the estate, and equally apply, in my opinion, where the court proceeds in the absence of a representative. But there must be a constat on the face of the order that the attention of the judge was called to the point and that he decided to proceed.

On a summons under order 55 the court is not bound to have before it all the persons whose interests may be affected by the order, as in an old suit in chancery. That is one of the advantages of the Order, and the decisions show plainly that where the court does not require other persons to be served with the summons under rule 6 of order 55, there is no necessity for the court to express this on the face of the order. But order 55 was subsequent in date to rule 46 of order 16, and it affords no ground for varying that rule. Under that rule I think the decision of the court to proceed must be shown on the face of the order.

It has been the constant practice to draw up orders either dispensing with the representative or appointing some person to represent the estate.* Although, therefore, I am deciding the point for the first time, my decision is not a new one, but is in accordance with the established practice.

On the question of the construction of the will the court adhered to the decision arrived at in chambers on the 11th of August, 1890, following Armstrong v. Eldridge, 3 Bro. C. C. 215, and Pearce v. Edmeades, 3 Y. & Coll. Eq. Ex. 246.

BARNED v. SAX. (a.)

Will—Construction—Cease to carry on business—Sale of business to company—Managing directors.

A testator bequeathed his business, together with a leasehold messuage, to his sons. The will contained a proviso that, if the sons ceased to carry on the business, the leasehold messuage was to fall into residue. The sons sold the business to a limited company, of which they were appointed managing directors for life, and all the shares in which were held by them or their nominees.

Held, that the proviso was not repugnant to the gift, and that the testator's sons had ceased to carry on the business within the meaning of the proviso when they sold it to the company.

By his will dated the 13th of March, 1887, Julius Sax, who died on the 21st of August, 1890, bequeathed to his sons, M. B. Sax, A. L. Sax, and C. W. Sax, in equal shares the goodwill of his business of scientific instrument maker and the stock-in-trade, plant, and effects belonging thereto, including the lease of the business premises; and the testator declared that if his said sons should cease to carry on the said business, the said leasehold premises should thereupon fall into his residuary estate.

The testator left him surviving his said three sons. On the 7th of January, 1891, M. B. Sax assigned to his two brothers all his share of the business, including the said leasehold premises. In October, 1892, a company, called Julius Sax & Co. (Limited), with a capital of £20,000, was formed to take over and carry on the said business; and by an agreement dated the 15th of November, 1892, A. L. Sax and C. W. Sax assigned and transferred the said business and leasehold premises to the company, in consideration of £20,000, payable in 2,000 fully-paid shares of £10 each to the said defendants and their nominees. Under this agreement A. L. Sax and C. W. Sax were appointed managing directors of the company for life so long as they remained duly qualified.

This was an originating summons taken out by the trustees of the will of Julius Sax, to which A. L. Sax, C. W. Sax, and M. B. Sax were made defendants, to have it determined, inter alia, whether or not, under the circumstances, the defendants had ceased to carry on the said business within the meaning of the will, and whether the said leasehold premises had fallen into the testator's residuary estate.

The company and the debenture-holders appeared, and submitted to the jurisdiction of the court.

Waley, for M. B. Sax.

NORTH, J., said that on the construction of the will the proviso was operative; the business was given coupled with a proviso which was not repugnant to the gift, but which was clear and consistent with it, and which must be construed with it; the proviso was, however, only to take effect if a time should come when no son at all was carrying on the business. His lordship then continued:—With regard to the other point, as to whether the two sons have ceased to carry on the business or not, in one sense, no doubt, they have not ceased, as they are still engaged in carrying on a business which is called after their father's name. But after having sold the business to the company as their successors, in my opinion they have ceased themselves to carry on the business. It is said they are technically carrying it on as managing directors, but suppose they were no longer able to act as managing directors, would the fact that they owned shares in the company make the business theirs? I do not think it would. Suppose they sold their shares, could it be said after that that they were carrying on the business? It could not. Of course there are many degrees between selling all and selling some shares, but in my opinion they ceased to carry on the business when they handed it over to a company of which they are officials. If I were to say that they were now carrying on the business I cannot see any point at which I could subsequently say they had ceased to carry it on. In my opinion they ceased to carry on the business, within the meaning of the proviso in the will, when they sold it to a company to enable that company to carry it on as their successors.

Mortgage—Foreclosure—Claim for possession after decree absolute—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 18, r. 2.

In a foreclosure action the plaintiff did not ask for possession in his originating summons. An order for foreclosure absolute having been made, the plaintiff applied for delivery of possession.

Held, that after foreclosure absolute the court could make such order.

The plaintiff as mortgagee took out an originating summons for foreclosure against the defendant, but did not in the summons claim delivery of possession. An order nisi was made on the 7th of June, 1892, and the foreclosure was made absolute on the 1st of February, 1893. The plaintiff afterwards offered the property for sale; but at the auction his right to sell was disputed, and the defendant, who continued in possession of the property, denied such right. The plaintiff then moved ex parte for an order for delivery of possession.

Mulligan, for the motion.—Under ord. 18, r. 2, we are entitled to an order for possession. This rule, which relates to the joining of any cause of action without the leave of the court in an action for the recovery of land, expressly exempts such a case as the present, and provides: "Nothing in this Act shall prevent any plaintiff in an action for foreclosure or redemption from asking for or obtaining an order for delivery of the possession of the mortgaged property to the plaintiff on or after the order absolute for foreclosure or redemption."

He referred to Craven Bank v. Hartley, W. N., 1886, p. 189; Best v. Applegate, 36 W. R. 397, 37 Ch. D. 42; Keith v. Day, 37 W. R. 242, 39 Ch. D. 452.

NORTH, J.—I do not think the cases cited exactly apply. I think, however, on the general principle which they cover, I can make the order as asked.

Settled Land—Improvements—Tenant for life—Obligation to make payments to sinking fund—Validity—Settled Land Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 38), ss. 25, 26, 33, 51, 56.

Under a settlement made in 1877 trustees were enabled, at the request of the tenant for life, to raise certain sums of money for improvements which were, to a large extent, those authorized by the Settled Land Act, 1882, and to hand them over to him to be applied by him for such improvement purposes, without any liability on the part of the trustees to see to their application. The tenant for life was, according to the terms of the settlement, under an obligation to replace out of income the moneys so handed over to him by annual instalments of 1-25*th of each sum handed over to him. He received moneys from the trustees, applied them for improvements, and paid several contributions to the sinking fund.*

Held, that the obligation to recoup did not in any way affect the right of the tenant for life to exercise any of the powers of the Settled Land Act, 1882, and, consequently, did not contravene section 51 of that Act.

Adjourned summons.

This was an originating summons taken out by the trustees of a settlement, dated the 14th of April, 1877, under section 56, sub-section 3, of the Settled Land Act, 1882, for the determination of, inter alia, the question whether there was any obligation on Lord Vernon, the tenant for life under the settlement, to contribute any further payments to a certain sinking fund directed to be formed by the settlement. By the settlement in question the Vernon family estates were settled in strict settlement, and the trustees were authorized, with the consent of the tenant for life, to mortgage the settled estates in fee or for a term in order to raise a sum of £40,000, £10,000 of which was applicable for agricultural improvements and £30,000 for colliery improvements. The improvements authorized by the settlement were, to a large extent, those authorized by the Settled Land Act, 1882. The trustees were to keep separate accounts of the moneys so raised under the titles of "Estate Improvement Fund" and "Colliery Improvement Fund," and they were to pay the moneys when so required by the tenant for life to him to be applied by him for the purposes for which they were applicable under the settlement without liability on the part of the trustees to see to the application thereof, or for any misapplication or non-application thereof. The settlement provided that the annual income of the settled estates was to stand charged for twenty-five years from the respective dates when any such moneys were raised with the payment to the trustees of annual sums equal to one twenty-fifth part of the money so raised, which were to form sinking funds, and in default of payment by the tenant for life the same were to be raised under a term of 500 years. Each addition to the sinking funds was to be invested by the trustees, and held by them as moneys arising under the general power of sale. The trustees were, until the sums of £10,000 and £30,000 were required for the authorized purposes, to hold them upon the trusts declared concerning the moneys to arise under the general power of sale in the settlement. Such moneys were, amongst other purposes, to be applied in the purchase of other lands to be settled in the same manner as the estates originally settled. The powers of raising the £10,000 and £30,000 had been exercised, but not to the full extent, £4,200 having been raised for agricultural improvements and £22,100 for colliery improvements, and the money had been applied for such purposes at various dates between the 29th of November, 1883, and the 3rd of March, 1890. The sinking funds required by the settlement had been duly kept up, but did not as yet equal the amounts raised for the improvements.

L. Lopes, for the applicants.—The provision in the settlement which obliges the tenant for life to make payments to a sinking fund does not tend to prevent him from resorting to the Act of 1882, and is not void under section 51, which provides that any provision in a settlement which attempts in any manner to prohibit or prevent a tenant for life from exercising, or to induce him to abstain from exercising, or to put him into a position inconsistent with his exercising any power under the Act is to be deemed void. Lord Vernon is, therefore, bound to continue to make the payments.

Hastings, Q.C., and Maidlow, for Lord Vernon.—The policy of the Act is that a tenant for life should have power to improve the estate at the cost of the estate, and not out of the income arising from it. The provision in the settlement is contrary to the scheme and intention of the Act, and is consequently void. The money, when raised, was, under section 33 of the Act, applicable as capital money arising under the Act, and the improvements are such as could, under section 25 of the Act, have been made with such capital money. Section 15 of the Settled Land Act, 1890, empowers the court in any case where it appears proper to authorize capital money to be applied for improvements authorized by the Act or the Act of 1882, notwithstanding that a scheme was not before the execution of the improvements submitted for approval, as required by the Act of 1882, to the trustees of the settlement or to the court. That section is retrospective as regards improvements executed after the passing of the Act of 1882: In re Ormerod's Settled Estate, 40 W. R. 490, [1892] 2 Ch. 318. [STIRLING, J.—That is a discretionary power, and before exercising it I should have to be satisfied that the money has been expended in a manner authorized by the Settled Land Acts and that the expenditure was for the benefit of the estate.] The present question is a much larger one, namely, whether the provision in the settlement is not, as we submit it is, wholly void as being contrary to the policy of the Act.

STIRLING, J.—As regards this question, I do not feel that in the way in which it has been put before me there is any great difficulty. [His lordship referred to the provisions of the settlement of the Vernon estates, and remarked that the sums of money raised under the powers in the settlement were, under section 33 of the Settled Land Act, 1882, capital moneys applicable as such under the Act. He continued:—] What has happened is this. These powers have to a certain extent been exercised, and sums of money raised have been dealt with, not in accordance with the provisions of the Settled Land Act, but in accordance with the provisions of the settlement.

The settlement gives the tenant for life power to request the trustees to hand these funds over to him to be applied for improvement purposes.

The scheme of the settlement is that the funds, when raised, are to be handed over to the tenant for life at his request, to be applied for these improvement purposes, the trustees not being bound to see to the application of them. The improvement purposes sanctioned by the settlement are, to a large extent, those which are sanctioned by the Settled Land Act, 1882; in some respects, I think, they go beyond them; but in the main they are those approved by the Act. The trustees have handed over the funds to the tenant for life, and he has applied them for improvements accordingly. Under the terms of the settlement he is under an obligation to replace the sums raised by paying to the trustees annual instalments of one twenty-fifth of each sum handed over to him. The question is whether Lord Vernon is under any obligation to continue to make any further payments of the instalments. It seems to me that he is. The funds, when raised, constituted capital moneys under the Act. It was competent for the tenant for life, if he was so minded, to apply to the trustees to have the funds dealt with under that Act, and applied for improvements accordingly. Section 26 of the Act contains careful provisions as to the mode in which capital moneys shall be applied for improvements. Speaking shortly, there must either be a scheme sanctioned by the trustees or the sanction of the court must be got. The Act, for some reason or other, has not been resorted to, but the money has been handed over to the tenant for life to be dealt with by him under the settlement. Why, then, is he to be relieved from the obligation imposed on him by the settlement, of recouping one twenty-fifth out of the fund handed over to him from year to year? It is said that that obligation is contrary to the policy of the Act, and is void under section 51. But does that obligation as to recouping in case the powers of the settlement are resorted to, tend in any way to prevent the tenant for life from exercising any of the powers under the Act? I cannot see that it does. The obligation only arises when the money is handed over to the tenant for life to be dealt with by him in accordance with the settlement; but it was open to him, and it is still open to him, to resort to the powers of the Act. Instead of asking the trustees to hand over the fund to be dealt with by him according to the powers of the settlement, he might have gone to them and asked them to deal with the moneys under the Act, and in that case he would have been under no obligation to recoup at all. If the provision in the settlement had been that he was bound to recoup the money if it had been applied by the trustees under the Act, that would have been void; but that is not the case here. So far from the provision in question tending to prevent the tenant for life from exercising the powers under the Act, it seems to me that it offers a strong inducement to him to resort to the powers in the Act rather than to those in the settlement. Unfortunately, through ignorance or for some other reason, he has resorted to the powers of the settlement instead of those under the Act, and all I can say is that, having done so, he is bound to go on making the payments out of the money handed over to him; but that is entirely without prejudice to any application he may make under section 15 of the Settled Land Act, 1890. That Act was passed in order to remove what was supposed to be the bad effect of certain decisions of this court when money had been applied for improvements authorized by the court, but without going through the forms required by the Act of 1882. Upon the present summons I can only say that at present there is an obligation upon Lord Vernon to contribute further payments to the sinking fund in question, according to the provisions of the settlement.

In re PORTSEA ISLAND BUILDING SOCIETY. (a.)

Company—Winding up—Registered building society—County court—Special case jurisdiction—Building Societies Act, 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 42), s. 32, sub-section (4)—Companies (Winding-up) Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 63), s. 3, sub-section (3)—County Court Rules, ord. 41, r. 9.

In the winding up in the county court of a building society registered under the Building Societies Act, 1874, a special case for the opinion of the High Court may be stated under section 3, sub-section (3), of the Companies (Winding-up) Act, 1880.

The above-named society, which was a building society registered under the Building Societies Acts, was being wound up in the county court. The county court judge stated a special case, entitled in the Companies Acts, 1862 to 1890, the Building Societies Act, 1874, and the County Courts Act, 1888, for the determination of certain questions arising in the winding up. A preliminary objection was taken raising the question whether a judge of the county court could state a special case under section 3, sub-section (3), of the Companies (Winding-up) Act, 1890.

Finlay, Q.C., Bunting, and Frank Evans, for the committee of depositors, took the preliminary objec-objection that the county court had no jurisdiction to state a special case under the Companies (Winding-up) Act, 1890. The Companies (Winding-up) Act, 1890, has really nothing to do with the winding up of building societies registered under the Act of 1874. Under the 1874 statute the court for winding up purposes is the county court, and the Act of 1890 has been construed as not applying to the winding up of these societies. In 1892, however, the rule-making authority under the County Courts Act, 1888, made a rule (ord. 41, r. 9, also cited as rule 146) that the provisions of the Companies Acts, 1862 to 1890, and the rules made thereunder, so far as they related to winding up, should apply to the winding up of societies registered under the Building Societies Act, 1874, and that the winding up of any such societies should be conducted in all respects as if such societies were registered under any of the Companies Acts. That was probably meant to apply the procedure under the Acts to these liquidations. If it goes further it is ultrà vires, for the Act of 1888 only enables rules to be made for regulating procedure in the county court. But stating a special case is doing something more. The Legislature meant that building society liquidations are to be conducted in the county court; an appeal to a divisional court being given in a proper case. But if this rule applies the county court litigant may be dragged from his own district, not only to the High Court, but afterwards to the Appeal Court, and to the House of Lords.

Buckley, Q.C., and Emmanuel, for the liquidator, contended that there was jurisdiction to hear the special case.

Sir Henry James, Q.C., Bramwell Davis, and G. G. Greenwood, for other parties.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J.—A preliminary objection was raised to my hearing and deciding this special case on the ground that the special case was stated pursuant to the provisions of section 3 of the Companies (Winding-up) Act, 1890. That section provides, by sub-section 3, that "if any question arises in any winding-up proceeding in a county court, or in the Stannaries Court, which all the parties to the proceedings, or which one of them and the judge of the court may desire to have determined in the first instance in the High Court, the judge shall state the facts in the form of a special case for the opinion of the High Court, and thereupon the special case and the proceedings, or such of them as may be required, shall be transmitted to the High Court for the purposes of the determination." It was contended that this section only applies to the winding up of companies in the county court, and that it has no application to the winding up of a society registered under the Building Societies Acts. It was urged that the Act of 1890 is not incorporated with the Building Societies Act, 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 42), section 32 of which enacts, sub-section (4), that a society under the Act may terminate or be dissolved "by winding up either voluntarily under the supervision of the court or by the court," and that "general orders for regulating the proceedings of the court under this Act may be from time to time made by the authority for the time being empowered to make general orders for the court." And by section 4 of the same Act "the court means in England the county court of the district in which the chief office or place of meeting for the business of the society is situate.

Now, it was decided in Andrew v. The Swansea Cambrian Benefit Society, 29 W. R. 382, that the Companies Acts, 1862 and 1867, apply to liquidations under the Building Societies Act, 1874. It is said, and truly said, that this case does not decide that the Companies Act, 1890, applies to liquidations under the Building Societies Act, 1874, and that a decision that the Acts of 1862 and 1867, which were in force in 1874, are incorporated by implication in the subsequent Act of 1874 falls very short of a decision that the Act of 1874 by implication incorporates the Act of 1890, which was not in force when the Act of 1874 was passed.

This makes it necessary to examine the grounds of the decision in the above cited case—a case which, it may be observed, is confirmed by the decision in In re Sunderland Building Society, 37 W. R. 95, 21 Q. B. D. 349. Now Lindley, L.J. (then Lindley, J.), says in the former case that the true effect to his mind of the 32nd section of the Building Societies Act, 1874, is simply this—to substitute the county court for the Court of Chancery, and that it does in effect, although not expressly put, building societies, under the Companies Acts of 1862 and 1867 by virtue of the clauses in those Acts relating to industrial companies, although the Companies Acts, 1862 and 1867, are not expressly incorporated in the Building Societies Act. If this is the true ground of the decision it seems to me that the provisions in force at any particular time for the winding up of companies in the Chancery Division of the High Court, which now stands in the place of the Court of Chancery, will apply to a winding up in the county court of a building society, even though such provisions may be the result of enactments passed since 1874, for the only effect of the Act of 1874 is to substitute the county court as the tribunal for winding up instead of the High Court, and the duty of the county court will, at all times, be to apply to winding up in the county court the enactments which from time to time happen to be in force for the winding up of companies. If this view is right, it follows that the provisions of the Act of 1890 for stating a special case for the determination of questions arising in the winding up of a company in a county court will apply to the winding up of a building society in the county court. It is to be observed that the particular section which the judges in Andrew v. The Swansea Cambrian Benefit Society held to apply to the winding up of a building society was section 43 of the Companies Act, 1867, which section enacts that a person dissatisfied may appeal.

There was another ground urged before me as showing that I had jurisdiction to determine this special case; it was said that jurisdiction was given to me by the County Court Rules, 1892, ord. 41, r. 9, which rule is as follows:—"The provisions of the Companies Acts, 1862 to 1890, and the rules made thereunder, so far as they relate to winding up, shall apply to the winding up of societies registered under the Building Societies Act, 1874"; "and the winding up of any such societies shall be conducted in all respects as if such societies were companies registered under any of the said Companies Acts." And it was said that the judgments in Andrew v. The Swansea Cambrian Benefit Society applying the Acts of 1862 and 1867 to the winding up of a building society in the county court, were partly based upon the rules of the county court adopting the orders and rules in Chancery under the Companies Acts, 1862 and 1867, which were utterly unworkable without the Acts themselves. I prefer myself to base my decision on the ground first stated, because I do not think that section 164 of 51 & 52 Vict. c. 43, which enables five county court judges, with the approval of the Lord Chancellor and the Rule Committee of the High Court, to frame rules and orders for regulating the practice in the county courts, gives power by these rules to apply to a winding up under the Building Societies Act provisions of Acts of Parliament which are not by the Act itself expressly or impliedly applied to a winding up under the Building Societies Act. Indeed, I doubt whether it would be competent under section 164 of 51 & 52 Vict. c. 43, to frame a rule in the very terms of sub-section (3) of section 3 of the Companies (Winding-up) Act, 1890; for it seems to me that such a rule would do something more than regulate the practice of the county court. The objection must therefore be overruled.

SMITH v. ROBINSON. (a.)

Landlord and tenant—Covenant to pay charges—Nuisance arising from condition of drains—"Charges charged on the lessor in respect of the premises"—Public Health (London) Act, 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 76).

In the lease of a house by the plaintiff to the defendant, the defendant covenanted to "pay, bear, and discharge all land tax, sewers rate, main drainage rate, and all other rates, taxes, assessments, charges, or impositions whatever, parliamentary, parochial, or otherwise, which now are, or at any time during the continuance of this demise may be, taxed, charged, assessed, or imposed upon the said demised premises or any part thereof, or on the said yearly rent hereby reserved, or any part thereof, or on the lessor, his executors, administrators, and assigns for or in respect of the said premises."

The plaintiff, having incurred expenses under the Public Health (London) Act, 1891, in remedying a nuisance arising from an escape of sewer gas from the drains of the house into the basement, brought an action against the defendant to recover these expenses from him under the foregoing covenant.

Held, that the action was maintainable.

Appeal by the defendant from a decision of his Honour Judge Bayley, sitting at the Westminster County Court, in favour of the plaintiff. By indenture of lease dated the 19th of March, 1891, the plaintiff, William Smith, demised unto the defendant, Alfred Robinson, a dwelling-house for the term of seventeen years, at the rent of £60.

The lease contained a covenant on the part of the defendant that he "shall and will during the continuance of this demise pay, bear, and discharge all land tax, sewers rate, main drainage rate, and all other rates, taxes, assessments, charges, or impositions whatsoever, parliamentary, parochial, or otherwise, which now are or at any time during the continuance of this demise may be taxed, charged, assessed, or imposed upon the said demised premises, or any part thereof, or on the said yearly rent hereby reserved, or any part thereof, or on the lessor, his executors, administrators, and assigns, for or in respect of the said premises."

Then followed a covenant to repair as follows:—"The lessee, his executors, administrators, and assigns, shall and will forthwith put the said premises into complete repair at his and their own expense, and to the satisfaction of the lessor, his executors and administrators, and from time to time, and at all times during the said term hereby granted, at his and their own proper costs and charges well and sufficiently repair, support, uphold, maintain, pave, cleanse, glaze, amend, and keep the said messuage or tenement and premises hereby demised, with all and singular the appurtenances and all the walls, pales, posts, rails, pavements, sinks, sewers, drains, gutters, vaults, houses of office, and watercourses thereto belonging or in anywise appertaining, in, by, and with all needful and necessary reparations, when, where, and as often as need or occasion shall require, damage by fire only excepted."

In consequence of an order having been made upon the landlord, he incurred expenses under the Public Health (London) Act, 1891, in remedying a nuisance arising from the condition of the drains of the house, which allowed sewage gas to escape into the basement, and he brought an action against the defendant to recover these expenses from him.

The county court judge held that these expenses were a charge upon the lessor in respect of the premises, and gave judgment for the plaintiff.

The defendant appealed.

Lynden Bell, for the appellant.—The lessee was no liable. The charge was not a charge on the lessor i respect of the premises. [He cited Rawlins v. Brigg 27 W. R. 138, 3 C. P. D. 368; Budd v. Marshall, 2 W. R. 148, 5 C. P. D. 481, Lyon v. Greenhow, Times L. R. 457.] Hartley v. Hudson, 4 C. P. D 367, 28 W. R. Dig. 119, is distinguishable, as it di not relate to a nuisance. I admit that, unless th present case can be distinguished from Hartley v Hudson, that case binds me. But here there was misfeasance on the part of the landlord in not keepin the drains in repair. It is a charge on the landlor but not "in respect of the premises."

Cluer, for the respondent.—This was a Parli mentary charge imposed upon the owner. [He cite Crosse v. Raw, 23 W. R. 6, L. R. 9 Ex. 209; Budd v Marshall]. No distinction has ever before been take upon the ground of nuisance. [WRIGHT, J.—Is the any case of repairing an old drain?] Rawlins v

(a.) Reported by J. E. ALDOUS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Briggs was a case of additional drainage. [He also cited Allum v. Dickinson, 30 W. R. 930, 9 Q. B. D. 632, and Hartley v. Hudson.] This is a charge imposed by Parliament on the landlord in respect of the premises.

Lynden Bell, in reply.—In Crosse v. Raw there was the word "outgoings."

Cur. adv. vult.

June 2.—WRIGHT, J., who delivered the judgment of the COURT, said: The plaintiff let the house to the defendant, and the lease contained the following covenants on the part of the defendant. [His lordship read the two covenants set out above.] The defendant did not repair, and a nuisance arose from the condition of the drains. The usual proceedings were taken, and the works prescribed were performed by the plaintiff. He now brings this action to recover the expenses from the defendant. The case seems covered by authority, unless it is distinguishable on the ground that this is not a new drain. We have come to the conclusion that the covenant does apply. The whole matter is statutory, and arises out of the exercise by the local authority of its power to control in the public interest the uses and conditions of house property. The "nuisance" itself may be merely the creation of the statute—e.g., a nuisance only to the health of the occupier himself. The work to be done may be different from that which is necessary to abate a common law nuisance or to satisfy the repairing covenant. The expenses are recoverable by the local authority by statutory means. They are made a charge on the owner. The case is, therefore, within the words of the covenant, and, that being so, the cases as to new drains and paving expenses apply. Defendants have got off where there was no such word in the covenant as "charge," duty," or "outgoing," where there were no words extending to charges on the owner. But where the words are sufficient we must hold the governing intention to be that the landlord shall get his rent clear of all deductions.

Appeal dismissed.

YOUNG (Appellant) v. FOSTEN (Respondent). (a.)

Public health—London—Repair of drain—Drain required so as to be a nuisance—Builder employed by owner to do repair—Liability of builder in first instance for the nuisance—Public Health (London) Act, 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 76), s. 42.

A builder who is employed by the owner of a dwelling-house to repair a drain, and who repairs it so as to be a nuisance and injurious to health, is "the person who undertook or executed the repair" of the drain within the meaning of the 42nd section of the Public Health (London) Act, 1891, and may be proceeded against under that section in the first instance, although the owner is not summoned.

Case stated by the metropolitan police magistrate sitting at the South-Western Police Court.

The respondent had been summoned before the magistrate for that he did in the parish of Clapham, in the county of London, so repair a certain drain as to be a nuisance and injurious to health. The following facts were to be taken as admitted:—

The summons was taken out by the appellant on behalf of, and by the direction of, the board of works for the Wandsworth district, which board is the sanitary authority for the parish of Clapham.

In or about the month of October, 1892, the sanitary authority received information that, by by reason of a defect of a structural character, the drain to a certain dwelling-house was in such a state as to be a nuisance and injurious to health. Immediately after the receipt of this information the sanitary authority served upon the owner of the dwelling-house a notice requiring him to abate the nuisance within a specified time, and to execute and do such works as might be necessary for that purpose.

The owner, who neither resided nor carried on business in the house, immediately upon the receipt of the notice from the sanitary authority, gave instructions to the respondent, who is a builder, to do the necessary repairs to the drain, in order to abate the nuisance and carry out the requirements of the sanitary authority.

The respondent thereupon took up and relaid the drain, and shortly afterwards an inspector, acting for the sanitary authority, visited the house and tested the drain, when he found, as the fact was, that the joints of the pipes composing the drain were not properly cemented, and that the drain was leaky and in such a state as to be a nuisance and injurious to health. The inspector then called the attention of the respondent to the condition of the drain, but the respondent then declined to do anything further to the drain.

The sanitary authority then caused the summons to be taken out by the appellant on their behalf, under the Public Health (London) Act, 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 76), s. 42, against the respondent.

On the hearing of this summons it was contended by the appellant that the respondent, the builder who actually did the repairs to the drain, was a person who undertook or executed the said repairs within the meaning of the section.

The magistrate, however, dismissed the summons without calling on the respondent to address him or offer any evidence, being of opinion that upon the true construction of the section, and as a matter of law, the owner of the dwelling-house was the person who, in the first instance, undertook the said repairs within the meaning of the section; and that the respondent was not liable to be summoned, except under the circumstances set out in the proviso under the said section.

The magistrate having stated the present case, the question now was whether the magistrate was right in so holding.

Section 42 of the Public Health (London) Act, 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 76), provides:—

"If a water-closet or drain is so constructed or repaired as to be a nuisance or injurious or dangerous to health, the person who undertook or executed such construction or repair shall, unless he shows that such construction or repair was not due to any wilful act, neglect, or default, be liable to a fine not exceeding twenty pounds:

"Provided that, where a person is charged with an offence under this section, he shall be entitled, upon information duly laid by him, to have any other person, being his agent, servant, or workman, whom he charges as the actual offender, brought before the court at the time appointed for hearing the charge, and if he proves to the satisfaction of the court that he had used due diligence to prevent the commission of the offence, and that the said other person committed the offence without his knowledge, consent, or connivance, he shall be exempt from any fine, and the said other person may be summarily convicted of the offence."

Earle, for the appellant.—The magistrate fell into the error of supposing that the proviso created a new offence. It creates no new offence, the offence being created under the earlier part of the section, under which the actual offender is liable. Here the builder is liable in the first instance, as he is the person who undertook or executed the repair within the meaning of that section, and he is therefore the actual offender who has committed the offence under the first part of the section, and the proviso would only be a defence for him if he could show that some other person actually committed the offence.

The respondent appeared in person.

The COURT (CHARLES and VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, JJ.) held that the learned magistrate took an erroneous view of the section, as the respondent was the person who undertook the execution of the construction or the repairs of the drain within the meaning of the section, and that, therefore, he could be summoned and dealt with under the section in the first instance.

Appeal allowed; case remitted to the magistrate.

Act of bankruptcy—Notice of suspension of payment—Letter marked "without prejudice"—Admissibility—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 4, sub-section 1 (h).

A bankruptcy petition presented against the debtor alleged as the act of bankruptcy that specified in section 4, sub-section 1 (h), of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883—namely, that the debtor had given notice to the creditor that he had suspended, or was about to suspend, payment of his debts. The notice was given by a letter written by the debtor to the creditor, such letter being marked "Private and Confidential. Without prejudice"; and, on the hearing of the petition, the question was raised whether the letter could be looked at by the court for the purpose of determining whether an act of bankruptcy had been committed.

Held, that the letter was admissible in evidence, and, the act of bankruptcy being thereby proved, a receiving order must be made against the debtor.

Appeal from an order of the registrar of the Brighton County Court dismissing a bankruptcy petition on the ground that no act of bankruptcy had been proved.

The debtor was a solicitor, and was indebted to the appellant in the sum of £949, moneys entrusted to him to invest. An action had been commenced by the appellant against the debtor, the writ being issued on the 15th of December, 1892, and judgment obtained on the 25th of January, 1893.

On the 24th of December, 1892, a letter in the form of a circular was sent by the debtor to the appellant, which stated that he was unable to pay his debts in full, and offering a composition. It was practically admitted that this letter amounted to a notice of suspension of payment under section 4, sub-section 1 (h), of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, and a bankruptcy petition was subsequently presented by the appellant against the debtor founded on the letter as an act of bankruptcy.

The letter was, however, headed "Private and confidential—without prejudice," and the question was raised whether it could be looked at by the court for the purpose of determining whether an act of bankruptcy had been committed.

The county court registrar declined to admit the letter as evidence, and dismissed the petition.

The petitioning creditor now appealed.

Muir Mackenzie, for the petitioning creditor.—The registrar appears to have been influenced by some rather wide language in the case of Walker v. Wilsher, 37 W. R. 723, 23 Q. B. D. 335. But it would be really making nothing of the Act of Parliament if a debtor can give notice of suspension without prejudice. A person can no more commit an act of bankruptcy without prejudice than he can make a false representation in a prospectus without prejudice. This letter is plainly on the face of it one of a series to all the creditors.

He also referred to Jones v. Foxall, 15 Beav. 388.

Gore, for the debtor.—The letter contains an offer made without prejudice. It could not be used as evidence in an action between the parties, and the protection is not confined to an action only, but extends to other proceedings, such as bankruptcy.

He referred to Ex parte Harris, 23 W. R. 531; Jones v. Foxall; In re River Steamer Co., 19 W. R. 1130, L. R. 6 Ch. App. 822; Walker v. Wilsher; Paddock v. Forrester, 3 Scott N. R., at p. 735; Hoghton v. Hoghton, 15 Beav. 278.

Cur. adv. vult.

May 6.—VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J.—In this case the question raised is as to the admissibility of a document which is expressed to be written "without prejudice." The question arose in this way. A petition in bankruptcy was presented which alleged as an act of bankruptcy that the debtor had given notice to a creditor that he had suspended payment or was about to do so. It was proposed to prove this act of bankruptcy by the production of the document in question. It was objected that the document could not be put in evidence, being written "without prejudice." It was suggested in answer to this objection that the document in fact was a circular addressed by the debtor to his creditors, and that a document of such a character would be admissible in evidence, although headed "without prejudice." To this it was replied that there was no evidence dehors the document itself, that it was a document of such a character, or that it had been sent to any one beside the petitioner.

The petitioner by his counsel in reply to a question by the learned registrar before whom the petition was being heard, deliberately elected to rely only on the sending of the circular to the petitioner, and offered no evidence of the document having been sent to any other creditors. Under these circumstances it did not seem to us that we ought to allow further evidence to be put in on the appeal. We have, therefore, to decide the case on the materials before the learned registrar, who decided that the document was inadmissible, and dismissed the petition for want of proof of the act of bankruptcy alleged. In my opinion this decision was wrong. I think that the document was admissible in evidence. In the first place, I think that the court was entitled to look at the document and its contents for the purpose of deciding the question of its admissibility.

It seems to me that the question of its admissibility depended upon a matter of fact, which matter of fact it was the function of the registrar in his character of judge, and not in his character as a juryman, to decide: Cleave v. Jones, 7 Ex. 421; Froude v. Hobbs, 1 F. & F. 612; and it seems to me that the judge for this purpose was entitled to look at the document, though not in evidence, just as he would have been entitled to have looked at the document if he had been trying a case before a jury, before allowing it to be put in evidence before the jury: Boyle v. Wiseman, 3 W. R. 577, 11 Ex. 360.

In my opinion the rule which excludes documents marked "without prejudice" has no application unless some person is in dispute or negotiation with another, and terms are offered for the settlement of the dispute or negotiation, and it seems to me that the judge must necessarily be entitled to look at the document in order to determine whether the conditions under which alone the rule applies, exist. The rule is a rule adopted to enable disputants without prejudice to engage in discussion for the purpose of arriving at terms of peace, and unless there is a dispute or negotiation and an offer the rule has no application. It seems to me that the judge must be entitled to look at the document to determine whether the document does contain an offer of terms.

Moreover, I think that the rule has no application to a document which in its nature may prejudice the person to whom it is addressed. It may be that the words "without prejudice" are intended to mean without prejudice to the writer if the offer is rejected, but, in my opinion, the writer is not entitled to make this reservation in respect of a document which, from its character, may prejudice the person to whom it is addressed if he should reject the offer, and for this reason also I think the judge is entitled to look at the document to determine its character.

The next question which arises is the question whether this document is of a character fulfilling the conditions to which the rule of exclusion applies. It seems to me that some of the conditions are complied with, but not all. There was a dispute, for there was an action pending between the parties. There was an offer, i.e., the offer of a composition which was intended to apply amongst other things to the petitioner's claim in the action, but the document, the letter of the debtor to the petitioner, was, in my opinion, more than this. It was a clear act of bankruptcy, and it was notice to the petitioner of such act of bankruptcy, and it seems to me that a notice of an act of bankruptcy cannot be given "without prejudice," because the document in question was one which from its character might prejudicially affect the recipient, whether or not he accepted the terms offered thereby.

For the reasons I have already given I think that such a document does not fall within the rule which excludes offers for peace written without prejudice, and ought to have been admitted in evidence. If admitted, it conclusively proves the act of bankruptcy. It follows that the learned registrar ought to have made the receiving order on the petition, and we now make it and allow this appeal.

Divorce—English domicile—Foreign decree at suit of wife—Unjust allegation—Non-submission of husband to foreign jurisdiction—English suit—Philadelphian law.

A domiciled Englishman married in England a native of the United States of America. After a time the wife left the husband of her own accord without any cause, and, returning to America, refused to return to this country. She applied for and obtained from the court at Philadelphia, under a recent Act of that court, a decree dissolving the marriage, on the ground of her husband's cruelty. The husband was served with a citation to appear in the proceedings, but, acting on advice, he refused to submit to the jurisdiction of the court of Philadelphia, and did not appear. The wife subsequently went through a ceremony of marriage in Philadelphia with the co-respondent, and they cohabited together.

Held, that, though the marriage in America was legal there, the decree there dissolving the English marriage was not binding in this country, and could not affect the petitioner, who was a domiciled Englishman and had never been resident in Philadelphia or submitted himself to the jurisdiction of that court, and that the English marriage was still valid and binding; and this court accordingly pronounced a decree nisi dissolving that marriage, on the ground of the adultery of the respondent and co-respondent.

Hearing before the court itself of the husband's petition, praying for dissolution of the marriage by reason of the wife's adultery with the co-respondent. The evidence proved that Mr. James Green, a domiciled Englishman, carrying on business in London, met the respondent, then Mrs. Ida Woodruff, a widow, born in the United States of America, on a steamer, as he was returning from America, and on January 20, 1880, they were married at St. Mary Abbott's Church, Kensington, and cohabited together till April 23, 1890, when the respondent returned to America, as she alleged on account of the illness of her mother and her sister's marriage. She parted from the petitioner on friendly terms with an arrangement that she should return in June. Various excuses were given why she did not return, in spite of affectionate remonstrances from her husband, and ultimately he was asked to consent to divorce in the United States, but refused.

On July 7, 1891, the petitioner received a citation to appear in the Court of Common Pleas at Philadelphia to defend his wife's suit for "libel," brought for the purpose of obtaining a divorce on the ground of cruelty. Acting on the advice of his solicitors he did not appear, and in his absence, on July 2, 1892, the court of Philadelphia pronounced a decree dissolving the marriage on the ground of cruelty. It was proved that on June 9, 1891, the Pennsylvania Legislature passed an Act described as supplemented to the Act of 1855, and which extended the jurisdiction of the court to all cases of divorce from matrimonial bonds and from bed and board, when it should be shown in the petition to the court by any wife that she was formerly a citizen of the commonwealth, and that having intermarried with a citizen of any other State or foreign country, she had been compelled to abandon the habitation or domicile of her husband by reason of his adultery, barbarous treatment, or desertion. The pleadings which were served on the petitioner contained allegations which, if true, complied with the terms of this Act.

Jan. 31.—BARNES, J., after going through the evidence, said:—The evidence in this case satisfies me that the charges made against the petitioner, in the American court were unfounded, and that the American decree was unjustly pronounced. The curious result is that the marriage of the respondent with the co-respondent, in America is legal, whilst the English marriage is still legally binding here. I have looked into the cases from the time of Lolley's case, Russ. & Ry. 237, down to Tollemache v. Tollemache, 1 Sw. & Tr. 557, 7 W. R. Div. Dig. 12, and Harvey v. Farnie, 31 W. R. 433, 8 App Cas. 43, and I find no case in which it has ever been decided that a man can be divorced from his wife by the laws of a country in which he has never been resident or domiciled. Here the domicile of the petitioner was and always has been English, and as a matter of law the respondent by her marriage acquired an English domicile. She left the petitioner of her own accord and without any cause whatever. The petitioner never submitted himself to the jurisdiction of the American court, and the decree was obtained there on grounds which would not have enabled the court to pronounce a decree here. There is no case precisely in point, but on the principle laid down in Shaw v. Attorney-General, 18 W. R. 1145, L. R. 2 P. & D. 156, it is clear that though the decree of divorce may be treated as valid in America, this court cannot recognize it as putting an end to a marriage binding in this country—the petitioner being domiciled in England. The respondent has therefore been guilty of adultery with the co-respondent, and I pronounce a decree nisi for the dissolution of the marriage.

Divorce—Adultery of petitioner—Ignorance of law—Special circumstances—Discretionary bar—Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857 (20 & 21 Vict. c. 85), s. 31.

On the hearing of a husband's petition for dissolution of the marriage on the ground of his wife's adultery, it was proved that the husband and wife signed a paper to the effect that they agreed to separate, and that each was at liberty to marry again. The husband, who was in humble rank, was advised by a friend who had done the same thing himself, and to whom the husband mentioned that he wanted a divorce, that this document would be legal and binding; and the court found on the evidence that the husband believed this. The husband lived for eighteen months as a single man, and then met a lady to whom he communicated the above facts, and she consented to and did go through a ceremony of marriage with him, and they lived together as man and wife for three years, when someone informed the husband that he was living in adultery, and, after consulting a solicitor, and on learning that the second marriage was not legal, he separated from the lady and took his own wife back; she did not remain long with him, and the charge against her was proved.

Held, that, as the petitioner acted in ignorance of the law, and in the bonâ fide belief that the second marriage was legal, it was a proper case for the court to exercise its discretion under section 31 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857, to excuse the adultery of the petitioner. The court accordingly pronounced a decree nisi for dissolution of the marriage.

Hearing before the court itself of the husband's petition for dissolution of the marriage on the ground of his wife's adultery with the co-respondent, James Thomasson. The wife entered no appearance, the co-respondent appeared and pleaded that at the time when the adultery was committed he did not know the respondent was a married woman.

It appeared from the evidence of the petitioner and other witnesses that the parties were married on the 30th of April, 1872, at Spotwood, in the county of Lancaster, and cohabited together till 1882, with the exception of two short periods during which the respondent left the petitioner in consequence of his having indulged in drinking, and in 1882 she finally left him for the same cause and went to live with a man named Clegg, and with the exception of about three months in 1889 continued to live with him until his death, after which, in November 1891, she married the co-respondent. On his wife leaving him the petitioner consulted a friend who said it would be foolish to spend money on a divorce, as he and his wife could sign a paper giving each other leave to marry again, and that he and his wife had done so, and that his brother, who drew up the paper for him, would do so for the petitioner. In the result a paper was drawn up and signed, which, however, could not be produced, the substance of it was stated to be that the parties agreed to separate and each was free to marry again. The petitioner remained single for eighteen months, till he met a Miss Naylor, a Sunday-school teacher, to whom he explained all the circumstances and they were married in 1886, and lived together till 1889, when another Sunday-school teacher told him that the paper was invalid, and that he was living in adultery. He consulted a solicitor and at once separated from Miss Naylor, and communicated with his wife, who resumed cohabitation with him for a few months, but after that went back and lived with Clegg.

Priestley, for the petitioner, submitted that as the ceremony of marriage with Naylor was gone through in the bonâ fide belief that the petitioner was free to marry again, it was a proper case for the court to exercise the discretion given to it under section 31 of the Divorce Act, 1857, and grant the petitioner's prayer for divorce, notwithstanding his adultery.

In addition to the cases mentioned in the judgment he referred to Collins v. Collins, 33 W. R. 170, 9 P. D. 231; Conradi v. Conradi, 16 W. R. 1023, L. Cur. adv. vult.

Jan. 31.—BARNES, J., after reviewing the evidence said: The principle on which the court acts in these cases has been distinctly laid down: there must be some special circumstances attending the commission of such adultery, or special features placing it in some category capable of distinct statement and recognition to justify the court in exercising the discretion given to it under section 31 of the Divorce Act, 1857, in favour of the petitioner. There are three classes of cases, and they are set out in the judgment in Morgan v. Morgan and Porter, 17 W. R. 688, L. R. 1 P. & D. 644.

The first is ignorance of facts, such as in Joseph v. Joseph and Wenzell, 13 W. R. 872, where a man married again believing that his first wife was dead. There is also ignorance of law, as in Noble v. Noble, L. R. 1 P. & D. 691, 17 W. R. Div. Dig. 7, and Moore v. Moore, [1892] P. 382, where the petitioner married again before the decree nisi was made absolute under the impression that the first marriage had been finally dissolved.

It is argued that this case comes within that category, and that the petitioner entered into the second marriage in the bonâ fide belief that the first marriage had been dissolved. After hearing the evidence, I have come to the conclusion that the petitioner honestly believed that his first marriage had been legally dissolved. He was a man in a humble rank of life, he knew nothing about law—according to his own counsel, he was a stupid man, unable to understand his legal position, and was misled. In proof of that it was proved that he entered into the second marriage by banns. He explained the circumstances to his second wife, and as soon as he discovered, and that only in casual conversation, that the second marriage was illegal he separated from her and returned to his first wife, and if his wife had not left him again they would have been living together now. The conclusion to which I have come is that he acted bonâ fide, and that this case comes within the second category of cases—viz., that of persons who have acted in ignorance of the law. There will, therefore, be a decree nisi, but no costs against the co-respondent, as he has sworn that he believed the respondent to be a widow when he married her, and no evidence to the contrary was given.

(Lord Esher, M.R., and Bowen and Kay, L.JJ.) June 26.

BENTSEN v. TAYLOR, SONS, & CO. (a.)

Practice—Trial—New trial—Security for costs of motion—Foreigner resident abroad.

The plaintiff, a foreigner resident abroad and having no property within the jurisdiction, was ordered to give security for the costs of an action brought by him in the Queen's Bench Division. At the trial with a jury the verdict and judgment were entered for the defendants. The plaintiff moved for a new trial, and the defendants applied that the plaintiff should be ordered to give security for the costs of the motion for a new trial.

Held, that the proper practice was to make the application in the first instance at chambers, subject to an appeal direct to the Court of Appeal.

Application by the defendants that the plaintiff should be ordered to give security for the costs of a motion by him for a new trial of the action.

The plaintiff was a foreigner resident abroad, and having no property within the jurisdiction. Before the trial he had been ordered to give security for the costs of the action. The action was tried with a jury, and resulted in a verdict and judgment for the defendants. The question now arose whether the application ought not to have been made in chambers.

Carver, for the defendants.

Hodges, for the plaintiff.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—The question in this case is, what is the proper practice in this matter? This court, in taking motions for new trials, is now exercising the jurisdiction formerly exercised by the courts of common law at Westminster, or in later times by the Queen's Bench Division, There was jurisdiction in those courts to order a foreigner who invoked the assistance of the court, and who resided abroad and had no property here, to give security for the costs of the action. The practice was to exercise that jurisdiction at chambers. If, after giving security, the foreigner took a new step in the litigation not contemplated when the amount of the security was fixed, the practice was to apply at chambers to have the amount of the security increased. If again after the trial the foreigner applied for a new trial, I have little doubt that the judge at chambers would have said that that step was not in contemplation when the amount of the security was fixed, and would accordingly increase the amount. That seems to me to have been the former practice.

Now the motion for a new trial is made to this court. We exercise in that respect the jurisdiction formerly exercised by the old courts at Westminster and by the Queen's Bench Division, and we shall exercise it in as nearly the same way as possible. There must be an increase in the amount of the security in respect of this motion for a new trial, and we think that the proper practice is for the application for the increase of security to be made in chambers as it formerly was. From the decision in chambers an appeal will lie direct to this court, and not to the Queen's Bench Division, though I may add that any such appeal would be almost hopeless, except in an extreme case. Upon this occasion, however, we do not intend to send the matter back to chambers, but will exercise the jurisdiction here, and we fix the amount of security in respect of the motion for a new trial at £20. If a new trial should be granted this sum does not include the security for the costs of the new trial, and any application as to that, if necessary, must be made in the Queen's Bench Division in the same way as the original application for security for the costs of the action.

KEARNEY v. WHITEHAVEN COLLIERY CO. (a.)

Master and servant—Wages—Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1887 (50 & 51 Vict. c. 58), s. 12—Payment by weight—Deductions—Fines—Contract of employment—Agreement for allowance of fines—Validity of contract.

According to the true construction of section 12 of the Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1887, which provides for the payment of miners by weight, subject to the right of masters and men to agree upon certain deductions, the "deductions" therein mentioned are deductions from weight, not from wages. That from which the deduction is to be made is the whole amount of material which is sent up in tubs from the mine. That which is to be deducted is the foreign substance which is sent up in the tubs with the coal, or the slack or coal dust with which the tubs are improperly filled. Any other mode of making deductions is in contravention of the statute.

The appellant entered into a contract of employment with the respondents, who were the owners of a colliery, by which he agreed not to leave his employment without giving fourteen days' notice, and further agreed that deductions might be made from his wages in respect of (inter alia) "fines for dirt." A system of fines and forfeitures was in force at the colliery in respect of dirt sent up with the coal, under which, if a collier sent up a tub containing more than 35*lb. of dirt, he was to receive no payment in respect of such tub; if a tub contained between* 25*lb. and* 35*lb. of dirt, he was to receive half payment; and if a tub contained less than* 25*lb. of dirt, he was to receive full payment.*

The appellant having left his employment without giving notice, and having justified on the ground that the above system was unlawful, and therefore the contract of employment was illegal,

Held, that such fines and forfeitures were not deductions within the meaning of section 12 of the Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1887, and that the system adopted was in contravention thereof; but that the contract of employment was not thereby rendered illegal, and the appellant was liable in damages to the respondents.

Netherseal Colliery Co. v. Bourne, 14 App. Cas. 228, 37 W. R. Dig. 119, considered.

Appeal from the decision of a divisional court on a special case stated by justices of Cumberland.

At a petty sessions holden at Whitehaven on the 10th of March, 1892, a summons was heard which had been taken out by the Whitehaven Colliery Co. under the Employers and Workmen Act, 1875, against Patrick Kearney, claiming 7s. 6d. for damages for breach of a contract, such breach being his neglect to proceed to or perform his duties as a collier on Thursday and Friday, March 3 and 4. Summonses had also been taken out against 289 other colliers then employed in the same pit, but the case of Kearney alone was heard. It was proved that the appellant (Kearney) was in the employment of the respondents (the colliery company), and in consequence of the absence of the appellant and other miners the respondents incurred loss—namely, the wages paid to enginemen and others in receipt of a fixed rate of wages who were in attendance at the pit, but whose work was rendered unremunerative. A system of fines or forfeitures was in force at the pit in respect of dirt sent up with the coal. This had been revised on December 2, 1891, as follows:—There was to be no fine or forfeiture if, after the coal was riddled, the amount of dirt in the tub did not exceed 25lb.; if the amount was between 25lb. and 35lb., one-half of the tub was to be forfeited, and the collier was only to receive half-pay for that tub; if the dirt exceeded 35lb., the whole tub was to be forfeited. The tubs weighed about 15cwt. each.

The method of testing for dirt was as follows:—As the tubs came out of the pit, certain persons in the employment of the masters selected tubs at their discretion, about one or two in every forty, and passed them to specially-appointed persons called "testers" for the purpose of inspection. The testers riddled the coal and hand-picked the contents of the riddle, separating the dirt from the coal. The dirt was then weighed, and the weight reported to the weighman. The weighman, and the check-weighman who represented the colliers and was paid by them, then made up their sheets, showing all forfeitures, which were calculated on the scale set out above. No deduction was made in respect of tubs which were not tested, the colliers being paid in respect of the gross weight in those tubs, including coal and dirt. The magistrates found that the dirt was not coal, nor of the nature or substance of coal.

The form of contract signed by the appellant contained the following terms:—"I, the undersigned, in consideration of being employed at this colliery, do hereby agree to give to and to receive from the Whitehaven Colliery Co. fourteen days' notice to terminate such employment, and in the event of my leaving (either individually or collectively) without giving such notice to render myself liable to be proceeded against according to law. And I also agree to the company making the undermentioned deduction from my wages allowed by the Truck Acts, 1831 and 1887, namely (inter alia), fines for dirt."

It was submitted by the appellant that this system of fines was illegal, and that the appellant was justified in refusing to work. The magistrates held that the appellant was not justified in refusing to work. It was further submitted that the appellant, being paid by piecework, was not liable in damages if he neglected to continue his work, unless injury was thereby caused to property or machinery. The magistrates held the appellant to be liable in damages, and ordered him to pay 7s. 6d., that being a fair proportion, in their opinion, of the actual loss sustained by the respondents for wages paid by them in respect of the pit on the 3rd and 4th of March, and rendered unremunerative in consequence of the absence of the appellant and other men on those days.

Section 12 of the Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1887 (50 & 51 Vict. c. 58), is as follows:—"Where the amount of wages paid to any of the persons employed in a mine depends on the amount of mineral gotten by them, those persons shall be paid according to the actual weight gotten by them of the mineral contracted to be gotten, and the mineral gotten by them shall be truly weighed at a place as near to the pit mouth as is reasonably practicable. Provided that nothing in this section shall preclude the owner . . . from agreeing with the persons employed in the mine that deductions shall be made in respect of stones or substances other than the mineral contracted to be gotten, which shall be sent out of the mine with the mineral contracted to be gotten, or in respect of any tubs, baskets, or hutches being improperly filled, . . . such deductions being determined in such special mode as may be agreed upon between the owner . . . and the persons employed."

The magistrates, at the request of Kearney, stated a special case, setting out the above facts and leaving the following questions for the opinion of the court:—"(1) Were we right in holding that the appellant was not justified in leaving his work without notice? (2) In the event of the appellant not being justified in leaving his work without notice, were we right in holding that the appellant was liable in damages to the respondents?"

The Divisional Court (Grantham and Charles, JJ.) were of opinion that the appellant was not justified in leaving work without notice, and that he was liable in damages to the respondents, and they accordingly upheld the decision of the magistrates. The learned judges, however, differed in the reasons which they gave for their judgment. Grantham, J., thought that the system of fines adopted at the colliery was a special mode of determining how deductions should be made within the meaning of the Act, and was, therefore, perfectly legal. Charles, J., thought that such a system of deductions was in contravention of the statute, and therefore illegal, but he did not think that this illegality vitiated the whole contract of employment.

Kearney appealed to the Court of Appeal.

Willis, Q.C., and Atherley-Jones, for the appellant.—The system of forfeitures is a contravention of the Act of Parliament. The meaning of section 12 of the Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1887, is that in all cases to which the section applies, persons working in mines must be paid according to the weight of the mineral gotten by them. Payment by weight is the thing which the Legislature intended to insist upon. The proviso points out a way in which the weight on which payment is to be made, may be ascertained. The masters and men may arrange on a mode of making deductions in respect of stones and other foreign substances which may be brought up with the mineral. But the fundamental idea of the section is that payment is to be in accordance with weight, and that each man is to be paid in respect of all mineral gotten by him. "Deductions" means deductions from gross weight: Netherseal Colliery Co. v. Bourne, 14 App. Cas. 228, 37 W. R. Dig. 119. The system of forfeitures adopted in this case provides for deductions in wages, not deductions in weight, and violates the intention of the section altogether. Under it if a tub is found to contain 36lbs. of dirt, though the rest of its contents is all pure mineral, nothing is to be paid in respect of that tub. That is not payment by weight at all, it is not payment in respect of all the mineral which a man has gotten. It is not, of course, necessary to weigh and test every tub. It might be arranged that every tenth tub should be tested, and an average taken, and deductions made accordingly. That would be a special mode of making deductions within the meaning of the proviso. It would conform to the ruling idea of the enactment—viz., that payment should be by weight. But under this system, if there is a certain amount of dirt in a tub, the element of weight is disregarded altogether. The system of forfeitures being unlawful, the contract which stipulated that such forfeitures should be allowed is illegal. The stipulation for these forfeitures was part of the consideration for which the masters took the men into their employment. Part of the consideration being illegal, the contract is illegal altogether, and therefore the appellant is not bound by it.

Finlay, Q.C., and Mattinson, for the respondents.—There is nothing illegal in this system of fines and forfeitures. It is a special mode agreed upon by the owners and the men of determining how deductions shall be made under the proviso to section 12. The section, taken altogether, does not enact that each man must necessarily be paid in respect of every particle of coal he brings up. The first part says he shall be paid according to the actual weight gotten by him of the mineral contracted to be gotten. Then the proviso says that under certain circumstances deductions may be made. This must mean deductions from what he would have been paid under the first part if there had been no proviso. The cases in which deductions may be made are—first, where some foreign substance is sent up in the basket mixed with the coal; secondly, where a basket is improperly filled. The second case shows that this must be the true construction of the section. A basket "improperly filled" means a basket which is not properly full—i.e., a basket partly filled. In such a case the proviso allows a deduction—i.e., the man is to receive something less than full payment in respect of the coal which he sends up. Similarly a deduction allowed in the first case—viz., where some foreign substance or dirt is sent up with the coal—is a deduction from what would be full payment is respect of the coal actually sent up. The system here adopted is a convenient way of taking an average, and it is a mode agreed upon by the masters and men. The case of Netherseal Colliery Co. v. Bourne was on a different statute, and the judgments do not really draw a distinction between deductions from weight and deductions from payment. There the deduction was in fact a deduction from weight; and no other view arose. Therefore, the observations of the learned lords as to deductions in the section meaning deductions from weight were not necessary to the decision of the case, and do not govern this case. Even if this system of forfeitures is contrary to the statute, this does not vitiate the whole contract of employment. The agreement that these deductions shall be made is not a part of the consideration on either side.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—I am of opinion that the decision of the Divisional Court must be affirmed, but I think that the judgment of Charles, J., was right, and I do not agree with the judgment of Grantham, J. I think that this deduction was an illegal deduction, and therefore there was an illegality in part of the contract; but I think that that illegality was not an illegality in the consideration of the contract, and as regard the promises contained in the contract, though one was illegal, the rest can be separated, and are not vitiated thereby. Therefore the contract on the part of the workman not to leave work without giving fourteen days' notice was legal; and, as that has been broken, the masters can insist on recovering damages.

The question as to the legality of this deduction depends on the true construction of section 12 of the Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1887. I think that a construction has been placed on that section, or rather on the corresponding section in the earlier Act of 1872, by the House of Lords in Netherseal Colliery Co. v. Bourne. It has been suggested that some of the propositions there laid down by the learned lords were not necessary to the decision of that case. But I cannot agree that we in this court ought ever to say of a judgment of the House of Lords, which is founded on certain propositions as to a statute, that, though it is clear the House of Lords meant to put a particular interpretation on that statute, we shall disregard what they said because it was not necessary to the case. I take the judgment in that case to be founded on certain propositions enunciated by each of the learned lords. Lord Halsbury takes the section as a whole, and considers the first part and the proviso together, in order to see what construction ought to be put on the words "the weight of the mineral gotten" in the first part. The words themselves are capable of one or other of two constructions: if one construction is put on them, the proviso has no effect; if the other construction is put on them, the clause and the proviso can be made to work harmoniously together. One meaning which the words may bear is, the weight of the actual mineral gotten—that is, pure coal. But, as Lord Halsbury recognizes, such weight has to be ascertained according to the practical usage of miners, and, if the actual and well-known method of mining is looked at, it may be that the words have another meaning—viz., the whole amount of stuff, partly pure mineral and partly stone and other materials, which the miner gets in the mine and sends to the surface.

According to this construction, the whole of that which is sent up is to be taken to be mineral, though strictly it is mineral and something else. If the first part of the section stood alone, there might be some question whether the words could be so dealt with. But the proviso, referring to the actual method in which mining work is conducted, shows that this is the construction which ought to be applied. The mineral gotten must mean the whole amount of stuff which the miner sends up. If the miner were entitled to be paid according to the weight of this whole amount, the owner would practically be paying wages for coal which had not been gotten. The Legislature, therefore, says that the owner may arrange a method to save himself from such a loss. It enacts that the section is not to preclude him from agreeing with the persons employed in the mine that deductions shall be made in respect of stones or substances other than mineral which are sent up in the baskets mixed with the mineral. He may deduct from the whole of what is in the basket that which is not mineral. But he may only do this in a certain way. The agreement must be made in accordance with the provisions of the statute, so that the workmen may see that the arrangement is carried out in a manner fair to themselves. The terms of the proviso to section 12 and the terms of section 13 show clearly that the meaning of the Legislature is that the things to be deducted are the extraneous substances, which come up with the coal and add to its weight; and the deduction is to be made from the whole amount of stuff, mineral and extraneous substances together, which is sent up from the mine. The deduction, therefore, is a deduction from weight, not from wages, though no doubt the deduction from weight will regulate the amount of wages. The same remarks will apply with regard to deductions in respect of tubs or baskets being improperly filled. I do not think a basket is improperly filled within the meaning of the section when it is partly filled. I think a deduction in respect of a basket being improperly filled means the deduction of anything which has got into a basket by improper filling—e.g., slack or coal dust.

The consideration of this part of the section does not detract from the construction which I think we ought to put upon the Act, and which seems to me to follow from the propositions laid down by the learned lords in the case cited. Lord Halsbury says:—"In cases to which the statute applies the payment must be according to the weight gotten. From that weight gotten only certain things can be deducted, and the deductions can only be ascertained in a particular way." Lord Bramwell says:—"The effect of the enactment, then, is, that the men must be paid by weight, that that weight is to be the weight of all they send up, but that from it may be deducted the weight of certain matters, provided that weight is ascertained in a certain way." Lord Fitzgerald and Lord Herschell seem to me to assent to these propositions. And Lord Macnaghten says:—"If the agreement had stated in plain terms that a deduction was to be made from the wages of the miners in respect of slack—whatever form the deduction might have taken, whether the slack was to be absolutely rejected or paid for at a lower rate—no one, I think, could have doubted that that part of the agreement would have been in contravention of the Act of Parliament."

Having regard to these opinions, expressed by the House of Lords, how can we hold that the judgment of Grantham, J., in this case is right? It is clear that his judgment is wrong, and that of Charles, J., is right. The system of forfeitures adopted at this colliery must be held to be unlawful, and the contract into which the appellant entered with regard to the forfeitures was illegal, because it was in contravention of the terms of the Act of Parliament.

But does this render the whole contract illegal? Does it render illegal that part of the contract in which the appellant promised that he would not leave work without giving fourteen days' notice? It is clearly law that, if the consideration for a contract or a part of the consideration is illegal, every promise contained in the contract founded on that consideration becomes illegal. But if there is nothing illegal in the consideration, then, inasmuch as there may be several promises founded on that consideration, if any one of them is illegal, it cannot be insisted on; but the other promises, if legal, are not affected thereby, but remain good and can be enforced.

It was suggested that in this case the stipulation as to forfeitures was part of the consideration. But I cannot agree with that. This contract is a contract of employment. The workman would express it thus: In consideration of my entering into your employment you make me several promises. The master, on the other side, would express it thus: In consideration of my taking you into my employment, you make me several promises. All the promises on both sides are in respect of those considerations. And those considerations being perfectly legal, there is nothing to make the contract as a whole illegal. One of the promises made by the workman is illegal, and it cannot be supported. But the other promises on the part of the workman are not vitiated, and they can be relied on by the masters. I therefore agree with Charles, J. The stipulation as to fines for dirt was illegal, but the consideration for the contract of employment was legal, and the promise not to leave work without notice was binding. I think the magistrates were right, and the appeal must be dismissed.

DUKE OF NORTHUMBERLAND v. PERCY. (a.)

Rent-charge—Option to redeem by transfer of specified sum of £3 per Cent. Consols—National Debt (Conversion) Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 2), s. 21, sub-section 1; s. 25, sub-section 2—Deed executed before passing of Act—Right to redeem by New 2¾ per Cent. Annuities (Goschens).

The plaintiffs, by two deeds executed before the passing of the National Debt (Conversion) Act, 1888, created on their estates a perpetual rent-charge of £10,000 in favour of the defendant, with a right on their part to redeem the said rent-charge, or certain portions thereof, by a transfer of specified sums of £3 per Cent. Annuities.

Held, that, under section 25, sub-section 2, of the National Debt (Conversion) Act, the plaintiffs could redeem by a transfer of a similar amount of the New 2¾ per Cent. Stock (Goschens).

Motion for judgment.

By an indenture made the 22nd of July, 1871, certain hereditaments were granted by the plaintiffs, the Duke of Northumberland and Earl Percy, to trustees to the intent (in certain events) that they should for ever thenceforth receive the perpetual rent-charge of £10,000 out of the said hereditaments with the usual powers of distress and entry for the better securing of the payment of the same; and subject thereto to the use of other trustees for the term of 500 years, commencing from the death of the plaintiff duke, upon trusts for the better securing payment of the rent-charge. And it was declared that the trustees of the rent-charge, in certain events, should pay the same unto the defendant Lord A. Percy and his assigns for his life; and, in certain other events, should pay the said rent-charge, or so much thereof as should not have been appointed by the said Lord A. Percy in virtue of the exercise of his power of jointuring or charging portions thereinafter given to him, to the first and every other son of the defendant Lord A. Percy in tail male. And by the said indenture certain powers of jointurture and providing portions for younger children out of the said rent-charge were conferred on the defendant Lord A. Percy. And it was thereby agreed and declared that if the plaintiffs or the survivor of them, or any Duke of Northumberland for the time being, should at any time or times at their or his expense transfer or cause to be transferred into the names of the trustees or trustee for the time being of the said yearly rent-charge of £10,000 any sum or sums of £3 per Cent. Annuities not being less in any one transfer than £3,333 6s. 8d., and should declare that such transfer was made in or towards satisfaction of the aforesaid yearly rent-charge of £10,000, then and from thenceforth such yearly rent-charge should be reduced and abate to the extent of £100 a year for each sum of £3,333 6s. 8d., and all sums so transferred should be held upon trust to convert the same into money and invest such money on the purchase of hereditaments in fee simple to be settled to uses corresponding as nearly as might be with the trusts declared of the said rent-charge; and until such conversion, investment, and settlement, the dividends of the said sum of £3 per Cent. Annuities should be paid to the person or persons entitled to the rents and profits of the said hereditaments, if purchased and settled as aforesaid. And it was declared that the plaintiffs should have the power during their joint lives to revoke or vary those presents or any portion of them, or to declare any new uses or trusts of the same.

The defendant Lord A. Percy attained the age of twenty-one years on the 2nd of October, 1872, and in 1880 a marriage was agreed upon between him and Lady Victoria F. C. Edgcumbe.

By an indenture dated the 30th of July, 1880, indorsed on the said indenture of the 22nd of July, 1871, the plaintiffs, the duke and Earl Percy, made a new and irrevocable appointment of another rent-charge of £10,000 in lieu and substitution of the first-mentioned rent-charge of £10,000, but similarly charged and secured. And it was declared that the trustees of the new rent-charge were to hold it upon the trusts expressed in the deed of 1871 concerning the old rent-charge of £10,000, and exactly as if the trusts contained in the deed of 1871 with reference to the old rent-charge of £10,000, and the powers of substituting Bank Annuities therefor, were again repeated with reference to the new rent-charge of £10,000, except as to the power of revocation.

Lord A. Percy, on the occasion of his marriage, exercised his powers of jointuring and charging portions on the said rent-charge. There were at the time of the action two children of this marriage living, who were both infants.

The National Debt Conversion Act was passed on the 27th of March, 1888.

The plaintiffs claimed to be entitled to redeem the rent-charge by transferring into the name of the surviving trustee thereof, a sum of £333,333 6s. 8d. New Consolidated 2¾ per Cent. Annuities. The trustee of the rent-charge refused to receive any sum of such New Consols, and the defendant, Lord A. Percy, on behalf of himself and his family, denied the right of the plaintiffs to so redeem the rent-charge. The plaintiffs then commenced these proceedings, and the question came before the court on motion for judgment.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and Onslow, for the plaintiffs.—By virtue of the National Debt (Conversion) Act, 1888, we are entitled to satisfy the claim by transferring to the defendants 2¾ per Cent. Stock, known as Goschens. Section 21 authorizes such a transfer in case of a contract to transfer, and in this case there is a covenant. If we are wrong on this point at least section 25, sub-section 2, applies. In any case, we can redeem by a transfer of the specified amount of Local Loans Three per Cent. Stock under 50 & 51 Vict. c. 16, s. 8.

Yate Lee (Sir H. Davey, Q.C., with him), for the defendants.—The Act must be strictly construed. Mr. Hardy has made a mistake in considering that section 21, sub-section 1, applies to this case. It has no reference to an option to redeem; it only relates to an agreement to transfer stock. As for section 25, sub-section 2, the reference to any stock must mean a reference to any particular or specific amount of stock, not to stock generally. Sub-section 2 has reference to a specific bequest only. If this view is wrong sections 19 and 21 are useless.

They were not further heard, and Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and Onslow were not again called on.

NORTH, J.—The first point in this case depends on the construction of the National Debt (Conversion) Act, 1888. I am not satisfied that section 21 would not apply to the present case. That section refers to an agreement to transfer any amount of Three per Cent. Stock, and I am not satisfied that there is any distinction between the phrase "an agreement to transfer" and an "agreement as to the transfer of any amount of stock." I do not, however, express any concluded opinion, for the 25th section seems to me to apply exactly. [His lordship read sub-section 2.]

Now, in this instrument, executed before the passing of this Act, or rather in these instruments, the deeds of 1871 and 1880, which operate together, there are references to stock liable to be converted —references to the Three per Cent. Annuities and Bank Annuities; and they are stocks liable to be converted or exchanged in pursuance of this Act. Then the section goes on to say "may if the stock is so converted or exchanged"—and that is what has taken place—be construed as a reference to the new stock; and the new stock means the stock created by this Act instead of the Bank Annuities or the Three per Cent. Annuities. Now, these words seem to apply precisely. The stocks are stocks liable to be converted under the Act of 1888, and such conversion has taken place. Then the reference to Three per Cent. Annuities or the Bank Annuities must be taken to refer to the new stock created under the Act of 1888.

Then it is argued that reference to a "stock liable to be converted or exchanged" means a reference to a particular sum of stock. That would be putting a new meaning on the Act, and adding to it something which if inserted would not be intelligible.

Then it is said that there is something in the second part of this sub-section which throws light upon the first part, because there are words which relate to what is to take place in case of "a specific bequest of such stock," and there is no provision for the case of a general bequest of such stock. The reference to a specific bequest seems to me to be put in expressly for this purpose. It might be said, if there were a specific bequest of a kind of stock which has ceased to exist, the bequest is gone. You cannot put in a certain amount of new stock in place of a gift of old stock when the old stock is gone altogether. That seems to me, if it were necessary to find an explanation, a sufficient explanation for the addition of these subsequent words, which do not affect the earlier words. It is said that if the words at the opening part of the sub-section are to have the general meaning suggested, the latter words would be unnecessary, and that there are some other sections in the Act which would also be unnecessary. I do not see why I should cut down the plain meaning of the opening words for that reason. It is difficult to construe Acts of Parliament drawn on the present system; but if every clause in addition to its natural meaning is to have an artificial meaning given to it, so that it shall not cover anything provided in any other section of the Act, there will be a fresh terror put upon those who have to construe Acts of Parliament.

Under the circumstances, I think the earlier words of sub-section 2 clearly do apply to this case, and that the new stock, popularly known as Goschens, is a fit subject for investment and transfer in place of the Bank Annuities or Three per Cent. Annuities referred to in these deeds respectively.

CROSSLEY v. MAGNIAC. (a.)

Power of attorney—Stock—Stockbroker—Payment on account by London stockbroker to country stockbroker—London stockbroker's liability to country customer—Foreign principal.

The plaintiff, who lived abroad, being the owner of a sum of New Consols, gave to the defendants, a firm of stockbrokers in London, a power of attorney appointing one of the defendants his attorney to sell the Consols. The power of attorney was sent originally to the plaintiff's brother in England, and by him to C., a country stockbroker. C. sent it to the defendants, who were his London agents. The defendants sold the stock and credited C. with it in his account with them, and the sum went in reduction of sums due to them by him, or sums paid to C. by them. C. subsequently became bankrupt, and the plaintiff sued the defendants for the proceeds of the sale of the Consols, less commission.

Held, that the defendants were liable to refund the moneys to the plaintiff, as the crediting it in their account with their country client, C., was not a payment to the plaintiff; and that, though the power of attorney to sell came to them through C., the defendants were not entitled to treat the plaintiff as a foreign principal, and so to act as if C. only were their principal.

Trial of action.

This was an action brought by Horatio Nelson Crossley, a resident in Canada, to recover from the defendants, C. H. Magniac, Gilbey, and Sumner, a sum of £967 10s. and interest, the price of a sum of Consols (less £2 10s. commission) sold by them under the following circumstances.

The plaintiff had a brother, J. W. Crossley, who resided in Halifax, England, and who had a general power of attorney for the plaintiff. Acting on instructions from the plaintiff, J. W. Crossley instructed one Caw, a local stock and share dealer in Halifax, to take steps to sell £1,000 New Consols belonging to the plaintiff. The general power of attorney not being such as the Bank of England would act on, Caw on the 13th of June, 1890, wrote to the defendants as follows:—"Please apply for power of attorney for sale of £1,000 Goschens, standing in name of Horatio Nelson Crossley, of Brian Royd, Greetland, near Halifax, gentleman. . . . Mr. Crossley's present address is Sandy Bay Farm, Lake Rosseau, Muskoka, in the State of Ontario, in the Dominion of Canada." Gilbey & Sumner (the defendant's firm) eventually obtained two forms of powers of attorney from the Bank of England for one of the defendants to act as the plaintiff's attorney for the sale of £2,000 stock, one of the powers relating to £1,000, the subject of this action, the other to another sum not the subject of this action. The powers of attorney were sent to Caw, by him handed to J. W. Crossley, and then transmitted to the plaintiff, who executed and returned them to J. W. Crossley.

By the power of attorney relating to the £1,000 Consols, the plaintiff appointed "Southard Gilbey . . . my attorney in my name and on my behalf to sell and transfer all or any part of the sum of one thousand pounds £2 15s. per Cent. Consolidated Stock standing in my name in the books of the Governor and Company of the Bank of England, and to receive the consideration money and give receipts for the same."

J. W. Crossley retained the power of attorney relating to the £1,000, the subject-matter of the action, but sent the other one to Caw, who forwarded it to Gilbey & Sumner, and they sold the stock and remitted the proceeds to Caw, who paid them to J. W. Crossley.

In January, 1891, J. W. Crossley, at Caw's suggestion, sent the remaining power of attorney to him, and he forwarded it to the defendants with instructions to sell the stock, which they did, crediting Caw in their books with the proceeds. They had previously been pressing Caw to reduce the balance due from him to them on their account with him. Caw was adjudicated bankrupt in July, 1891, his account with the defendants having been drawn upon by him until no balance stood to his credit, though the proceeds of the Consols had been credited to him. J. W. Crossley had, previously to the date of the bankruptcy, made inquiries of Caw as to whether the stock had been sold, and had been told by him that it had not.

The further details of the case appear in the judgment.

Neville, Q.C., and T. Bateman Napier, for the plaintiff.—The defendants had notice of who was the true owner of the stock, and ought to have paid the purchase-money to the plaintiff or to his agent Caw, if he had authority to receive it, and ought not merely to have credited Caw with it in their account with him; and are now liable to make it good.

Haldane, Q.C., and Kirby, for the defendants.—The defendants were acting as Caw's agents, and in no other capacity. The power of attorney from the plaintiff was a mere document of title. There was no privity between the plaintiff and the defendants, and the case of New Zealand and Australian Land Co. v. Watson, 29 W. R. 694, 7 Q. B. D. 374, shows that payment to Caw, the principal, was a discharge to them. Even if the plaintiff was their principal, he was a foreign one, and could be disregarded and Caw treated as principal: Elinger Actien-Gesellschaft v. Claye, L. R. 8 Q. B. 313, 21 W. R. Dig. 207; Montgomerie v. United Kingdom Mutual Steamship Association, 39 W. R. 351, [1891] 1 Q. B. 370.

ROMER, J.—The plaintiff, being the owner of a sum of New Consols standing in his name, gives a power of attorney to a member of the defendants' firm, authorizing him to sell and transfer the stock for the plaintiff and on the plaintiff's behalf. By virtue of this power the stock is sold by the defendants and transferred to the purchaser, and the purchase-money is received by them. The defendants are paid for their services as brokers out of the plaintiff's money, the proceeds of the sale. What was thereupon the duty of the defendants with regard to such proceeds? It was to pay the amount, less their commission, to the plaintiff or to some person authorized by him to receive it. And if the defendants paid to any such person, and if with that person they had other private dealings, they were bound, as between themselves and the plaintiff, to pay that authorized person in cash, and not in account between them. Of course payment by cheque, duly cashed, is payment in cash for this purpose.

Now, what difference did it make that in the case before me the defendants, being instructed to act for the plaintiff, obtained the power of attorney from him through the intermediary of a country broker? I think it makes no difference, seeing the defendants clearly knew that the stock was the plaintiff's, and sold it for him, and under his power of attorney, in the way I have mentioned. The defendants cannot, in my opinion, ignore the power of attorney, and the wording of it, in the way in which, through their counsel, they now seek to do. Nor, in my opinion, did the fact that the plaintiff was abroad entitle the defendants to regard the country broker as their principal in the matter, and to ignore the plaintiff. There was clearly privity between the plaintiff and the defendants in the matter of this sale. The authorities cited by the defendants' counsel with reference to a foreign principal have no bearing, in my opinion, on the present case.

What have the defendants done with the proceeds of the sale? Admittedly they have not paid them to the plaintiff. Have they paid them in cash to a person authorized to receive the proceeds for the plaintiff? I assume, in favour of the defendants, that the country broker was authorized, on behalf of the plaintiff, to receive the proceeds of the sale. But the defendants did not pay the proceeds to the country broker for the plaintiff. What they did was this. They chose to treat the purchase-money of the stock as the country broker's own, and to ignore the plaintiff in the matter. It was said that this was justified by some custom or usage. The evidence does not establish to my satisfaction any such custom or usage. Moreover, I do not think any such custom or usage would be held valid by this court which purported to justify an agent, having his principal's money in his hand, to ignore that principal, and apply the moneys in payment of money due to him from a third person. The defendants, in my judgment, were not justified in ignoring the plaintiff in the matter, or in treating the proceeds of sale as the country broker's own money. What the defendants did with the proceeds was this. They carried them to the credit of the country broker in the account between themselves and that country broker. This wiped off a debt of £596 16s. 4d. due from the country broker to them, leaving a balance in favour of the country broker of £372 11s. 2d. They did not even pay this £372 11s. 2d. to the country broker for the plaintiff, still less did they pay it to the country broker for his principal, the plaintiff, in cash. They carried that balance of £372 11s. 2d. to the credit of the country broker in the further accounts between the broker and themselves. A further balance is later on struck as between the country broker and the defendants in the account between them, and the balance of £372 11s. 2d. is increased to a balance in favour of the country broker of £403 15s. 3d. This £403 15s. 3d. the defendant did not pay to the country broker for the plaintiff, but they let the country broker draw on them a bill for it, as being a balance due to the country broker from them on his private account between them. The whole of that bill they paid at maturity to a third person—not the plaintiff. This cannot, in my opinion, be treated by the court as a discharge to the defendants as between themselves and the plaintiff.

The same observations apply with regard to a sum of £125 which appears to have been paid to the county broker by the defendants on the 31st of January, 1891. The country broker appears to have drawn a bill on the defendants for £125 as in the account between the two of them. The bill was accepted by the defendants and paid by them in account as between themselves and the country broker. It was not a payment by the defendants to the country broker in respect of this particular purchase-money belonging to the plaintiff. Still less, in my judgment, was it a payment in cash so as to enable the defendants to say that they had discharged their duty to the plaintiff by paying part of the proceeds of the stock in cash to an agent authorized to receive it by him.

The case of Bridges v. Garrett, 18 W. R. 815, L. R. 5 C. P. 451, to which I was referred by the defendants' counsel, is clearly distinguishable. There the payment was made to a person clearly entitled to receive in respect of the moneys which the person to whom it was paid was entitled to receive on account of his principal and in respect of the amount which he was so entitled to receive. The only question which arose there was because the payment included other moneys and was made by a crossed cheque, but it was held that that did not prevent it from being a payment in cash duly authorized merely because it included other moneys, or because it was paid by a crossed cheque. The cheque was duly cashed and the cash was received. That case is clearly no authority in favour of the defendants in the case before me.

The case before Day, J., to which I was referred (and which does not appear to have been reported) clearly turned on the special findings of fact by the learned judge in that case, and I need not further refer to it. It is not an authority in the present case in favour of the defendants.

It follows that in my judgment the plaintiff has succeeded and there must be an order for payment by the defendants to the plaintiff of £967 10s. of the amount of the proceeds of sale less commission with interest at 4 per cent. to the day of payment from the 28th of January, 1891.

BRYANT, POWIS, & BRYANT (LIMITED) v. BANK OF QUEBEC. (a.)

(On appeal from the Court of Queen's Bench for Lower Canada, Province of Quebec.)

Power of attorney—Construction of—Agent's authority—Bill of exchange.

Where an agent is authorized by power of attorney to enter into contracts for (1) the purchase or sale of goods, (2) the chartering of vessels, and (3) the employment of agents and servants; and, as incidental thereto or consequential thereon, to do certain specified acts and other acts of the same kind as those specified, such an authority does not confer upon the agent powers at large, but only the necessary powers, in addition to those named, which are requisite to carry into effect the declared purposes of the power of attorney.

An agent, borrowing money on behalf of his principal under such an attorney, would exceed his powers.

But should the agent do any act which is in itself warranted by the terms of the power used, then such act is binding on the principal as to all persons dealing in good faith with the agent, and they are not bound to inquire into the facts aliunde.

An agent indorsing bills of exchange "per pro," and getting them discounted by a bank in the ordinary course of business, is within the powers conferred on him, when the power of attorney given him specifically mentions the drawing and indorsing of bills on behalf of the principal; and this is so as to bonâ fide holders for value, though the agent abuse his authority.

The first appeal was from a decree of the Court of Queen's Bench for Lower Canada, Province of Quebec. The facts are set out in their lordships' judgment, the question being whether the company was to be charged with moneys obtained by one Davies for his own purposes, but borrowed by him in the name of the company, and professedly on their behalf; and this depended on the construction and effect of the power of attorney given to Davies by the company; this power of attorney will be found fully set out in the judgment of the Privy Council.

Hall, Q.C. (of the Canadian bar), and Hollams, for the appellant.—Davies had exceeded his authority. He was not agent for negotiating bills &c., in this manner. He was acting for his own private advantage and outside his agency. [Castle v. Baby, 5 Low. Can. Rep. 411; Churchill v. MacKay, 20 Can. Sup. Ct. Rep. 472, 476; and Joumenjoy Coondoo v. Watson, 9 App. Cas. 561, 32 W. R. Dig. 149, were referred to.] The English and French law are alike, or almost so—as to the legal effect of a power. [Lord MACNAGHTEN referred to section 25 of the English Bills of Exchange Act, 1882.]

Fullerton, Q.C., and Chase Casgrain (Attorney-General for Quebec), for the respondent bank.—The general words ought to be read apart from the rest of the document, and should not be limited. Davies was simply putting himself in funds, such being necessary for the purposes of the company: Bank of Bengal v. M'Leod, 7 Moo. P. C. 35, 38. [Lord MACNAGHTEN referred to Attwood v. Munnings, 7 B. & C. 278, that powers of attorney should be construed strictly.]

The second appeal was from a decree of the same court. Two bills of exchange indorsed in the name of the appellants by Davies "per pro C. G. Davies" had been discounted by the respondent bank in the ordinary course of business, and the company had been held liable to the bank thereon, and now appealed against this decision.

Hall, Q.C. (of the Canadian bar), and T. W. Hollams, for the appellants.

Stuart, Q.C. (of the Quebec bar), and Vesey Fitzgerald, for the respondent bank.

The judgment of their lordships (Lords HOBHOUSE, MACNAGHTEN, HANNEN, SHAND, and Sir RICHARD COUCH) was delivered by Lord MACNAGHTEN.—The appellant in these appeals is a company incorporated with limited liability under the statute of the United Kingdom known as the Companies Act, 1862. It was formed in 1885 for the purpose of taking over the business of the firm of Messrs. Bryant, Powis, & Bryant, of London, Quebec, and Montreal, lumber merchants.

On the 1st of January, 1888, the company discontinued the business of buying and shipping timber, which up to that time it had carried on in Quebec in succession to the firm of Bryant, Powis, & Bryant, and thenceforth the company restricted its business in Quebec to making advances on the security of lumber and timber, principally if not solely in connection with the operations of a firm of lumber merchants trading as "Smith, Wade, & Co."

On the formation of the company one Charles Griffiths Davies, of Quebec, who had been agent and attorney for the firm of Bryant, Powis, & Bryant, was appointed the agent and attorney of the company in Canada. The appointment was contained in a power of attorney, bearing date the 25th of November, 1885. Davies remained in the regular employment of the company at a fixed salary up to the 1st of January, 1888. He then went into business on his own account, and carried on business as broker and general commission and shipping agent, under the style of "C. G. Davies & Co." But he still acted for the company when occasion required, receiving a commission for his services. His power of attorney was not revoked or withdrawn, and the company continued to hold him out as their agent.

In February, 1890, Davies left Quebec under the pressure of pecuniary difficulties. It was then discovered that he had taken advantage of his position as agent and attorney for the company to procure money on the credit of the company for his own private purposes. The company in consequence found itself exposed to heavy and unexpected demands, and there was a good deal of litigation, in the course of which various points were raised, depending on the special circumstances of the particular case. That litigation has given rise to these two appeals, which their lordships will now proceed to consider separately.

BRYANT, POWIS, & BRYANT (LIMITED) v. LA BANQUE DU PEUPLE.

In the appeal of Bryant, Powis, & Bryant (Limited) v. La Banque du Peuple the question is whether the company is to be charged with moneys obtained by Davies for his own purposes, but borrowed by him in the name of the company and professedly on their behalf.

The facts are not in dispute. On the 1st of October, 1889, Davies went to the respondent bank, who had been at one time, but who were not then, the bankers of the company, and asked the manager, M. Dumoulin, for a loan of 25,000 dols. on account of the company, saying that it was required for the purpose of a remittance to be made by him on that day to the head office in London. The manager consented to make the advance on what is termed a "short loan." Davies drew a cheque on the bank in the name of the company, "per pro C. G. Davies," for 25,000 dols. The cheque was paid as an overdraft, and as collateral security for its repayment Davies deposited with the bank three promissory notes, amounting together to 40,000 dols., drawn by Smith, Wade, & Co. in favour of Bryant, Powis, & Bryant (Limited), and indorsed in their name, "per pro C. G. Davies."

On the 5th of the same month Davies went to the bank again, and told the manager that he found that the sum of 25,000 dols. more was required, and thereupon he obtained a further loan to that amount. The transaction was carried out in precisely the same manner as the former loan, and by way of collateral security Davies indorsed and deposited three further promissory notes of Smith, Wade, & Co., amounting together to 35,000 dols.

Before the 4th of December, 1889, Davies paid the bank out of his own moneys 10,000 dols., in reduction of the loan. On that day the six promissory notes, which then had become due, but had not been presented for payment, were returned to Davies, who gave in exchange two other promissory notes for 25,000 dols. each, dated the 28th of September, 1889, and made by Smith, Wade, & Co. to the order of the company, and indorsed in the name of the company "per pro C. G. Davies."

For these notes Davies took the following receipt:—

"Quebec,
"4th December, 1889.

"Received of Messrs. Bryant, Powis, & Bryant (Limited), through their agent here the following bills payable as collateral security for the payment of loan of (37,000 dols.) thirty-seven thousand dollars with interest at 7 per cent., viz.:—

	dols.
"S. W. & Co. p. note due 31st March .	25,000
"S. W. & Co. p. note due 31st March .	25,000
	"50,000

"p. AUGUSTE LABARDIE,
"pro Manager Banque du Peuple,
"Quebec."

Before the two notes became due the company forbade Smith, Wade, & Co. to pay the bank, and they also gave notice to the bank disclaiming liability, and calling upon the bank to hand over the notes to them.

When the notes fell due the bank brought this action upon them against Smith, Wade, & Co. and the company. Smith, Wade, & Co. submitted themselves to the judgment of the court. The company disputed their liability on various grounds, and they also filed an incidental demand, claiming the promissory notes in question as their property.

The case came on to be heard before Andrews, J. The learned judge, in an able and elaborate judgment, decided in favour of the company, on the ground that the bank had notice that Davies was acting under a limited authority, and that the power of attorney of the 25th of November, 1885, from which alone Davies derived his authority, did not authorize him to borrow money in the name of the company. The other grounds upon which the company resisted the claim of the bank were rejected by the learned judge. As the argument before their lordships was substantially confined to the question of authority, it is not necessary to allude to them, beyond saying that in the course of the discussion the learned counsel for the appellant very properly disclaimed in express and unqualified terms any imputation of want of good faith on the part of the bank or on the part of M. Dumoulin.

On appeal, the Court of Queen's Bench for Lower Canada, by a majority of three to two, reversed the decision of Andrews, J., and condemned the company to pay to the bank the sum of 37,000dols, with interest from the 31st of March, 1890, and costs of suit.

The learned judges who formed the minority in the Court of Appeal adopted and relied upon the judgment of Andrews, J. The views of the majority are expressed in the formal judgment pronounced by Cross, J. That judgment proceeds upon the ground that "the specific powers" granted to Davies by the power of attorney "did not necessarily imply the negation of the powers of general agency granted to and exercised by the said Charles G. Davies under the said power of attorney," and that the words used in the concluding part of the power of attorney, which are quoted in the judgment, and which will be considered presently, "refer not specially to said special powers but to the business generally of the respondents" (i.e., Bryant, Powis, & Bryant, Limited), "and by their terms give the said Charles G. Davies a discretion to do, execute, and perform any matter or thing which in the opinion of the said Charles G. Davies ought to have been done or performed in or about business of the respondents, therefore outside and beyond what had been otherwise provided for by the said power of attorney," and consequently that Davies had power to bind the company "and did so bind them by his indorsation in their name of said promissory notes and drawing the money advanced thereon."

On the appeal before this board the learned counsel for the appellant did not seriously dispute the proposition that the words "per pro," in the acceptance or indorsement of a bill of exchange or promissory note amount to an express statement that the party so accepting or indorsing the bill or note has only a special and limited authority, and, therefore, that a person who takes a bill or note so accepted or indorsed is bound at his peril to inquire into the extent of the agent's authority: Stagg v. Elliot, 10 W. R. 647, 12 C. B. N. S. 373-381 per Byles, J. Nor was it disputed that powers of attorney are to be construed strictly—that is to say, that where an act purporting to be done under a power of attorney is challenged as being in excess of the authority conferred by the power, it is necessary to show that on a fair construction of the whole instrument the authority in question is to be found within the four corners of the instrument, either in express terms or by necessary implication. It was pointed out, indeed, that the decisions on which the learned counsel for the appellant mainly relied in support of these propositions were decisions of English judges; but it was not shown that there is any difference in this respect between the law of Canada and the law of England. The provisions of the Civil Code of Lower Canada, and the Canadian authorities which were cited to their lordships, appear to be in harmony with English law and English authorities.

In the result the argument was reduced to a consideration of the true construction and effect of the power of attorney of the 25th of November, 1885. It will therefore be necessary to state its provisions somewhat in detail.

That instrument begins by reciting the formation of the company, "to undertake and carry on as successors to Messrs. W. Bryant, F. C. Bryant, and H. W. Powis, who were the founders of the company, the trade and business of wood and timber importers, brokers, merchants, and dealers then carried on by them in partnership together at London, Quebec, Montreal, and elsewhere under the name or style of Bryant, Powis, & Bryant, and for other purposes more particularly mentioned in the memorandum of association of the company." It then recites the provisions of the articles of association authorizing the appointment of an attorney, and proceeds as follows: "And whereas the directors deem it desirable in the interest of the company to appoint an agent and attorney to represent the company in Canada aforesaid, now know ye that the company doth hereby appoint Charles Griffiths Davies, of Desprairie-street, in the city of Quebec, Canada, aforesaid, to be the true and lawful attorney of the company, for and in the name and on behalf of the company to enter into any contract or engagement for the purchase or sale of goods and merchandise of whatever nature or kind, and for the charter and recharter of any ships or vessels, and for the engagement of all such agents, clerks, and servants as may be necessary for carrying on and conducting the business of the said company, and to draw and sign cheques on the bankers for the time being of the said company, and to draw, accept, and indorse bills of exchange, promissory notes, bills of lading, delivery orders, dock warrants, coupons, bought and sold notes, contract notes, charter-parties, accounts, current accounts, sales, and other documents which shall, in the opinion of the said attorney, require the signature or indorsement of the company, and also" to sue for and recover debts, to demand and obtain delivery of goods belonging to the company; and generally to act for the company in and about the recovery of debts and the delivery of goods in all respects as fully and effectually as the company could itself do; to give receipts, to bring and defend and compromise actions; "also to enter into, make, sign, seal, execute, deliver, acknowledge, and perform any contract, agreement, deed, writing, or thing that may in the opinion of the said agent or attorney be necessary or proper to be entered into, made, signed, sealed, executed, delivered, acknowledged or performed for effectuating the purposes aforesaid, or any of them, and for all or any of the purposes aforesaid to use the name of the company"—then follow the words quoted in the judgment of the Court of Appeal—"and to do, execute, and perform any other act, matter, or thing whatsoever which ought to be done, executed, or performed, or which in the opinion of the said agent or attorney ought to have been done, executed, or performed in or about the business affairs of the company."

To put it shortly, the power of attorney authorized Davies to enter into contracts or engagements for three specified purposes: (1) the purchase or sale of goods; (2) the chartering of vessels; and (3) the employment of agents and servants; and, as incidental thereto, or consequential thereon, to do certain specified acts and other acts of the same kind as those specified. If the instrument be read fairly, it does not, in their lordships' opinion, authorize the attorney to borrow money on behalf of the company, or to bind the company by a contract of loan. It appears to their lordships that the words quoted in the judgment of the Court of Appeal are to be read in connection with the introductory words of the sentence to which they belong, "for all or any of the purposes aforesaid." So read, the words in question do not confer upon the agent powers at large, but only such powers as may be necessary, in addition to those previously specified, to carry into effect the declared purposes of the power of attorney.

Their lordships will therefore humbly advise her Majesty that the appeal ought to be allowed, and the judgment of Andrews, J., restored. The respondents will pay the costs of the appeal to the Court of Appeal and the costs of this appeal.

BRYANT, POWIS, & BRYANT (LIMITED) v. THE QUEBEC BANK.

The question raised in the appeal of Bryant, Powis, & Bryant (Limited) v. The Quebec Bank may be disposed of very shortly.

The appeal is from a decision of the Court of Queen's Bench for Lower Canada affirming the decision of Andrews, J., who held the company liable to the respondent bank in respect of two bills of exchange indorsed in the name of the company, "per pro C. G. Davies," and discounted by the bank in the ordinary course of business.

In the discussion at the bar it was conceded by the learned counsel for the appellant that the bank were bonâ fide holders for value; and the argument, as in the previous case, was substantially confined to the question of Davies' authority.

The authority of Davies as the agent and attorney of the company was derived from the power of attorney of the 25th of November, 1885, which has been fully stated already. That instrument in terms authorizes the attorney to indorse bills of exchange. Their lordships agree with Andrews, J., that the fact that Davies abused his authority and betrayed his trust cannot affect bonâ fide holders for value of negotiable instruments indorsed by him apparently in accordance with his authority.

The law appears to their lordships to be very well stated in the Court of Appeal of the State of New York, in President v. Cornen, 37 N. Y. R. 10 [illegible] 322, cited by Andrews, J., in his judgment in another case brought by the Quebec Bank against the company. The passage referred to is as follows:—

"Whenever the very act of the agent is authorized by the terms of the power, that is, whenever by comparing the act done by the agent with the words of the power, the act is in itself warranted by the terms used, such act is binding on the constituent, as to all persons dealing in good faith with the agent; and persons are not bound to inquire into facts aliunde. The apparent authority is the real authority."

Their lordships will therefore humbly advise her Majesty that the appeal ought to be dismissed with costs.

COMMERCIAL BANK OF AUSTRALIA (LIMITED) v. OFFICIAL ASSIGNEE OF JOHN WILSON & CO. (a.)

(On appeal from the Supreme Court of New South Wales.)

Principal and surety—Agreement with some co-sureties—Payment—Bankruptcy—Proof for full amount due—Banker—Appropriation of sum deposited.

Several persons, including W., had become guarantors to the appellant bank for the discharge of £6,250. Some of the guarantors, not including W., subsequently entered into an arrangement by agreement with the bank, that their liability, as between them and the bank, should be limited, so that, in lieu of their personal liability to pay the entire sum guaranteed in case of default of the principal debtor, there should be substituted a deposit of £3,000 in the bank to a suspense account. The bank had the power of appropriating the £3,000 towards the payment of the principal debt, but had not done so. W. became bankrupt.

Held, that the agreement did not amount to payment, and that, apart from bankruptcy, the carrying out of such an arrangement in no way affected the liability of W.; and, further, that the bankruptcy of W. could make no difference as to the amount of W.'s liability; so that the bank were entitled to prove in W.'s bankruptcy for the full sum of £6,250, without making the deduction of the £3,000.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the Supreme Court of New South Wales (In Bankruptcy). The facts are set out in their lordships' judgment.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and Vaughan Hawkins, for the appellants.

Byrne, Q.C., and C. H. Sargant, for the respondent.

The judgments of their lordships (Lord HERSCHELL, L.C., Lords WATSON, HOBHOUSE, MACNAGHTEN, and MORRIS, Sir RICHARD COUCH, and the Hon. GEORGE DENMAN) was delivered by Lord HERSCHELL, L.C.—The sole question for determination in this case is whether the appellants, the Commercial Bank of Australia, are entitled to prove against the estate of the bankrupt John Wilson for the sum of £6,250 or £3,250.

The question turns upon the construction of an agreement entered into in the year 1890 between the appellants and three persons, O'Connor, Hart, and Freehill, who with others, including Wilson, had become guarantors to the bank for the discharge of a liability incurred or to be incurred by Her Majesty's Theatre and Grand Opera House Co. of Sydney (Limited). The parties to the guarantees were not in all cases the same, but nothing turns on that. After reciting the several guarantees that had been entered into, the agreement further recites that Hart and Freehill had offered and proposed to pay to the said bank the sum of £2,000 in discharge of their respective individual liabilities under the said joint and several guarantees, and that O'Connor had offered and proposed to pay £500, and to give the bank his promissory notes for a further sum of £500 in discharge of his individual liability under the joint and several guarantees. The agreement further recites that the bank had "declined to receive the said moneys in reduction of the said account"—that is, the account due by the principal debtor, Her Majesty's Theatre and Grand Opera House Co. (Limited)—"but have agreed with the said Francis Bede Freehill, James N. Hart, and Daniel O'Connor that they will not look to them for more than £1,000 each, on condition that the same sums or their equivalent shall be deposited to a separate account with the said bank, to be appropriated by the said bank in satisfaction, in part or in whole, of the said debt of Her Majesty's Theatre and Opera House Co. (Limited) when and so soon as the said bank may deem prudent, the receipt of such sums to be entirely without prejudice to the bank's right to sue or look to the other guarantors for the full amount of the said guarantees, it being understood that such moneys shall be and remain as a security to the bank for the due payment of the said respective sums of £1,000 each, credited to a special suspense account with the said bank accordingly." Then the agreement witnesses "that in pursuance of the said agreement, and in consideration of the sum of £2,000, paid by the said James N. Hart and Francis Bede Freehill, and £500, together with the said promissory notes, paid by the said Daniel O'Connor, at or before the execution hereof to the credit of a suspense account with the said bank (receipt whereof is hereby acknowledged), the said bank doth hereby release and discharge the said Daniel O'Connor, James N. Hart, and Francis Bede Freehill, their heirs, executors, and administrators, respectively, of, from, and against all debts, claims, and demands whatever of the said bank against them, the said Daniel O'Connor, James N. Hart, and Francis Bede Freehill, under and by virtue of their said joint and several guarantees and all actions, suits, or causes of action in respect thereof. Provided nevertheless, and these presents are executed upon this express condition, that nothing herein contained shall release, or be construed or operated to release, the said Daniel O'Connor in the event of either or any of the said promissory notes being dishonoured, or to release or in any manner to prejudice or affect any claim or demand which the said bank has or ever had upon or against the said John Shepherd, John Wilson, or James Allison" (who were the co-guarantors), "or either of them, or their, or either of their, respective estates and effects."

There can be no doubt that the object of the bank in not receiving this sum in discharge of the account due by the principal debtor was to preserve their right, if it could lawfully be done, to prove against the estate of any of the co-sureties who might become bankrupt. The contention on behalf of the respondent in support of the judgment below, which was dissented from by the Chief Justice, has been, first, that the effect of the agreement, to which their lordships have directed attention, was to operate as payment of the principal debt pro tanto, and that therefore, £3,000 of the debt having been in fact discharged, there could be no proof except for the balance; and, secondly, that even if it was not to be regarded as payment, supposing the question had arisen between Wilson and the bank, yet Wilson being bankrupt, and his estate in process of distribution amongst his creditors, an arrangement of this description could not prevail to affect the right of the assignee in bankruptcy, and consequently that in the bankruptcy the bank could prove for no more than the balance.

The agreement, it is said, amounted to a payment. The question is, whether it amounted to payment of a part of the principal debt; because unless it did, the principal debt still remains, and not having been in any part discharged, the bank are entitled to prove for it against the estate of the surety. Their lordships have pointed out that it certainly was the intention of the parties to this agreement that the principal debt should not be discharged. It is said that this has nevertheless been done in spite of the intention of the parties. Their lordships are unable to agree that that is so. The arrangement which the agreement embodies appears to their lordships to amount to this—that the liability of the guarantors who were dealt with by that agreement should, in lieu of their personal liability to pay the entire sum guaranteed in case of default of the principal debtor, be as between them and the bank limited in this way, that there should be substituted for it the deposit in the bank of a sum of money less than the whole amount, but which should afford a complete security to the bank quoad the amount to which it extended. Accordingly, the sum of £3,000—taking the promissory notes, they having been paid, as equivalent to cash—was deposited in the bank to a suspense account. The bank no doubt had power, when it thought it prudent to do so, to appropriate that sum to the payment of the principal debt pro tanto, and as soon as they made such appropriation it would undoubtedly operate as payment. They never have made such appropriation. The question is whether prior to appropriation it operated as payment of the debt. Their lordships are unable to see why it should do so. The money was put to a special account called a suspense account, presumably in the names of these guarantors who had paid it in. At all events it was ear-marked as a special account. Down to the time of appropriation by the bank of this amount, their lordships are unable to see anything which could discharge the principal debtor. If that debtor had come and tendered the entire amount due, the bank would have been neither justified, as it appears to their lordships in saying, nor bound to say that, £3,000 of the amount having been already paid, all that they were in a position to receive was the residue. Upon the whole of the terms of the agreement there appears to be nothing more than a substitution of a certain sum of money deposited in the bank as security, in lieu of the personal liability of guarantors which down to that time had rested upon these persons who were parties to the agreement with the bank.

Apart, therefore, from any question arising out of the bankruptcy, their lordships cannot think that the carrying out of such an arrangement as this in any way affected the liability of Wilson, the co-surety, for the total amount of the debt due to the bank.

But then it is said that, Wilson having become bankrupt, and the question being one affecting his creditors, this agreement must be regarded in their favour as a payment, and that otherwise it would be an evasion of the bankruptcy law. Their lordships are unable to concur in this view. Supposing that no such agreement as this had been entered into, the creditors of Wilson would have been in no better position than if this agreement is held to have the effect contended for by the appellants. How, then, can a transaction, which does not prejudice the position of the creditors, but which leaves their position exactly what it would have been if there had been no such agreement, be said to be an evasion of the bankruptcy law? Their lordships find it difficult to understand the proposition when so stated; and in their opinion, upon the true view of the agreement and its consequences, that is really what the contention on the part of the respondent amounts to. The truth is, that the fallacy which lurks in the argument of the respondent is this, that it is suggested that the comparison is to be between the position of the creditors of Wilson if no such agreement had been entered into, and the position of the creditors of Wilson if they can claim the benefit of this sum as a payment. No doubt, if they can so claim the benefit of it as a payment, their position would be better than it would have been if there had been no agreement; but in their lordships' opinion, for the purpose of seeing whether the agreement on its true construction (and their lordships have already pointed out what is their view is the true construction) is, or would effect, an evasion of the bankruptcy law, the comparison must and can only be made between the position of the creditors without any agreement, and the position of the creditors supposing the agreement to have been entered into and to be construed as their lordships have held it must be construed.

For these reasons their lordships find themselves unable to concur in the judgments arrived at by the courts below, and they will humbly advise her Majesty that the appeal should be allowed, that the judgments below should be reversed, and that it be declared that the appellants are entitled to prove under the bankruptcy for the amount of the full sum of £6,250, without making deduction of the sum of £3,000. The respondent must pay the costs in the courts below and of this appeal.

MAXIM-NORDENFELT GUNS AND AMMUNITION CO. v. NORDENFELT. (a.)

Covenant—Restraint of trade—Severability—Validity—Sale of business—Business in the nature of a trade secret—Restraint co-extensive with area of business—No limit of space.

In 1888 the defendant covenanted with the plaintiff company, which carried on (inter alia) the business formerly carried on by the defendant and sold by him to a company with which the plaintiff company was afterwards amalgamated—of the manufacture of quick-firing and other guns and ammunition, that he "should not during the term of twenty-five years from the date of the incorporation of the company, if the company should so long continue to carry on business, engage, except on behalf of the company, either directly or indirectly, in the trade or business of a manufacturer of guns, gun mountings or carriages, gunpowder explosives or ammunition, or in any business competing or liable to compete in any way with that for the time being carried on by the company.

In pursuance of a further agreement the defendant acted as one of the plaintiff company's two managing directors. The defendant in 1890 having, owing to ill pates, resigned his office in the plaintiff company, and having entered into arrangements with a foreign company for carrying on business in competition with the businesses of the plaintiff company, the plaintiff company commenced an action asking that the defendant might be restrained by injunction from so acting in breach of the covenant.

Held, that the covenant was severable, and was valid and must be enforced so far as it related to the business of the manufacture of guns, gun mountings or carriages, gunpowder explosives or ammunition; for that, so restricted, it was not, although unlimited in space, contrary to public policy or wider than was reasonably necessary for the protection of the interests of the covenantee.

Semble, that the covenant would be too wide, and therefore invalid, in its application to any business which the company might carry on during twenty-five years.

Decision of Romer, J., reversed.

The law as to "general restraints" and "partial restraints" reviewed.

Per Bowen, L.J.—The rule as to general restraint of trade ought not to apply where a trader or manufacturer finds it necessary, for the advantageous transfer of the goodwill of a business in which he is interested and for the adequate protection of those who buy it, to covenant that he will retire altogether from the trade which is being disposed of, provided always that the covenant is one the tendency of which is not injurious to the public.

Appeal from a decision of Romer, J.

The question was whether a covenant entered into by the defendant with the plaintiff company, by which he agreed not to carry on certain businesses for twenty-five years, was valid or not.

The defendant prior to the year 1886 carried on business in London, Stockholm, and elsewhere as a manufacturer (being also patentee) of quick-firing guns and ammunition, and in 1886 sold those businesses to the Nordenfelt Co. for £287,500. The Nordenfelt Co. was afterwards amalgamated with the Maxim Gun Co., and the plaintiff company was the result of that amalgamation, being formed and registered in July, 1888. The defendant became the holder of a large number of shares in the plaintiff company, and was one of its first directors, and one of its first two managing directors. The defendant carried on various other businesses besides those which he had sold to the Nordenfelt Co., and in September, 1888, was forty-six years of age or thereabouts.

On the 12th of September, 1888, a deed was executed by the plaintiff company and by the defendant, pursuant to arrangements entered into before the formation of the plaintiff company, and by that deed it was covenanted between the parties as follows:—

"(2) The said Thorsten Nordenfelt (the defendant) shall not during the term of twenty-five years from the date of the incorporation of the company, if the company shall so long continue to carry on business, engage, except on behalf of the company, either directly or indirectly, in the trade or business of a manufacturer of guns, gun mountings or carriages, gunpowder explosives or ammunition, or in any business competing or liable to compete in any way with that for the time being carried on by the company; provided that such restriction shall not apply to explosives other than gunpowder, or to subaqueous or submarine boats or torpedoes, or castings or forgings of steel or iron, or alloys of iron, or of copper; provided also that the said Thorsten Nordenfelt shall not be released from this restriction by the company ceasing to carry on business merely for the purpose of reconstitution or with a view to the transfer of the business thereof to another company, so long as such other company taking a transfer thereof shall continue to carry on the same. (6) The said Thorsten Nordenfelt also covenants and agrees with the company that so long as the company, or any successor to or assignee of the business of the company, shall continue to carry on the business of the company, the company, or such successor or assignee, shall be entitled to the full and exclusive benefit of all new inventions or improvements now made or discovered, or that may hereafter be made or discovered by him in connection with guns, gun mountings or carriages, gunpowder explosives or ammunition, and with that object he will with all convenient speed communicate to the company particulars of any such new invention or improvement made or discovered by him, and will give to the company full information and details thereof, with all models, plans, drawings, and designs as to the exact mode of working and using the same, and from time to time at the expense in all things of the company will execute and do all such documents and things as may be requisite for the purpose of enabling the company to obtain in its name or in the name of any nominee any British, Colonial, or foreign patent for such inventions and improvements, and will from time to time and at all times give all such advice, explanations and instructions to the company and its employés as may be necessary to enable them effectually to exercise and work such inventions and improvements."

The defendant, pursuant to other parts of the agreement, acted as managing director of the plaintiff company till January, 1890, when, owing to disputes, he resigned, and since his resignation he had made arrangements with a foreign company known as the Société Cockerill, Belgian gun and ammunition manufacturers, for carrying on business with reference to quickfiring guns, &c.

The plaintiff company brought this action for the purpose, inter alia, (1) of restraining the defendant during twenty-five years from July, 1888, if the plaintiff company or its successors should so long continue to carry on business, from engaging, except on behalf of the plaintiff company or its successors, either directly or indirectly, in the trade or business of the manufacture of guns, gun mountings or carriages, gunpowder, &c. (except as mentioned in the agreement), or in any business competing or liable to compete in any way with that carried on by the plaintiff company or its successors; and (2) of obtaining an order directing the defendant to transfer to the plaintiff company certain patents alleged to have been taken out by him since January, 1890, for inventions in guns, ammunition, &c.

Romer, J., held that the provisions of clause 6 of the deed as to the patents must be enforced, but refused to grant the plaintiff company any relief in respect of the covenant (contained in clause 2) in restraint of trade, holding that it was void upon the ground that it was too wide and within the mischief which renders all covenants against trade generally invalid.

From that decision, so far as it held the covenant in clause 2 invalid, the plaintiff company appealed.

Sir Horace Davey, Q.C., and W. F. Hamilton, for the appellants.—The covenant is valid. It is not too extensive or in excess of what is reasonably required for the protection of the covenantees. It is severable: Mallan v. May, 11 M. & W. 653; Price v. Green, 16 M. & W. 346; Baines v. Geary, 35 Ch. D. 154, 35 W. R. Dig. 64. The burden of proof is on the covenantor to show that public policy would be sacrificed if he were held bound to his covenant. Where, as the covenant as part of it, encourage rather than restrict trade in this country. In the next place, the business to which the covenant relates is very peculiar, owing to the small number and character of possible customers. Then, again, the assignment of the patents and their connection with the covenant prevent the covenant, for some years at all events, from having any tendency to produce a monopoly not already produced by the patents, and also prevent the covenant from imposing any undue restriction on the liberty of the defendant to carry on the businesses to which the covenant, as restricted, relates, and I can see no reason for holding that the possible duration of the covenant beyond the expiration of the patent invalidates the covenant. Further, our predecessors, from whom we inherit this branch of the law, would never have thought it contrary to public policy to prevent a man from assisting foreigners to compete with an English trader who had bought his business; and I am not aware that it has ever been judicially held to be contrary to public policy to give effect to a covenant entered into for such a purpose. Lastly, the covenantor is at liberty to carry on the specified businesses on behalf of the company, and is also at liberty to carry on for his own benefit the other businesses reserved to himself, and to which he prefers to devote his attention. Apart from public policy, the covenant in question is reasonable as restricted. So restricted, it is not wider than is reasonably necessary for the protection of the interests of the covenantees.

On these grounds I am of opinion that the appeal ought to be allowed. The order appealed from ought to be varied by declaring that the covenant in question is valid so far as it relates to the trade or business of a manufacturer of guns, gun mountings or carriages, and gunpowder explosives or ammunition. An injunction restricted to those businesses ought to issue, and an inquiry ought to be directed to assess the damages sustained by the plaintiff company by reason of the breach by the defendant of his covenant as restricted, and the defendant ought to pay the costs of the appeal and also the costs of the action, except those expressly reserved by the order of Romer, J.

BOWEN, L.J., read the following judgment:—There was an early period in English history when the courts set their face apparently against all restrictions upon trade alike, whether limited or unlimited. This period has long since passed away, but it has been, in my opinion, the doctrine of the courts of common law ever since the reign of Queen Elizabeth that contracts in general restraint of trade are void as being contrary to public policy. Contracts in general restraint of trade may be defined as those by which a person restrains himself from all exercise of his trade in any part of England. A mere limit in time has never been held to convert a covenant in general restraint of trade into a covenant of particular or partial restraint of trade. It is necessary to insist on this distinction, which is embedded in the reports and text-writers of the last three centuries, since it is through not preserving the exact meaning of the term "in general restraint of trade" that some confusion has apparently at times arisen. The common law is as precise as it can be on the point. Contracts unlimited in area, although they may be limited in time, are, as a rule, held bad on the ground of public policy. The broad principle is be found as far back as the year 1614 in Rogers v. Parry, 11 Jac. 1, 2 Bulstrode, p. 136; and in Broad v. Jolyffe (1620), Cro. Jac. 596. It is reaffirmed explicitly by Parker, C.J., in the leading case of Mitchel v. Reynolds (1711), where "general restraint of trade" is explained and defined. The doctrine is assumed to be unquestioned in Chesman v. Nainby (1726), 2 Ld. Raymond, 1456, 1 Bro. Parl. C. 234; and in Clerke v. Comer (1734), Cas. temp. Hardwicke, 53. "Any deed," says Best, C.J., in Homer v. Ashford (1825), 3 Bing. 322, "by which a person binds himself not to employ his talents, his industry, or his capital in any useful undertaking in the kingdom would be void." A note to Hunlocke v. Blacklowe, 2 Wm. Saunders, 6th ed., 156, sufficiently states the reason why a covenant does not cease to be in general restraint of trade merely because the time is limited. "The principle," says the learned editor, "on which restraints of trade partial in point of space have been supported has not been applied to restraints general in point of space, but limited in point of time; for that which the law does not allow is not to be tolerated because it is to last for a short time only." A similar explanation is given by Parke, B., in Ward v. Byrne (1839), 5 M. & W. 562, where a covenant indefinite as to the area of restraint of trade, but limited to nine months after the end of the covenantor's employment, was held void in law. "When a general restriction limited only as to time is imposed, the public are altogether losers for that time of the services of the individual, and do not derive any benefit whatever in return." "Looking at the authorities cited it does not appear," says Parke, B., "that there is one clear authority in favour of a total restriction upon trade limited only as to time." An ambiguous expression as to limits in respect of time in the gunmaker's case (Gunmakers' Co. v. Fell, Willes Rep. 384) is explained by Parke, B., and is due probably to an oversight. The judgment of Rolfe, B., is on the same lines as that of Parke, B. Partial restrictions "have always left things in this state, that when allowed a portion of the public is not injured at all; that portion of the public to which the restriction does not extend remains exactly as before. But here"—viz., in a case of general restraint for a time certain—"the whole of the public is restrained during the period in question." Ward v. Byrne was followed, in 1840, by Hinde v. Gray, 1 Scott N. R. 123. Tindal, C.J., repeats the proposition in Proctor v. Sargent (1840), 2 Man. & Gran. 20. "Where we once hold a restriction to be unreasonable in point of space the shortness of the time for which it is imposed will not make it good." The truth is that the classification which seems to distinguish restraints which are limited in point of space from restraints which are limited in respect of time is a cross division. The antithesis between time and space looks so plausible that some text-books and more than one judge in the last few years have lapsed into the mistake of supposing that it corresponds in any way to the line of cleavage upon which general restraints and partial restraints are divided. "In respect of space," says Lord Campbell, in Tallis v. Tallis (1853), "there must be some limit." Since the reign of Queen Elizabeth the common law authorities are really all one way. Scores of cases have proceeded on this basis, and those who dispute the rule can only do so, as it seems to me, by disregarding the judgments and opinions of an uncounted number of unanimous common law judges.

Distinguished from these general restraints which the English law discountenances are partial or limited restraints, or, as they are sometimes termed, particular restraints, which upon certain conditions the English law permits and enforces. An agreement in "particular" or "partial" restraint of trade may be defined as one in which the area of restriction is not absolute but in which the covenantor retains for himself the right still to carry on his trade either in some place, for the benefit of some persons or in some limited or prescribed manner. Particular restraints, accordi tion, and whether it be of the party's own trade or not; that to obtain the sole exercise of any known trade throughout England is a complete monopoly and against the policy of the law; that no man can contract not to use his trade at all; and in other parts of that judgment these topics are further enlarged upon. A sharp line is drawn between general restraints not to carry on a particular trade anywhere in England and partial restraints, which are not so extensive. The former are condemned because they cannot be of any use to the covenantee and must be to the detriment of the English public. The latter are allowed, provided they are founded on a sufficient or good and adequate consideration and are not unduly oppressive—i.e., not more extensive than is reasonably necessary for the protection of the covenantee. Such I take to be the law as laid down in Mitchel v. Reynolds, in which an attempt was made to show how two conflicting principles might be harmonized.

It is curious to observe how the law upon this subject has gradually been relaxed to suit developments of trade, and has been made conformable to modern ideas and views of public policy and of reasonableness. In the times of Henry V. and of Elizabeth covenants, even in partial restrain of trade, were held contrary to public policy, although they have long since ceased to be so regarded—see In re Dyer's case, 2 Hen. V., Pasch. fo. 5, pl. 26, and In re Blacksmith's case, 29 Eliz., the substance of which will be found in Pollock on Contracts, 5th ed., p. 341. When Mitchel v. Reynolds was decided, and for many years afterwards, it was considered that the consideration for covenants in partial restraint of trade must be adequate. This, however, was held in Hitchcock v. Coker, 6 Ad. & E. 438, not to be necessary, and the old view on this point has never since been entertained. Again, it used to be considered that in actions on covenants in partial restraint of trade there was a presumption rather against than in favour of the validity of the covenant, but in Hitchcock v. Coker, and again in Tallis v. Tallis, 1 W. R. 114, 1 E. & B. 391, this view was held to be erroneous, and covenants in partial restraint of trade were upheld which were not shown to be unreasonable on the ground that they extended further than was required for the protection of the covenantee. As regards space, the old doctrine certainly was that a covenant not to carry on a particular business anywhere in England was invalid. But this was because in former times it was thought impossible that so wide a covenant could be necessary for the reasonable protection of the covenantee, and it was thought that so wide a covenant must necessarily be injurious to the public interest.

A little consideratiou, however, will show that in modern times and as business is now carried on neither of these reasons is universally true, and the rule which condemns all covenants not to carry on a particular trade anywhere in England must have some exception or qualification or be quite unfitted for modern use. Suppose, for instance, that an English patentee sells his patent, and covenants that during its subsistence he will not carry on any business in England which involves any infringement of the patent, and that if he does he will pay the purchaser certain sums by way of liquidated damages. No one, I apprehend, could possibly hold the covenant to be invalid simply because it extended to the whole of England. To adhere in all cases to the old rule that a covenant in restraint of trade must be void if it extends to the whole of England will frequently be found to sacrifice the principle which underlies the rule to the rule itself, and, whenever this is the case, to adhere to the rule is as contrary to sound legal principles as it is contrary to good sense. Accordingly, whilst the principle on which the old division of restraints into general and partial depended ought not to be lost sight of, and has been constantly enforced in many modern instances, there are, on the other hand, several cases in which covenants in restraint of trade have been held valid, although the restraint extended over the whole of England. When, however, these cases are examined they will be found to conform with the principle which underlies the reasoning of the judgment in Mitchel v. Reynolds, for in those cases the restraint was not greater than the protection of the covenantee required, and the covenant, taken in connection with the business to which it referred, could not be said to be injurious to the public interests. The cases to which I more particularly refer are Wallis v. Day; Jones v. Lees; Leather Cloth Co. v. Lorsont, 18 W. R. 572, L. R. 9 Eq. 345; Rousillon v. Rousillon; Badische Anilin Soda Fabrik v. Schott.

Whittaker v. Howe, in which Lord Langdale enforced a covenant by a solicitor not to practise anywhere in the United Kingdom, went, I think, too far, because there was nothing to take the case out of the general rule which invalidates so wide a covenant. The covenant imposed a greater restraint than the protection of the covenantee required, and was therefore, in my view, contrary to public policy. Wickens, V.C., declined to follow that case in Allsopp v. Wheatcroft, but he thought the want of limit as to space necessarily fatal, and Cotton, L.J., I think, took the same view in Davies v. Davies. But this, again, is not, in my judgment, in all cases without exception. In Rousillon v. Rousillon Fry, L.J., in one of those admirable judgments for which he was so justly celebrated, came to the conclusion that the only test by which to determine the validity or invalidity of a covenant in restraint of trade given for valuable consideration was its reasonableness for the protection of the trade or business of the covenantee. This accords with the view of James, L.J., in Leather Cloth Co. v. Lorsont, and is, in my opinion, the doctrine to which the modern authorities have been gradually approximating. But I cannot regard it as finally settled, nor, indeed, as quite correct. The doctrine ignores the law which forbids monopolies and prevents a person from unrestrictedly binding himself not to earn his living in the best way he can. Our predecessors expressed their views on this subject by drawing a distinction between partial and general restraint of trade, and this distinction cannot be ignored. But what is more important than nomenclature or classification is the principle which underlies both.

I have endeavoured to arrive at and to express the principle on which this branch of the law is founded, and, applying it to the present case, I have come to the conclusion that the defendant's covenant is not wholly void, but that it is valid and ought to be enforced to the extent to which the plaintiff company seeks to enforce it. My reasons are as follows:—(1) The covenant is severable, and if, as I think is the case, the covenant is too wide in its application to any business which the company may carry on during twenty-five years, still the covenant may be and is valid as regards the gun and ammunition business: see Mallan v. May, Price v. Green, and Baines v. Geary. (2) The covenant thus restricted, although unlimited as to space, and in that sense and to that extent general, is nevertheless not contrary to public policy, and, therefore, not contrary to the rule which forbids general as distinguished from partial restraints. In the first place, the covenant is part of a transaction for securing to an English company the inventions and business of a foreigner. The transaction, and trade, and which is, therefore, partial. The only real question that remained, on such a view of that particular bargain, was whether it was a reasonable one, as to which point the remark that the privilege was commensurate with the restraint appears conclusive. The case is similar to those in which rules regulating trade have been distinguished from rules made in restraint of it—Freemantle v. Silk Throwsters' Co. (1668), 1 Lev. 229; Wannel v. Chamberlain of London (1725), 1 Str. 675; Bosworth v. Hearne (1737), Andrews, 91; Harrison v. Godman (1756), 1 Burr. 12; R. v. Harrison (1762), 3 Burr. 1322, 1328. The inquiry as to the reasonableness of the restraint in any particular instance is, however, one that appertains only to the case of partial restraints. It is no objection necessarily to such partial restraints that they are sometimes to continue during the life of the covenantor, who may possibly survive the covenantee, for such an arrangement enables the goodwill of the business to become the object of purchase and sale: Atkyns v. Kinnier, 4 Ex. 776, 782; Pemberton v. Vaughan, 10 Q. B. 87, 89.

Such is a résumé of the history of the common law doctrine as to restraint of trade. The first cloud upon the clear sky of the common law narrative comes in the equity decision of Lord Langdale in Whittaker v. Howe (1841), a decision all the more inexplicable since it was given within three or four years of Hitchcock v. Coker, Wallis v. Day, Leighton v. Wales, Archer v. Marsh, Ward v. Byrne, Hinde v. Gray, and Proctor v. Sargent, from a careful study of which cases alone the broad doctrine of the law as I have above described it may be gathered with perfect ease. The case of Whittaker v. Howe was one in which a solicitor, for valuable consideration, agreed not to practise as a solicitor in any part of Great Britain for twenty years. Everything appears clear in the case except the judgment of the court. The covenant was not a covenant in partial but in general restraint of trade; and, the restraint of trade being a general one, the court had nothing to do with the reasonableness of the transaction. Lord Langdale nevertheless begins by stating that the question was whether the restraint intended to be imposed on the defendant was reasonable; and he cites as a guide for himself the words of Tindal, C.J., in Horner v. Graves, 7 Bing. 743. Yet Horner v. Graves is an instance of partial, and not general, restraint of trade, and Tindal, C.J., in giving judgment explicitly so states. Lord Langdale next refers in support of his conclusion to Davis v. Mason, which, again, is a case not of unlimited but of limited restraint. Lord Langdale thus appears to miss the whole point of the common law classification, and treats the matter before him under the wrong category. It is to be observed, however, that Whittaker v. Howe was merely a decision upon an application for an interlocutory injunction, and that Lord Langdale himself appears to have reserved the right to reconsider the matter at the hearing. "In the progress of the cause," he says, "it may become necessary to consider further the points which have been raised, but at present I am of opinion that the right claimed by the defendant to act in violation of the contract for which he has received the consideration is at least so far doubtful that he ought not to be permitted to take the law into his own hands." As Patteson, J., points out in Nichols v. Stretton, 10 Q. B., at p. 353, the decision in Whitaker v. Howe cannot be reconciled with Ward v. Byrne, or, indeed, with the whole stream of common law authority. In 1869 the case of the Leather Cloth Co. v. Lorsont occurred before James, V.C. To the soundness of the actual decision in that case of the illustrious equity lawyer who tried it I have no objection to urge; but his language seems calculated in several passages to confuse and not to throw light upon our conceptions of the established common law doctrine. The Vice-Chancellor's expressions are at times coloured by the same kind of misapprehension of the common law as that which pervades the judgment of Lord Langdale in Whittaker v. Howe. The defendant in the Leather Cloth Co.'s case had sold to the plaintiff company certain letters patent for the manufacture of American leather cloth, together with all the processes of manufacture. He covenanted in return not to carry on in any part of Europe the manufacture which was the subject of the patent, and not to communicate to any person or persons the means or processes of such manufacture so as in any way to interfere with the exclusive enjoyment by the plaintiff company of the benefits agreed to be purchased. This was nothing but the sale of a secret process with a corresponding covenant not to use it or divulge it; and the sale, moreover, of a process which could not be used without being divulged. Sales of secret processes are not within the principle or the mischief of restraints of trade at all. By the very transaction in such cases the public gains on the one side what is lost on the other; and unless such a bargain was treated as outside the doctrine of general restraints of trade, there could be no sale at all of secret processes of manufacture. In order to justify such an obvious exception it was not necessary to deny the existence of the common law rule against general restraints of trade. Yet the Vice-Chancellor observes that a man may enter into any stipulation, however restrictive, provided that the restriction, in the judgment of the court, is not unreasonable, having regard to the subject-matter of the contract. In so saying he apparently ignores the distinction that had been drawn for more than 250 years between general and partial restraints of trade. The test he suggests as the true one in all cases entirely leaves out of sight the interests of the public, on the consideration of which interests the rule against general restraint of trade is built. In Allsopp v. Wheatcroft (1872) Wickens, V.C., restated and reaffirmed the common law doctrine as to general restraints of trade, and explained the decision in the Leather Cloth Co. v. Lorsont as an exception due to the character of the subject-matter. Some years later, in Rousillon v. Rousillon, Fry, L.J. (then Fry, J.), in one of the many striking and brilliant judgments for which the profession will long admire him, proclaimed his disbelief in the existence of the rule of the common law, and laid down the proposition that there is no absolute doctrine that a covenant in restraint of trade is void merely because it is unlimited in regard to space. The question in each case, he held, was whether the restraint extended further than was necessary for the reasonable protection of the covenantee, and that if it did not do so the performance of the covenant would be enforced even though the restriction was unlimited as to space. This broad negation of the rule appears to me to destroy the distinction (illustrated at length in Mitchel v. Reynolds) which always has subsisted between general and partial restraints of trade. In destroying it Fry, L.J., appears to me to overlook the principle which underlies the entire doctrine of the unlawfulness of general restraints of trade, that the interests of the contracting parties are not necessarily the same as the interests of the commonwealth. Rules which rest upon the foundation of public policy, not being rules which belong to the fixed or customary law, are capable on proper occasion of expansion or modification. Circumstances may change and make a commercial practice expedient which formerly was mischievous to commerce

But it is one thing to say that an occasion has arisen, upon which, to adhere to the letter of the rule, would be to neglect its spirit, and another to deny that the rule still exists. The dicta which Fry, L.J., cites from Hitchcock v. Coker, from Tallis v. Tallis, and from Mallan v. May are all dicta in cases of partial restraint, where the reasonableness of the particular contract necessarily came under consideration. The necessary protection of the individual may in such cases be the proper measure of the reasonableness of the bargain. When Fry, L.J., passes (28 W. R. 626, 14 Ch. D. 366) to examine the question of the existence of the common law rule, he assumes, as it appears to me, without sufficient justification, that complete protection of the individual is the only reason which ought to lie at the root of the doctrine. But the reasonableness of the legal principle which forbids general restraint altogether is not the same thing as the reasonableness (as between the parties) of the bargain in any particular case. With regard to the argument that the rule, if it existed, would be an artificial one and would therefore admit of no exceptions, the judgments of the judges and of the House of Lords in the case of Egerton v. Earl Brownlow, 4 H. L. Cas. 1, illustrate, I submit, the distinction between a fixed rule of customary law and a rule based on reason and policy. The latter may admit of exceptions, although the former may not. Nor does the Lord Justice, to my mind, sufficiently allow for the weight of a multitude of decided cases when he states that "there are undoubtedly cases in which it has been said that the restraint must not be universal," and illustrates this by reference to Ward v. Byrne, Hinde v. Gray, and Allsopp v. Wheatcroft. The entire history of the subject of restraint of trade proceeds surely on the basis of the existence of the rule in question. With Whittaker v. Howe I have already dealt. Jones v. Lees was, as I have pointed out, a case of partial restraint in respect of the mode of manufacture. "I consider," says Fry, L.J., in conclusion, "that the cases in which an unlimited prohibition has been spoken of as void relate only to circumstances in which such a prohibition has been unreasonable." Is it not a truer view that the courts have never even entered on the consideration of the circumstances of any particular case where the prohibition has been unlimited as to area? In Davies v. Davies opposite opinions on the subject of the common law rule were expressed both by Cotton, L.J., and by Fry, L.J., but the matter did not call for decision.

The result seems to me to be as follows:—General restraints, or, in other words, restraints wholly unlimited in area, are not permitted by the law. Partial restrains, or, in other words, restraints which involve only a limit of places at which, of persons with whom, or of modes in which the business is to be carried on, are valid when made for a good consideration, and where they do not extend further than is necessary for the reasonable protection of the covenantee. A limit in time does not by itself convert a general restraint into a partial one. "That which the law does not allow is not to be tolerated because it is to last for a short time only." In considering, however, the reasonableness of a partial restraint, the time for which it is to be imposed may be a material element to consider. Such, I think, is a résumé of the common law doctrine up to this day.

I proceed now to consider, upon this view of the law, the appeal before us. In my opinion the different parts of the covenant are really capable of being separated from each other. The present breach relates to one portion only, and the covenant, even if it were invalid as to the rest, might, I think, nevertheless, be binding as to part. The real question in respect of which the action is brought was, as we were informed, a threat by Mr. Nordenfelt to engage abroad in the sale or manufacture of guns and ammunition. The case thus raised is a new and unprecedented one. Mr. Nordenfelt's old business did not, broadly speaking, consist in the supply of commodities to any English city or district, nor of any article intended for English consumption or use at all. He may have at times, for anything we know, supplied the English Government with some materials for war, but his trade consisted in manufacturing and selling guns and ammunition for the use and benefit of the foreign world, or of the middleman and agents who negotiate orders for foreign exportation. The area over which he might distribute his guns or ammunition was a foreign one, unlimited in geographical space, no doubt, but it must be remembered that the Governments or bodies who require to use guns and materials of war are capable of approximate enumeration. A covenant in restraint of trade made by such a person as the defendant with a company he really assists in creating to take over his trade differs widely from the covenants made in the days of Queen Elizabeth by the traders and merchants of the then English towns and country places. When we turn from the homely usages out of which the doctrine of Mitchel v. Reynolds sprang to the central trade of the few great undertakings which supply war material to the Executives of the world, we appear to pass into a different atmosphere from that of Mitchel v. Reynolds. To apply to such transactions as the present the rule that was invented centuries ago in order to discourage the oppression of English traders and to prevent monopolies in this country seems to be the bringing into play of an old-fashioned instrument. In regard, indeed, of all industry a great change has taken place in England. Railways and steamships, postal communication, telegraphs, and advertisements have centralized business and altered the entire aspect of local restraints on trade. The ancient rules, however, still exist; it is desirable that they should be understood to remain in force, but great care is evidently necessary not to force them upon transactions which, if the meaning of the rule is to be observed, ought really to be exceptions. "The determination of what is contrary to the so-called policy of the law"—say the Privy Council in Evanturel v. Evanturel, 23 W. R. 32, at p. 36, L. R. 6 P. C. 1, at p. 29—"necessarily varies from time to time. Many transactions are upheld now by our own courts which a former generation would have avoided as contrary to the supposed policy of the law. The rule remains, but its application varies with the principles which for the time being guide public opinion." This passage from the judgment of the Privy Council appears to foreshadow exactly the problem we have in the present appeal to solve. Is this case one which falls within the rule against general restraint of trade, or ought it to be an exception? Exceptions to rules which are not "artificial" but based on reason and public policy ought themselves to be instances in which to apply the letter of the rule would be to violate its true meaning, and in which the very reason on which the rule is based mililates in favour of the exception. One instance of an exception to the rule which discourages general restraints of trade is admitted to exist in respect of the assignment of trade secrets, and it may here be useful again to allude to the ground upon which such dispositions of property are excluded from the operation of the ordinary doctrine. In the case of the assignment of a trade secret there arises a conflict between two ideas, both of which are developments in opposite directions of the larger principle that English industry and trade ought to be left free. The first of the two seemingly antagonistic corollaries to which this larger principle leads is the maxim that no one should be allowed to contract himself out of his liberty to trade. The second, which appears to conflict with the first, is that every man should be at liberty to sell the goodwill of his trade on any terms that are neither oppressive to himself nor injurious to the State. These two antinomies are well contrasted by James, V.C., in the Leather Cloth Co.'s case. The history, indeed, of the entire doctrine as to restraint in trade is itself nothing but a narrative of the continual efforts of the English law, amidst all the changing conditions of English industry and commerce, to adjust and harmonize these two opposite points of view. It has been in the process of such gradual adjustment that the more indulgent law as to partial restraint of trade has been evolved. The laxer rule as to partial restraint is thus itself an exception, the definition of which again expanded from time to time as society required it. The law as to trade secrets, like the law of partial restraint, is an exception too. Before the manufacturer or trader sells his trade secret he is the sole possessor of it. If he is to sell it to advantage, he must of necessity be able to undertake not to retain the right to use it or to communicate it to others. A covenant that he will not destroy the value of that which he himself is handing over causes in such a case no diminution in the supply of commodities to the world, but tends, in nine cases out of ten, to stimulate it. There is no tendency in such a transaction to create a monopoly, for the monopoly existed ex hypothesi already. Trade cannot suffer by the substitution of one possessor of a secret for another. The analogy between the sale of a trade secret and the sale or transfer of a goodwill of such a business as Mr. Nordenfelt's is not, of course, exact, but there is a strong similarity between the two cases. Mr. Nordenfelt has assisted in creating the plaintiff company to take over what really had been his own business. It never could have been called into existence as a substantial undertaking if he had not been willing to retire in the company's favour from the whole field of competition. He obtained ample consideration for what he gave.

But he also retained (as ought not to be forgotten) the right still to continue trading in a substantial portion of his old manufacture — torpedoes, submarine boats, explosives other than gunpowder, and other matters. So much as to the reasonableness of the agreement itself. But it still remains to be considered whether such an agreement can be calculated to injure the public. It seems to me that it would almost amount to legal pedantry if courts of law were to discover in Mr. Nordenfelt's covenant the elements of danger to the commonwealth. He agreed to disappear from the number of those who make guns and ammunition for other countries. How can the British public possibly be inconvenienced by this? He ceases, it may be said, to employ English labour so far as his manufacture of guns and ammunition is concerned. But he only does so in order to enable a thriving company to take his place, at the disposal of which he was to place for a time his services; and the restriction on himself to which he has consented will only last while his place in the trade is actively filled by the company or the successors to whom in turn it may resell the goodwill. So far as he might have had occasion to supply the English Government with guns or ammunition this company can act in his stead; although out of his liberty to do so if he desires it, he cannot in law contract himself, nor is his agreement to be read as imposing any such invalid or possibly illegal stipulation. Can it, then, be said that a contract by which he consents to the transfer of the business of making guns and ammunition for foreign lands to an English company with whom he undertakes not to compete so long as the old trade is flourishing in their hands, is against the policy of English law? So to hold would surely be to reduce to an absurdity the law of restraint of trade. I answer the question in the words of Lord Nottingham in the Duke of Norfolk's case:—"Pray let us so resolve cases here that they may stand with the reason of mankind when they are debated abroad."

For the purpose of clearness I will, in conclusion, attempt to summarize the exact ground on which I consider this case should be decided. The rule as to general restraint of trade ought not, in my judgment, to apply where a trader or manufacturer finds it necessary, for the advantageous transfer of the goodwill of a business in which he is so interested, and for the adequate protection of those who buy it, to covenant that he will retire altogether from the trade which is being disposed of, provided always that the covenant is one the tendency of which is not injurious to the public. This last element in the definition ought not, I think, to be overlooked, for I can conceive cases in which the absolute restraint might as between the parties be reasonable, but yet might tend directly to injure the public, and a rule founded on public policy does not admit of any exception that would really produce public mischief; such might be possibly the case if it was calculated to create a pernicious monopoly in articles for English use, a point I desire to leave open, and one which, having regard to the growth of syndicates and trusts, may some day or other become extremely important. As good faith demands that Mr. Nordenfelt should be bound by his solemn agreement and as the public can in no way be injured by his being held to it, I think the injunction as defined by my brother Lindley should be granted, and the order made in the form he has suggested.

A. L. SMITH, L.J., in delivering a written judgment said:—The question for determination is whether, where it is sought to enforce a covenant in restraint of trade made upon good consideration, which is unlimited as regards space, but is limited in some other way, such as to the persons with whom the covenantor is to trade, or as to the business which he is prohibited from carrying on, the court is to declare the covenant ipso facto void, or is to ascertain whether in the circumstances of the case the restraint is reasonable or not. [His lordship, having referred to the facts of the case and to the covenant in clause (2) set out above, proceeded:—] I am of opinion that that portion of the covenant which restrained the defendant from carrying on any business whatever, competing or liable to compete in any way with that for the time being carried on by the company, is severable from the rest as was held in Mallan v. May and Price v. Green and many other cases since. This is not, therefore, a covenant as Romer, J., apparently at one time thought void by reason of its preventing the defendant from carrying on all the businesses mentioned in the articles of association of the plaintiff company. The covenant, as it will be seen, is expressly limited to one only of the classes of business in which the defendant was skilled. It left open to him to trade when and where he pleased in all the numerous nitro-glycerine powders and explosives, including dynamite, also in torpedoes, castings or forgings of steel or iron or alloys of iron or copper; obviously a very large area in which to carry on business.

It is unnecessary to determine the point which gave rise to the difference of opinion between Cotton, L.J., and Fry, L.J., in Davies v. Davies, whether, in the case of a covenant in general restraint of trade which is absolute and unlimited, the court is or is not to ascertain if the covenant is reasonable under the circumstances, as thought Fry, L.J., or if it is ipso facto void, as being against public policy, as was the opinion of Cotton, L.J., for this point does not arise; but I must say that I incline to the opinion that a covenant by a man never again to trade anywhere in anything is ipso facto void, as being against public policy, and that it is too late now to question the law as to this, even if it were desired to do so. In this case the covenant, though unlimited as to space, is limited as to the subject-matter of the restraint.

It was argued by the Solicitor-General, for the defendant, that, if in fact the covenant be unlimited as regards space, it mattered not how much or how little of the covenantor's trading was restrained, and he asserted that the covenant was ipso facto void; and he cited cases, and especially the case of Ward v. Byrne, where the restraint was absolute for nine months, and being unlimited as to space was held bad; and Allsopp v. Wheatcroft, where Wickens, V.C., thought that there was a recognized rule as to the necessity of a limitation of space to render a covenant valid, dissenting from the opinion of James, V.C., in Leather Cloth Co. v. Lorsont. The whole of the cases have been dealt with either in the masterly judgment of Fry, J., in Rousillon v. Rousillon (1880), or by Bowen, L.J., in his judgment just delivered. Over fifty years ago Lord Langdale held in Whittaker v. Howe that a covenant restraining a solicitor from practising in any part of Great Britain for a period of twenty years should be enforced. I do not stop to inquire whether the case was rightly decided, but I cite it as I believe it is one of the first, if not the first, cases in which a covenant was held to be good, with no limit as to space. In the case of Leather Cloth Co. v. Lorsont (1869) James, V.C., held that a covenant restraining trading throughout the United Kingdom was not, upon the face of it, necessarily bad, and he stated that he did not read the cases as having laid down any such irrebuttable presumption. Fry, L.J. (then Fry, J.), in Rousillon v. Rousillon held the same, though he went further, and Chitty, J., in Badische Anilin und Soda Fabrik v. Schott also held that a covenant unlimited as to space was in that case valid. It is true that Cotton, L.J., in one part of his judgment in Davies v. Davies approved of the decision in Allsopp v. Wheatcroft, but (36 W. R., at p. 88, 36 Ch. D., at p. 383) he says: "The case of Hitchcock v. Coker (1837) I think introduced what I may here mention, that undoubtedly now if a covenant is in any way limited, either sufficiently as regards space or sufficiently as regards time, then it will not be considered as an absolute restraint of trade, but only a limited restraint, and then the question as to whether the limit is reasonable will come into consideration." Cotton, L.J., did not deal with a covenant partial in itself as regards the subject-matter of the restraint, but the learned Lord Justice appears to me to have thought that a covenant which was only in partial restraint of trade was not void merely because it was unlimited as to space. Bowen, L.J., has fully discussed the question whether a limit as to time ever converts a covenant which is in general restraint of trade into a covenant in partial restraint of trade, and I agree, not only with his remarks, but in the conclusion he has arrived at thereon. The judges who took part in the above-mentioned cases appear to have thought that a non-limit as to space was not in all cases of itself fatal to a covenant in restraint of trade. I may point out that one of the grounds given by Lord Macclesfield in his well-known judgment in Mitchel v. Reynolds why covenants in general restraint of trade were void, and which especially applies to a covenant unlimited in point of space, has in my opinion no application at the present day. He says where restraint is general throughout the kingdom this must be void, being no benefit to either party, and only oppressive, "for what does it signify to a tradesman in London what another does at Newcastle?" That may have been a good reason in 1711, but it certainly is not so at the present day.

I now come to some of the cases in which, the subject-matter of the covenant being only a partial restraint of trade, such covenants have been held to be good, though unlimited in any other way. In Gale and Others v. Reed, 8 East, p. 79 (1806), the plaintiffs sued the defendant for breach of a covenant for not during his lifetime employing exclusively the plaintiffs to make all the cordage ordered of the defendant by his friends and connections whom the plaintiffs could trust. It was held that inasmuch as the defendant had only covenanted to employ the plaintiffs to make cordage for those of the defendant's friends whom the plaintiffs could trust, this was only a partial restraint of trade, for the defendant could supply those whom the plaintiffs did not think fit to trust, and that, consequently, this covenant was valid. The case of Young v. Timmins (1831) is an exemplification of a covenant being held good where the covenantor covenants to work exclusively for one master to the exclusion of all others. So in Wallis v. Day (1837) a man for good consideration covenanted that he would not, during his life, exercise his trade of a carrier except as the assistant-carrier of A. B. The court held the covenant good, upon the ground that it was not an absolute, but a partial restraint, for the man was not restrained during his life-time from serving A. B., he was only restrained from serving anyone else. In Jones v. Lees the plaintiff, a patentee of improvements in spinning machines, bound the defendant to use his patent during the term of the patent, and the defendant covenanted with the plaintiff not to make or sell any machines without the plaintiff's invention being used therein. The court held that inasmuch as the restraint was partial as to the mode of exercising the trade, although total as to space the covenant was valid. In the case of Mills v. Dunham this court held that a covenant not to transact business after leaving an employer similar to the business transacted by the employer was valid, it being only a partial restraint, and this although there was no other limit in the case. These cases show that a covenant in partial restraint of trade, whether as to the person with whom the covenantor is to trade, or as to the business which he is prohibited from carrying on, may be good although unlimited as to space. In my judgment there is no such hard and fast rule as is contended for—viz., that every covenant in restraint of trade is ipso facto void if it is unlimited as to space; but, on the contrary, in my judgment a covenant which is but a partial restraint of trade will be good, though unlimited as to space, if, in the circumstances of the particular case to which it is applied, the covenant is reasonable.

The court has therefore to determine whether the covenant in question, under the circumstances existing in this case, is an unreasonable restraint of trade, applying the well-recognized rule as to reasonableness; for, if the covenant be reasonable, it ought to be enforced. The question of reasonableness—though an inference to be drawn from existing facts—has ever been held to be a matter of law. The rule to be applied has long since been settled by the cases of

Horner v. Graves and Hitchcock v. Coker, and acted upon. It is this: "Where the restraint is such as only to afford a fair protection to the interests of the party in favour of whom it is given, and not so large as to interfere with the interests of the public, then the covenant is not unreasonable."

Now arise the questions, Are the limits of time and space in the covenant sued on reasonable for the protection of the covenantee? and, Is the covenant so large as to interfere with the interests of the public? It is argued that the defendant was forty-six years of age when he entered into the covenant, a twenty-five years' restriction would probably continue during his lifetime, and it was suggested that it was no limit at all, but was merely delusive. I do not agree with these suggestions. It will be remembered that if the plaintiffs and their successors cease to trade, the restraint comes to an end. The £287,500 which the plaintiffs paid to the defendant for the business must obviously take many years before it can be recouped by trading; and why am I to hold that twenty-five years is more than a fair protection to the plaintiffs? No facts have been given in evidence from which I can draw such an inference. Indeed, what facts have been proved tend in an opposite direction. In considering this, it does not seem to me that the age of the covenantor is the matter to be considered, but what is the fair protection of the covenantee; and I may say that my own opinion is that if the limit had been the covenantor's life in the special circumstances of the case it would not have been unreasonable.

Now, as to the limit of space.

The plaintiffs' business is world-wide; there is hardly a place of note in any quarter of the globe into which they do not carry on business, and, consequently, from which competition may not arise. How can it be truly said that a restraint which is but co-extensive with the area traded over by the plaintiffs is unreasonable, and affords more than a fair protection to their interests? In my judgment the limit of space in all these cases must necessarily vary with the ever-changing circumstances attending the development of trade and the varying circumstances of the particular trader; and, bearing in mind what the plaintiffs' trade is, the limit, though co-extensive with the world, is not, in my opinion, unreasonable. In my opinion the limits of time and space in this particular case are no more than to afford a fair protection to the plaintiffs.

Now, as to public policy.

Of the many reasons given by Lord Macclesfield in Mitchel v. Reynolds as to why a covenant in restraint of trade was void as being against public policy, at the present time by far the most cogent, if not the only ones, still extant are—(1) that a man may not be prevented from working at his trade and thus become destitute; and (2) that the State has an interest in the producing power of its members. Where a man is left not only with such an area wherein to trade and to continue to earn his living, but is also placed in possession of between £200,000 and £300,000, as the defendant in this case is, and the public are not deprived of the trade theretofore carried on by the covenantor, I cannot myself see how, as a matter of fact, either of the above-mentioned public policies are trenched upon, and I think they are not. I entirely agree with what was said by Sir George Jessel in The Printing and Numerical Registering Co. v. Sampson, 23 W. R. 463, L. R. 19 Eq. 465, that there is, at any rate, another public policy which he called "paramount"—viz., that "men of full age and competent understanding should have the utmost liberty of contracting, and that their contracts, when entered into freely and voluntarily, should be held sacred and should be enforced by courts of justice." How are the interests of the public interfered with? They have a company producing in England what the defendant otherwise might have produced, and probably as efficiently as the defendant would have done, and they have also a man (the defendant) equipped with a very large sum of money wherewith to carry on the numerous trades which are left in his uncontrolled possession. In my judgment the interests of the public are certainly not interfered with, at least to their detriment, and the point of public policy does not avail the defendant. For these reasons I am of opinion that the covenant should be enforced, that the appeal must be allowed, and the relief as framed by Lindley, L.J., granted.

Appeal allowed.

NOTE.—It being stated that the defendant desired to appeal to the House of Lords, the court said that the operation of the injunction would be suspended for two months, the defendant giving an undertaking to be answerable in damages to the plaintiffs. There would be liberty to apply to the court.

Ex parte CATHCART. (a.)

Solicitor—Costs—Agreement—"Fair and reasonable"—Attorneys and Solicitors Act, 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 28), ss. 4, 8, 9.

An agreement as to the remuneration of a solicitor, to be "fair and reasonable" within the meaning of the Attorneys and Solicitors Act, 1870, must be "fair" in the sense of having been fairly obtained, and "reasonable" in the sense of being reasonable in its terms.

A solicitor, who was retained by a client to attend on her behalf upon the taxation of a bill of costs, made an agreement in writing with his client under which the client was to pay him five per cent. on all costs taxed off the bill. The bill of costs when delivered amounted to about £5,000, and about £2,000 was taxed off, the greater part of this latter sum consisting of refresher fees paid to counsel which were largely in excess of the fees allowed by the rules. The client having applied, under sections 8 and 9 of the Attorneys and Solicitors Act, 1870, to have the agreement set aside as not being "fair and reasonable,"

Held, that, as the agreement was fully explained to the client, and its effect was understood by her before she entered into it, it could not be said to be unfair; but that, as the remuneration which the solicitor would receive under the agreement was largely in excess of that which he would receive for the work done apart from the agreement, the terms thereof were not reasonable, and the agreement must be set aside.

Appeal from an order of the Queen's Bench Division affirming an order of the judge at chambers setting aside an agreement between a solicitor and his client, Mrs. Cathcart, respecting the amount of payment for his services.

Certain costs having been incurred in proceedings in lunacy instituted by Mr. Cathcart against his wife, by which he sought to have her declared of unsound mind, and in which he failed, an order was made that two-thirds of the husband's taxed costs should be paid out of certain Consols belonging to Mrs. Cathcart. Before the bill of costs was delivered Mrs. Cathcart required her solicitor, R. A. Stuart, to make the following written agreement:—"Cathcart v. Cathcart.—Dear Sir,—I agree to pay you 5 per cent. on all costs taxed off Messrs. Crawley & Arnold's bill in the above action.—MARY CATHCART. I agree to the above.—R. A. STUART." The bill of costs when delivered amounted to about £5,000, and upon taxation £1,980 was taxed off. Of this sum £1,323 was taxed off in respect of refresher fees paid to counsel as being in excess of the maximum refresher fees allowed by the rules. The taxing master, upon the application of the solicitor under section 4 of the Attorneys and Solicitors Act, 1870, examined and allowed the agreement. Mrs. Cathcart then took out a summons at chambers to have the agreement set aside under sections 8 and 9 of the Act as not being fair and reasonable. The taxing master informed the learned judge that twenty guineas would be the ordinary remuneration for the work done apart from any agreement. The judge set aside the agreement, and the Divisional Court affirmed the order.

The solicitor appealed.

Winch, Q.C., and Stephen Lynch, for the solicitor.

Bigham, Q.C., and Cluer, contrà.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—This is an application by Mrs. Cathcart, a client of Mr. Stuart, to have an agreement as to the solicitor's remuneration set aside, with the result that the solicitor's costs would be left to be taxed in the ordinary way. The application was by summons at chambers. Whether it ought to have been made by motion in the Divisional Court is now immaterial, because the case has been before the Divisional Court, and may be treated as if it had been made by motion in court. The client is a lady, and the agreement was that the solicitor should act for her upon the taxation of her husband's bill of costs, and should be paid 5 per cent. upon so much of the bill of costs as was struck off upon taxation. It has been suggested that the agreement is void as against public policy, upon the ground that it amounted to champerty. It may be so; I am not prepared to say that it is not. It may also be void upon the ground that the solicitor, in dealing with a female client, did not explain to her its full effect. If the agreement is void on either of these grounds it is void at common law, apart altogether from the statute.

It is then said that, if the agreement is not void upon either of those grounds, the court will set it aside under sections 8 and 9 of the Attorneys and Solicitors Act, 1870, as not being fair and reasonable. Assuming that this agreement is not void on either of those two grounds, can we set it aside under sections 8 and 9? Can we say that the agreement is not "fair?" We must take it that the client had it fully explained to her and fully understood its effect and deliberately entered into it with her eyes open. Under those circumstances no one can say that it is unfair in the sense of having been unfairly obtained. The agreement must also be "reasonable." We cannot introduce the element of fairness with the meaning of reasonableness. Who is to judge of its reasonableness? The Act makes more stringent the power of the courts over solicitors, and the meaning of the section seems to me to be that, when the agreement is challenged, the court must be satisfied, not merely that the agreement is fair in the sense I have pointed out, but also that it is reasonable in its terms. If the terms are such that the agreement is unreasonable in respect of the amount of remuneration for the work done, though the solicitor has fully explained it to the client, and the client has voluntarily agreed to it, the court, knowing the class of work better than the client, will say that it is not reasonable in its terms.

In the present case the master has stated that twenty guineas would be the ordinary remuneration for the work done, and it is therefore impossible to say that the agreement under which the solicitor will receive a sum amounting to nearly £100, though the agreement may have been almost forced upon the solicitor, is reasonable.

Upon these grounds I think that this appeal must be dismissed.

BOWEN and KAY, L.JJ., concurred.

Appeal dismissed.

REG. v. JUSTICES OF OXFORDSHIRE. (a.)

Justices—Appeal to quarter sessions—Notice of appeal—Service upon solicitor who had appeared for respondent at petty sessions—Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879 (42 & 43 Vict. c. 49), s. 31.

The appellant, against whom a bastardy order had been made at petty sessions, served notice of appeal to quarter sessions upon the solicitor who had been retained to appear for the respondent at petty sessions, and the solicitor accepted service on her behalf. The quarter sessions declined to hear the appeal, upon the ground that the service of the notice of appeal was bad.

Held, affirming the decision of the Queen's Bench Division, that the solicitor upon whom the notice of appeal was served had ceased to be the respondent's solicitor when the proceedings at petty sessions had determined, and that the service was bad.

Appeal from an order of the Queen's Bench Division (Mathew and Wright, JJ.) discharging a rule nisi for a mandamus to the Oxfordshire Quarter Sessions to hear and determine an appeal against a bastardy order.

On March 9 an order was made at petty sessions adjudging that the appellant was the putative father of a bastard child of the respondent, and directing him to pay to the respondent 3s. a week for the maintenance of the child. The respondent had retained a solicitor to appear for her at the hearing for the purpose of obtaining the order.

On March 16, being the last day for appealing, the solicitor for the appellant called upon the solicitor who had appeared for the respondent at petty sessions, and served him with notice of appeal against the order, and the solicitor accepted service on behalf of the respondent; and upon the same day the latter wrote to the respondent a letter which she received next morning, stating that he had accepted service of the notice of appeal, and asking whether he should instruct counsel to appear for her at quarter sessions. After some correspondence the respondent wrote to the effect that she did not intend to retain him upon the appeal, and she employed another solicitor. When the appeal came on at quarter sessions, objection was taken on behalf of the respondent that the notice of appeal had not been properly served, as the person upon whom it was served was not her solicitor at the time.

The quarter sessions held that the service was bad, and that the respondent had not ratified the act of the solicitor in accepting service on her behalf, and accordingly refused to hear the appeal upon the merits. The Queen's Bench Division having discharged a rule nisi for a mandamus, the appellant appealed to the Court of Appeal.

Mackarness, for the appellant.—It is submitted that personal service is not necessary: Ex parte Portingell, 40 W. R. 102, [1892] 1 Q. B. 15; and therefore service upon the respondent's solicitor would be good service. The solicitor who appears for the party at petty sessions remains that party's solicitor for the purpose of being served with notice of appeal until the time for appealing has expired, unless the solicitor's authority has been previously determined, and the determination made known to the opposite party. [He referred to Syred v. Carruthers, 6 W. R. 595; Pennell v. Churchwardens of Uxbridge, 10 W. R. 319; De la Pole v. Dick, 33 W. R. 585, 29 Ch. D. 351; Anderson v. Watson, 3 C. & P. 214.] He also contended that the act of the solicitor in accepting service of the notice of appeal on her behalf had under the circumstances been ratified by her.

F. Fitzgerald, for the respondent, was not called upon.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—The question in this case is whether the notice of appeal was given to the respondent. It is the case of a girl who had obtained an order at petty sessions that the appellant should pay for a fixed time a certain sum per week for the maintenance of her child. A solicitor was instructed by her to get the order, and he appeared for her at the hearing. He obtained the order, and there was an end of the matter. The appellant, however, desired to appeal to quarter sessions, and he was bound to serve notice of appeal. The argument is that personal service is not necessary, that service on the respondent's solicitor is good service, and that the solicitor upon whom this notice of appeal was served was at the time her solicitor. It is sufficient in this case to consider only the last step in the above argument, namely, whether the solicitor upon whom this notice was served was at the time the respondent's solicitor. We may, for the purposes of this case only, assume the other steps in the argument. The appellant gave the notice of appeal to the gentleman who had acted as the respondent's solicitor at the petty sessions, and it was argued that he was her solicitor still. What made him her solicitor still? No statute says that he is to remain her solicitor. Does the common law say so? With regard to actions which proceed to judgment and execution, and, as De la Pole v. Dick shows, in chancery actions where the decree has to be worked out in chambers, the common law, that is, the unwritten law applicable both to common law courts and to chancery courts, said that so long as anything remained to be done in the litigation to obtain the fruits of the judgment the solicitor for the party remained his solicitor so far as regards the opposite party unless his authority was determined, and such determination made known to the opposite side. Therefore, between judgment and execution which would give the fruits of the judgment, the solicitor for the defendant would remain his solicitor so far as regards the opposite party. But the moment, by execution, the fruits of the judgment were obtained, he would cease to be the solicitor. De la Pole v. Dick did not intend to lay down any new law, but the court stated the rule, after examining the authorities, in clearer terms than it had been stated before. But the court expressly declined to say whether the solicitor of a party continued to represent him as long as the right of appeal existed. It was, however, suggested by the judges that it would be very inconvenient if the authority did not continue as long as there is a right of appeal, and consequently rule 3 of order 7 was made to carry out the suggestion of the judges. That rule, however, only applies to proceedings in the High Court, and does not apply to this case.

In the present case the solicitor was employed to get an order at petty sessions, and when he had got that order nothing more remained to be done in that litigation. It cannot be said that the doctrine of the continuance of the solicitor's authority until the fruits of the litigation are obtained applies, because then the solicitor might continue to represent her during the whole time that the weekly sums are payable. Therefore, the solicitor here was not the respondent's solicitor at the time the notice of appeal was served upon him, and therefore the service was bad. Nor under the circumstances did she ratify the act of the solicitor in accepting service on her behalf. Therefore, no notice of appeal was given to the respondent at all, and the quarter sessions were right in refusing to hear the appeal.

JONES v. CONWAY AND COLWYN BAY JOINT WATER SUPPLY BOARD. (a.)

Local government—Water supply—Entry on land without district—Notice required—Consent of adjoining authority—Public Health Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), ss. 16, 32, 54, 285.

A joint board duly constituted as a local authority within the Public Health Act for the purpose of supplying their united district with water gave notice under the Public Health Act, s. 16, to a landowner whose lands lay without their district of their intention to enter his lands to lay water mains; but they did not comply with the requirements of section 32 as to giving notice of the intended work by advertisement, and serving a copy of such notice on the owners and occupiers of the land on which the work was to be made. The defendant board had, however, obtained leave under section 285 from the adjoining local authority, in whose district the said lands were situate, to lay the mains. The board had not yet actually supplied any water. On motion to restrain the board from entering the said lands,

Held, by North, J., that the board were "a local authority supplying water within their district" within the meaning of the Public Health Act, s. 54; and that, therefore, by virtue of sections 54 and 16 read together, the board had the same rights and duties with respect to the laying of water mains without their district as they had with respect to sewage.

Held, by the Court of Appeal (affirming North, J.), that, as the board had not given the notices required by section 32, they must be restrained from entering on the plaintiff's lands, and that the fact of the leave of the adjoining local authority having been obtained under section 285 did not dispense with the necessity of giving the notices required by section 32.

Motion.

This was an action by the tenant for life of certain lands situate at Gwyn yr Ardda, in the county of Carnarvon, for an injunction restraining the Conway and Colwyn Bay Joint Water Supply Board from entering upon and carrying water mains through the said lands.

The defendant board were constituted by a provisional order made by the Board of Trade, duly confirmed by an Act of Parliament which received the royal assent on the 5th of August, 1891. Their joint district comprised, but was not co-extensive with, the urban sanitary districts of Conway, Colwyn Bay and Colwyn, and the rural sanitary district of the Conway Union. Article 13 of their provisional order set out that the purposes for which the joint district was formed were (a) for procuring a common supply of water for the constituent districts; (b) for the acquisition of such landss, waterworks, easements, &c., and the execution of such works, &c., as might be necessary for collecting and conveying water for distribution by the constituent authorities. Article 14 provided that all the powers, duties, and liabilities of the constituent authorities in connection with procuring a common supply of water should be transferred to the joint board. Article 15 provided that the joint board should have, exercise, perform, and be subject to all the powers, rights, duties, capacities, liabilities, and obligations of a local or urban sanitary authority in relation to water supply under the Public Health Act, 1875, or any Act amending that Act, so far as the same were applicable for the purposes of the order, and that the provisions of the Public Health Act, 1875, and of any Act amending that Act, in relation to water or works belonging to a local or urban sanitary authority should, so far as the same were applicable, extend and apply to any water or works belonging to the joint board. The private Act of 1891 expressly incorporated section 285 of the Public Health Act, 1875, relating to the execution of works in adjoining districts. The defendant board had not yet delivered any water. The works of the defendant board were not completed, and the constituent authorities were still supplying water separately.

The plaintiff was the owner of land situate in that part of the rural sanitary district of the Conway Union which was outside the defendant board's joint district. In pursuance of the scheme for the supply of water the board had given notice to the plaintiff, acting on their surveyor's report, of their intention to carry water mains through his lands under section 16 of the Public Health Act, 1875, which provides that any local authority may, after giving reasonable notice in writing to the owner or occupier, carry any sewer through any lands within their district if on the report of the surveyor it appears necessary, and may also (subject to the provisions of the Act relating to sewage works without such district) exercise any of the powers given by this section, without their district for the purpose of outfall or distribution of sewage. The defendant board had also obtained the consent of the Conway Board of Guardians, the local sanitary authority of the district in which the plaintiff's land was situate, to execute the work under section 285 of the same Act, which provides that any local authority may, with the consent of the local authority of any adjoining district, execute in such adjoining district any such works as they may execute within their own district. But the defendant board had not given the notices required by section 32, which provides that a local authority shall three months at least before commencing the construction or extension of any sewer without their district, give notice of the intended work by advertisement in a local newspaper, and serve such notice on the owners and occupiers of the lands on which the work is to be made.

The plaintiff now moved for an injunction.

Farwell, Q.C., and Pattullo, for the plaintiff.—The defendant board's first step should have been under section 51, which provides that a local authority may construct or hire waterworks, &c.; they have not yet supplied any water; they are, therefore, not "a local authority supplying water" within section 54, which provides that "where a local authority supply water within their district they shall have the same powers, and be subject to the same restrictions, for carrying water mains within or without their district as they have and are subject to for carrying sewers within or without their district." They do not, therefore, possess the powers, &c., given by the Act to local authorities in respect to sewers extended by section 54 to water mains. In the alternative, if they are within section 54 then they have not complied with section 32. [They cited Hill v. Wallasey Local Board, [1892] 3 Ch. 117.] They also argued that the defendants must take the land under section 176, which incorporates the Lands Clauses Consolidation Acts with the Public Health Act.

Byrne, Q.C., and Ashton Cross, for the defendant board.—We are a local authority within section 54. We are entitled to execute the work, having obtained the consent of the adjoining authority under section 285.

They cited Roderick v. Aston Local Board, 25 W. R. 403, 5 Ch. D. 328; Lewis v. Weston-super-Mare Local Board, 37 W. R. 121, 40 Ch. D. 55.

Farwell, Q.C., replied.

April 20.—NORTH, J.—The question that arises in this case is as to the powers of the defendant board under the powers conferred on them by the Public Health Act, which comes within their sphere by virtue of their provisional order duly confirmed by Act of Parliament. [His lordship then said that, while the earlier provisions of the Public Health Act to the end of Part VII. dealt with local authorities acting for and within their own districts and having for certain limited purposes only powers outside, Part VIII. applied the provisions of the Act to cases not confined to their particular district. His lordship then reviewed sections 279 to 286, dealing with the union of districts, and said that the joint board had, by virtue of article 15 of their provisional order, been created a local authority within the definition of a local authority in the Public Health Act, and that therefore the 285th section applied to the joint board, not because they were a joint board, but because they were, though a joint board, made a local authority. His lordship then stated the facts above set out, read sections 51 to 54, and also section 16, and continued:—] To apply section 54 to section 16 it runs this way: "Where a local authority supply water within their district they shall have the same powers, &c., for carrying water mains within their district as they have, &c., for carrying sewers, &c." —I am separating the sections into two—"and they shall have the same powers, &c., for carrying water mains without their district as they have for carrying sewers without their district." So whatever powers they have as to sewers within their district the local authority supplying water may have as to water mains within their district, and whatever powers they have as to sewers without their district the local authority supplying water may have as to water mains without their district.

It was suggested there was a difficulty about applying the latter portion of section 16, relating to sewers, to section 54, relating to water mains; but I do not see any difficulty about it. Under section 16 a local authority making sewers may enter any lands, on notice, within their district, and may also go without their district, but the sewers without their district are to be only for the purposes of outfall or distribution of sewage. Section 54 says that whatever powers they have of carrying sewers without their district, the same powers are given to carry water mains without their district. It is quite true the authority could not carry sewers without their district except with reference to outfall, &c., but that has nothing to do with section 54. Section 16 limits the powers of carrying sewers outside a district, but it does not limit section 54, which says that whatever powers there are in proper cases for carrying sewers without a district under section 16, the same powers there are of carrying water mains without a district. Therefore, under section 54, there is power given to carry water mains without a district in exactly the same way as, to a limited extent, or for a limited purpose I should say, powers are given to carry sewers without a district under section 16.

Then, before I pass from section 54, I should make this comment upon an argument founded upon it. It was said that it is confined to a case where a local authority supplies water within their district. It is said that in the present case there is no local authority supplying water within the united district with which we have to deal. It is said therefore by the plaintiff that section 54 does not apply, inasmuch as the joint board is not a local authority supplying water within their district —the only supply in what may be called the joint district being the separate supplies of the separate constituent bodies in their separate districts. I do not agree with that argument. I think that section 54 does apply here. I think the phrase "where a local authority supply water within their district," &c., is intended only to be confined to places where there is a local authority which has taken upon itself the burden of carrying out the sections of the Act relating to water supply, which are not compulsory in one sense at all, but optional, though it would be the duty of a local authority to undertake the supply of water if the circumstances of the case required it. I read the words "where a local authority supply water," &c., as meaning where a local authority is not merely an authority which is already a water-supplying body, but where it is a local authority supplying water within the district—that is, exercising the powers of water supply within the district. To put a different construction upon it would seem to me to lead to an absurdity. Mr. Farwell's argument was that whenever a local authority proceeded to supply water their first step, at any rate, must be taken under section 51, and that they must adopt one of the proceedings of either constructing works of their own or hiring waterworks or contracting with some person or corporation for a supply of water, and that it is only after they have come into existence for that purpose, and are, therefore, acting under that provision, that they can then invoke the provisions of section 54; that they are entitled in the first instance to proceed under section 51, and it is only when they are established that they can get the assistance of section 54. That, in my opinion, is not the meaning of it. It seems to me that it would be very absurd to say that they must in the first place, to some possibly very limited extent indeed, supply water, and as soon as they have taken some one step to supply water to a single house within their district, they then come within section 54. Take the case of sewers, suppose a body is sewering a district, I see nothing in section 16 to say that they may not enter upon lands within their district before they have drained a single house, while they are making their sewers which, when completed, will have the effect of draining the district. So here it seems to me absurd to require them first to do something, however small, to supply water before they can obtain the assistance of section 54. In my opinion, therefore, a local authority supplying water within their district means a local authority taking the steps contemplated by this Act for supplying water within their district, or, to use the words of the Act, exercising the powers given them by the Act in relation to a supply of water. In my opinion the defendants are within section 54.

Then they gave notice under section 16, and if the defendants' work had been entirely within their district they had then done everything necessary to entitle them to take the steps they have taken; that is, there has been a proper report and reasonable notice given. Then the question is as to whether they can go without their district, and that depends on the latter part of section 16, by which they may, subject to the provisions of the Act relating to sewer work without their district, exercise any of the powers given by the section without their district. Now, the provisions of the Act relating to sewage works without a district are found in sections 32 to 34, and they provide: [His lordship then read sections 32 and 33 and continued.] Therefore, if a sewer is to be made without a district it is to be made subject to the provisions of these sections. If a water main is to be made without a district under section 54, then it must be made subject to the provisions of the Act relating to sewage works without the district—that is to say, the same proceedings must be taken under sections 32 to 34 as would have been taken if it were a sewer instead of a water-main. Now, it is conceded that no steps of that sort have been taken. No notice has been given under section 32, and nobody has had an opportunity of making any objections. That seems to me a very formidable difficulty in the way of the defendants. The only question is whether they have got out of it by reference to section 285, which provides: [His lordship then read section 285 and continued:—] The argument now is, that as they have got the leave of the authority of the adjoining district, in which the plaintiff's land is situate, they may execute and do in that district everything that they might do within their own district, and that by virtue of section 285, the adjoining district is for this purpose made part of their own district, and therefore they may make a water main through it as a sewer might have been made through it under the first part of section 16, without the second part of section 16 having any application. In my opinion that is not the meaning of section 285. I think that section 285 is to enable the local authority acting under it to do certain things as within their powers which but for that section would have been outside their powers. They can do certain things in an adjoining district without the imputation of acting ultrà vires if they have got the consent of its local board. But in my opinion that has not the effect of making the adjoining district or that portion of it their own district for all the purposes of section 16. Or in other words it does not dispense with the necessity of, as between themselves and the owners of the land or other persons, observing the requirements which have to be observed with respect to sewers which are made outside the district of the board making them. To read section 285 as I am asked to do would amount to this, that I should have to read the earlier portions of the Act as though they said that a local authority may enter any land within their district to construct a sewer, and may also go outside their own district for the same purpose, either subject to the provisions of the Act relating to sewage works without a district or, if they can obtain the leave of the adjoining local authority, without being subject to such provisions. Now these sections 32 to 34 are a special set of sections, and are grouped under the heading, "As to sewage works without the district," and in my opinion they are referred to in the latter part of section 16.

In my opinion, therefore, the defendant board cannot, as regards an outsider, such as a landowner, enter upon lands outside their district without complying with the provisions of sections 32 to 34. I was not referred to, nor have I been able to find, any authority throwing any light whatever upon the construction of section 285; but the view I take with respect to it is that, whatever its effect may be as regards the powers of the board as to what is within or what is without their powers, it does not enable them to deal with outsiders—persons who are owners of land without their district—unless they comply with the provisions of sections 32 to 34.

Another point was raised on behalf of the plaintiff which it is not necessary to consider, but I have formed my opinion upon it. I think the law is clear, and I do not hesitate to express it. Assuming that in other respects the defendants had been right, it would have been quite sufficient for them to do what they have done, without proceeding to take the land under section 176. They would have a right to enter upon the land and do their works, though of course they would have to make compensation to the persons whose lands were entered upon for any injury done to them. But there is nothing in the Act that such compensation shall precede the entry upon the land. The cases of North London Railway Co. v. Metropolitan Board of Works, 7 W. R. 640, and Lewis v. Weston-super-Mare Local Board, as well as that case of Roderick v. Aston Local Board, all seem to be authorities to that effect.

The result is, I come to the conclusion that the plaintiff is right in complaining that the defendants have entered upon his land without having taken the steps necessary under sections 32 to 34.

The defendant board appealed from the order of North, J., in so far as it granted an injunction against them.

Byrne, Q.C., and Ashton Cross, for the appellants, referred to the Public Health Act, 1875, ss. 16, 32, 54, 285.

Farwell, Q.C., and Fattullo, for the respondent, were not called on.

LINDLEY, L.J.—The more the sections which have been referred to are examined the more plain the case becomes; and I propose to say little beyond expressing my concurrence in the judgment of North, J., who has exhaustively considered the various provisions of the Act. Section 54, which relates to a local authority supplying water, deals with the matter by reference to section 16, which relates to the making of sewers. That section consists of two parts, one of which relates to what may be done by a local authority within their own district; and the other part refers to the provisions of the same Act relating to sewage works outside their district; and those provisions are, as has been admitted by Mr. Cross, and indeed could not be denied, sections 32, 33, and 34 of the Act. The present case is one where there is a united board; and we find that the united district which has been formed does not include the whole of separate districts mentioned in the provisional order, but leaves some parts outside; so that the jurisdiction of the joint board is not coterminous with the districts of the several boards which are united. The plaintiff's land is outside the joint district. But section 285 gives power to any local authority, with the consent of the local authority of an adjoining district, to execute works in such district. Substituting "joint board" for "local authority" in that section, it provides that any joint board may, "with the consent of the local authority of an adjoining district, execute and do in such adjoining district such works or things as they may execute and do in their own district, and on such terms as to payment or otherwise as may be agreed on between them and the authority of such adjoining district." Those words make it clear that the section is dealing with what may be done as between the two boards, and has nothing to do with the rights of individuals. Therefore sections 32, 33, and 34 apply to this case, and in my opinion the learned judge was right and the appeal must be dismissed.

BOWEN and KAY, L.JJ., concurred.

Chan. Div. North, J. — April 25.

AUSTIN v. BEDDOE. (a.)

Will—Bequest of residue—Lease—Assent by executors—Assent by executors as to part of residue.

Testator bequeathed the residue of his estate, including the lease of a colliery, to trustees, who were also executors of his will, on trust for his son on his attaining twenty-one years of age. On the son's attaining that age, the trustees let him into possession, but made no formal assignment of the lease, and there were still debts due from the testator's estate.

Held, that the assent of the executors was sufficient to pass the property in the colliery, and that it was competent for them to assent to the bequest of part of the residue of the estate without assenting to the rest.

This was an action on the part of the lessors to recover possession of a certain colliery, known as Penygroes, in Glamorganshire.

A lease of this colliery had been granted in 1872 for a term of sixty years, and had been assigned to William Beddoe, father of the defendant.

By his will (which so far as it affects the present case is fully set out in the judgment), dated the 25th of April, 1884, William Beddoe appointed R. O. Jones and Gwylym Cristor James executors and trustees thereof, and directed them to stand possessed of the residue of his estate, including the Penygroes Colliery, on trust for his son Edward on his attaining twenty-one years.

(a.) Reported by J. ARTHUR PRICE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The testator died on the 15th of February, 1887, and his will was proved on the 4th of April, 1887. After the testator's death the executors continued to carry on the Penygroes Colliery until 1888 at considerable loss, when the defendant came of age. The executors, after some negotiations which will be found summarized in the judgment, then allowed him to enter into possession, and he proceeded to work the colliery and pay the expenses.

In answer to an inquiry on the part of the plaintiffs' solicitor as to whether he was right in communicating with them on the subject of the colliery, the defendant being now of age, Mr. G. C. James replied on the 27th of September, 1888, that Mr. Beddoe was now of age and would be paying all accounts in respect of the Penygroes Colliery. No formal assignment of the lease was, however, made to him by the executors.

In the January of 1892 the plaintiffs commenced an action against the defendant, having previously, under section 14 of the Conveyancing Act of 1881, served on him a notice requiring him to remedy certain breaches of covenant and to pay compensation. The defendant had failed to comply with the notice.

In his statement of defence, delivered on the 26th of October, 1892, the defendant denied that the premises comprised in the lease ever became vested in himself. The said lease and premises therein comprised were, the defendant stated, vested in William Beddoe, and upon his death they were and are vested in R. O. Jones and G. C. James as his legal personal representatives.

On the matter coming before the court Mr. G. C. James, the above-named executor and trustee, proved in his evidence that there were debts still due from the testator's estate in connection with which legal proceedings were pending.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., MacSwinney, and P. W. Evans, for the plaintiffs.—The evidence proves that the executors have made over the property to the defendant, and thus assented to the bequest. He is therefore the proper defendant in the action.

Upjohn, for the defendant.—The evidence does not show assent; and even if it did, assent does not pass property in case of a residuary gift. The doctrine of assent applies only in the case of a specific or general legacy. In such a case the title of the legatee is complete at once, and it is only necessary for the executors to satisfy themselves that the property not so bequeathed is sufficient to meet the liabilities of the estate before they assent. The residue, however, is the primary fund for the payment of debts and legacies, and the executors cannot divest themselves of it without a formal assignment. For this reason the executor is joined with the residuary legatee in assignments of leaseholds. Again, there cannot be an assent as to part of the residue only, as is stated to have been made in this case. It must be an assent to the whole. If the executors assented to the whole, it follows that they have made themselves personally responsible for the testator's debts, which is absurd.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., in reply.

Williams on Executors, pp. 1383-4, and Elliott v. Elliott, 9 M. & W. 23, were referred to in the argument.

NORTH, J.—The first point that I have to decide is a very simple one. The testator, who died in February, 1887, made a will, by which, after various dispositions, he gives certain properties specifically mentioned, and as to the residue of "my other hereditaments, messuages, and premises, not including certain partnership property, and all the rest and residue of my real and personal estate (except as aforesaid), I direct my trustees to stand possessed thereof in trust for my said son Edward, his heirs, executors, and administrators," and so on. There is a clear, absolute disposition of the residue in favour of the son Edward. Then follow the words: "As to such parts thereof as are of freehold and copyhold tenure for my said son Edward and his heirs, but in case of his death without issue then I devise the same to Catherine and Elizabeth in equal shares, subject as to the same limitations over as between them, in case either of them should die without issue." That applies clearly, in my opinion, to freeholds and copyholds only, and does not touch leaseholds.

The testator died in February, 1887; the executors remained in possession for a certain time of the property with which we are now dealing; but in June, 1888, the property producing nothing and there being rent payable in respect of it, and nothing out of which the rent could be paid, the residuary legatee had some conversation with the executors or one of them, and said he wanted to work the property, and for the purpose of developing it to sink a shaft—in other words, to incur a considerable expenditure, which the executors did not see their way to do. They had no money to do it with, and they were not going to spend any part of the testator's estate in sinking a shaft for that purpose. What they do is this. By arrangement with the son they let him into possession. [His lordship then proceded to comment on the evidence in detail, and afterwards continued:—] That is the evidence of the defendant and Mr. James, and what is the meaning of it? I have not the least doubt what the meaning of it is—namely, that as the defendant was residuary legatee, the executor said, "We cannot spend any more money out of the testator's estate, but you may take possession." I should add that at the same time the executor writes to the lessor giving the address of the residuary legatee, and saying that in future he will discharge the rent. From that time the defendant does pay what is to be paid, and the executors do not. Of the intention of this arrangement I have no doubt whatever. It never was intended for a moment to cheat the residuary legatee into finding money of his own to spend on the estate for the benefit of the testator's estate. I think it would have been a very gross wrong if the executors had let him into possession on the terms they did, without assenting. In fact their conduct in the matter seems to me the strongest possible evidence of assent. When I say that they would be cheating him, I do not believe that for a moment they meant to do so. I believe they were acting straightforwardly and rightly, but the meaning of their acts was that he was the person to take the burden on himself and incur the outlay that would have to be made, and the effect of saying that that was done, without assenting, would be that they would have a right to take his improvements, a contention which I cannot accede to for a moment.

Then it is said that as a matter of law they could not assent. In my opinion they could. In the first place, it is said this was a bequest of residue, and not a specific or pecuniary bequest. It was a bequest of certain estates with respect to which the executor has certain duties. He is to pay the debts and liabilities out of it. He may have to pay legacies out it before the property can get to the residuary legatee, but the property does not vest in the legatee without his assent. With his assent it does. It was said there is a distinction between a residuary bequest and any other bequest. I find no trace of it, and no authority has been cited to me in which there is the slightest trace of any distinction between the two. In my opinion the necessity for assent to a bequest of residue is the same as the necessity for assent to a bequest of a specific chattel or chattels in order that it may vest in the legatee, but when it does vest in him, no doubt he then has the legal estate and can dispose of it. It is said that the practice is not for executors to assent to a particular bequest of residue, but to assign it to the residuary legatee who is the subject of the residuary bequest. That is entirely new to me. If there is anything in it, it means that the residuary legatee cannot have furniture handed to him without some assignment, which is absurd. I take it that, if pressed, Mr. Upjohn would have confined the application to such things as leaseholds, but I know no proposition or authority for treating leaseholds different from anything else. No doubt the residuary legatee in selling leaseholds which he takes as such, gets the executor to join. It is essential that the assent should be given in some way, and if the executor joins in the assignment and testifies his assent, there is a perpetuation of testimony which may be very useful to a purchaser. But to say that a residuary legatee whose legacy has been clearly assented to in writing by the executors cannot make a title is quite new to me.

Then it is said that there cannot be an assent to part of a legacy, and, therefore, if there is any assent here it must have been an assent to the entire residuary bequest; and it is not reasonable to suppose that the executors did assent to the entire residuary bequest, inasmuch as there are some liabilities of the testator's estate still outstanding. In the first place, as a matter of law, it is not correct to say that an executor cannot assent to one out of two, or to one or more out of a larger number, of bequests to the same person or different persons. He may do so of course. If live stock is given to A. and furniture to B., the executor might very well assent to the bequest of the live stock to A. without assenting to the bequest of the furniture to B., and for a very good reason—namely, that he wished to have the responsibility of the live stock being kept, put upon the person to whom it is given. I put it as if there were two different persons, but it does not matter in the least. If there are two things given to the same person the executor may assent to one and decline the other, and Elliott v. Elliott is a very clear authority, if authority were wanted, to fortify the opinion of all of us extending over a series of years.

Then, further, it is suggested that it is not reasonable to suppose the executors would have assented here, when there are outstanding liabilities. I do not see anything unreasonable in that. No doubt, if there were shown to be very large outstanding liabilities, and the question was whether assent had been given with respect to the only remaining available asset, there would be something in it. But there is nothing in it. There is no improbability in the inferring an assent because there are outstanding liabilities, unless you see the executor would be prejudiced by giving his assent, and it is impossible to say that, unless the other assets with respect to which he has not assented are clearly insufficient to meet the liabilities. In fact, the reason why he may assent to one and not the other, is because he sees he may part with part of the property to one legatee, but as to the rest cannot do so at present.

In my opinion, there is the clearest possible evidence of assent, and I have no doubt assent to this legacy was intended. At any rate, whether intended or not, the facts proved amount to evidence of assent. Assent is a matter really of fact and not of law. There is no doubt that an executor may assent. The question here is whether, as a matter of fact, the circumstances are such that one is justified in coming to the conclusion he did assent, and I have no doubt they are. That being so, if he did assent, the legal objections to his power of assenting fail. Therefore, upon this question, I am of opinion that when the defendant attained twenty-one, and when he was let into possession, there is evidence the executors did assent to the bequest to him so far as related to this property.

FLETCHER v. BETHOM. (a.)

Practice—Pleading—Frivolous action—Motion to dismiss—Rules of the Supreme Court, 1883, ord. 25, r. 4.

The plaintiff claimed as heir-at-law of a testator who died in 1774, and alleged that the defendants were in possession as trustees of the testator's will. Some of the defendants traversed this allegation by their defence, whilst the remainder, without delivering a defence, put in evidence, in denial. On a motion by all the defendants to dismiss the action,

Held, that, as the evidence in support was not distinct and conclusive, and that as some of the defendants had put in a defence, the motion failed.

The plaintiff claimed as heir-at-law of a testator who died in the year 1774, and by the 7th paragraph of his statement of claim he alleged that the defendants were or claimed to be the present trustees of the testator's will, and as such had received the rents and profits of the testator's real estate.

Four of the defendants put in a defence traversing this paragraph of the statement of claim, and pleading the Statute of Limitations. The remaining two put in no defence, but filed evidence by which each of them denied that he was a trustee of the will, and stated that the legal estate had been duly conveyed to the beneficial owners in 1824.

This was a motion by all the defendants asking for the dismissal of the action on the grounds that (a) the statement of claim showed no reasonable cause of action, and (b) the action was vexatious and an abuse of the process of the court.

Hadley, for the defendants who had put in no defence.—I apply under ord. 25, r. 4: Lawrence v. Lord Norreys, 38 W. R. 753, 15 App. Cas. 210; Haggard v. Pelicier Frères, [1892] 2 A. C. 61, 40 W. R. Dig. 137.

Gatey, for the other defendants.—Attorney-General of Duchy of Lancaster v. London and North-Western Railway Co., [1892] 3 Ch. 274.

Warmington, Q.C., and Whinney, for the plaintiff.—There is a primâ facie case. The defendants should have applied for particulars.

KEKEWICH, J.—For some of the purposes of this case it is necessary to bear in mind the terms of ord. 25, r. 4, and the decisions thereon. But the notices of motion, appeal also to the inherent jurisdiction of the court, which has been often recognized, and my judgment must deal as much with that as the jurisdiction given by the order. It was admitted on behalf of the plaintiff that but for the allegation in paragraph 7 the statement of claim would be demurrable. Though not directly admitted it is reasonably obvious that it was inserted for the express purpose of preventing this result. It is scarcely consistent with paragraph 6, for it is not credible that three different farms are vested in different persons, and yet that they all hold the entirety as trustees of one and the same will. It would, however, be straining the jurisdiction of the court to defeat the plaintiff at this stage on the ground of such inconsistency, and the 7th paragraph must be treated as good by way of allegation. The practical question is whether it can be expunged by evidence, that is, whether the court is at liberty on such motions as these to admit evidence to contradict that paragraph, and then, the contradiction being complete, to treat the statement of claim as if the allegations were not there. It is settled that for the purposes of at any rate the first branch of the rule, evidence is not admissible: see Republic of Peru v. Peruvian Guano Co., 36 W. R. 217, 36 Ch. D. 489, and Attorney-General of Duchy of Lancaster v. London and North-Western Railway Co. On the other hand, in order to show that any particular action is an abuse of the powers of the court, evidence seems on principle to be admissible, and has frequently been admitted. The language of A. L. Smith, L.J., in the last case I have referred to may be cited as adverse to this; but it would not be fair to construe it as going beyond the case in hand, which was not concerned with inherent jurisdiction. The distinction between the two classes of cases as regards the admissibility of evidence is stated by Chitty, J., in Republic of Peru v. Peruvian Guano Co., and by Lord Blackburn in Metropolitan Bank v. Pooley, 33 W. R. 709, 10 App. Cas. 210. Therefore, if I had before me distinct evidence contradicting paragraph 7, I should admit it and act on it. It is, in my judgment, vexatious, and an abuse of the process of the court, to endeavour to maintain an action, and especially an action of this character, which must be exceedingly troublesome and costly, by means of an allegation having no real foundation and inconsistent with all the history of the title with which the action is concerned. It is not without regret that I come to the conclusion that the evidence in this case is insufficient. The evidence of the two defendants, who have put in no statement of defence, is not distinct enough to make it inconceivable, though it is highly improbable, that the other defendants, or some of them, may be trustees within the meaning of the allegation in the statement of claim. The other defendants have filed no evidence at all, but they have taken another step which I think is fatal to their motion—viz., by delivering a defence and traversing paragraph 7 of the statement of claim. Having put the point in issue by pleading, they cannot now be allowed to say that it is one which ought not to be in issue at all. The motions will be refused, and the costs be costs in the action.

Q. B. Div.
(Charles and Vaughan Williams, JJ.) May 16.

YOUNG (Appellant) v. SOUTHWARK AND VAUXHALL WATER CO. (Respondents). (a.)

Local government—Water supply—Metropolis—Cutting off water supply—Temporary stoppage by water company to stop leakage—Whether this is a "cutting off"—Notice to vestry—Public Health (London) Act, 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 76), s. 49.

A water company, which supplied a certain dwelling-house with water, turned off the water by turning down the stopcock in the service pipe, and this was done solely to prevent waste of water through a certain leak in the service pipe. The stopcock and service pipe were the property of the landlord of the house, and, when the leak was repaired by the landlord, he turned on the water again by opening the stopcock.

Held, that, upon the facts, a magistrate was justified in coming to the conclusion that there was no "cutting off" of the water supply by the company within the meaning of section 49 of the Public Health (London) Act, 1891, and, therefore, no necessity for the water company to give notice under that section to the sanitary authority.

Case stated by the metropolitan police magistrate sitting at the South-Western Police Court, in the county of London.

The respondents were summoned for having, on the 3rd of November, 1892, in the parish of St. Mary, Battersea, failed to give notice in writing to the vestry of the parish, as the sanitary authority of the parish, that they had cut off the water supply to a certain inhabited dwelling-house, and had ceased to supply water to the said dwelling-house, contrary to the provisions of the statute 54 & 55 Vict. c. 76 (the Public Health (London) Act, 1891), whereby they had rendered themselves liable to a fine, as provided by the said statute.

The magistrate dismissed the summons, but agreed to state the present case.

The summons was taken out by the appellant on behalf and by the directions of the vestry of the parish, which vestry is the sanitary authority of the district. The respondents are a water company supplying water for profit in the district, and, among other houses, they have been in the habit of supplying water to the house in question, and they were at the time in question providing a constant supply to the district, pursuant to the provisions of the Metropolis Water Act, 1871.

The mode by which water is supplied by the respondents is by means of mains running under the street or roadways, and by service or communication pipes, which are connected with the mains, and which carry the water from the mains to the various houses having a supply of the water. The house in question was until the date in question supplied with water from the respondents' main by means of a service pipe and stopcock which were the property of the landlord of the house, and over which the customer had a right of control.

On the 12th of October, 1892, the landlord of the house, at his own expense, caused a stopcock to be inserted in the service pipe at a point about eleven feet from the point where the service pipe is connected with the main. On the 2nd of November, 1892, the servants of the respondents were engaged in fixing a covering over the stopcock when they ascertained that there was a leakage from the service pipe at a point between the stopcock and the house, and they informed the tenant and occupant of the house of the existence of the leak, and that she had better communicate with her landlord and get the pipe repaired and that they must shut down the stopcock. The respondents' servants thereupon shut down the stopcock, the effect of which was to stop the leak and also to prevent any further supply of water to the house, and the respondents did not, in fact, supply any water to the house from the 2nd of November to the 25th of November, when, the leak having been repaired by the landlord, the supply was renewed by the landlord's plumber opening the stopcock.

It was admitted on behalf of the appellant that there was good reason for so cutting off the water from the house.

The respondents did not give any notice to the vestry that they had cut off the water supply to the house, or that they had ceased to supply the house with water, but on the 8th of November they gave notice to the landlord. The water could have been turned on again at any time by turning the stopcock, which, however, could only be done by means of a key; but it was proved that keys could be purchased by consumers, and that it was a common practice for the water to be turned on and off by them.

On behalf of the appellant it was contended that, upon the facts, the respondents were, as a matter of law, bound to give notice in writing to the vestry within twenty-four hours that they had so cut off the supply of water from the house and ceased to supply it with water, as required by the 49th section of the Public Health (London) Act, 1891, and that the respondents, not having given any such notice, were liable to a fine in accordance with the provisions of the said section.

On behalf of the respondents it was contended that, on the facts, as found, there was no obligation in law on the respondents to give any notice to the vestry, and that the summons should be dismissed.

The magistrate found that it was a matter of urgency, and that it could not have been more than a temporary inconvenience if the occupier had communicated with the landlord at once, and that there was no intention on the part of the respondents to withdraw the supply from the premises, except for the immediate purpose of stopping the leak. The magistrate was of opinion that the contention of the respondents was right in law, and he dismissed the summons, but without costs.

The question now was whether the magistrate was right in holding that there was no cutting off of the water supply within the meaning of the section.

Section 49 of the Public Health (London) Act, 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 76), provides: (1) "Where a water company may lawfully cut off the water supply to any inhabited dwelling-house and cease to supply such dwelling-house with water for non-payment of water rate or other cause, the company shall in every case, within twenty-four hours after exercising the said right, give notice thereof in writing to the sanitary authority of the district in which the house is situated. (2) Any company which neglects to comply with the foregoing provision shall be liable to a fine not exceeding ten pounds, and it shall be the duty of the sanitary authority to take proceedings against any company in default."

Earle, for the appellant.

McCall, Q.C., and Horton, for the respondents.

CHARLES, J.—I think it is quite clear that the mere cessation of the supply of water by the water company does not of itself necessarily cast upon the company the obligation of giving notice to the sanitary authorities. I think it is plain that the mere cessation cannot be in itself an act which renders it incumbent on the company to give notice. If that be so, then the question whether or not the water company has cut off the water supply and ceased to supply a dwelling-house with water is a question of fact rather than a question of law, and, it being a question of fact, and having regard to the findings of the learned magistrate in this case, I am quite unable to overrule the decision at which he arrived. He might have taken another view of the matter, but it is impossible for me, sitting here to review decisions on questions of law, to say that he came to a wrong conclusion on a question of law upon the facts which he states in the case, and on which he decided the case.

There was very considerable delay in repairing a leakage on this particular occasion, but it is equally true that the water company cut off the water as a matter of immediate urgency and solely for the purpose of the immediate reparation of the leak. Further, it is proved as a fact that the servants of the company told the tenant that she had better communicate with the landlord at once and get the pipe repaired.

Under these circumstances I feel unable to say that the magistrate was wrong in the conclusion to which he came. It is quite impossible to say that the cutting off the water for the purpose of curing a leak is in itself a matter which comes within this section.

The magistrate has found, under circumstances which he states, that there was no cutting off or ceasing to supply within the meaning of this section, and I cannot say that he was wrong.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J.—I am of the same opinion. I do not think my brother Charles' decision is in the slightest degree a decision which will enable the water company to say that there has been any decision by this court which relieves the water company generally from the obligation of giving notice, because the alleged cutting off of the supply of water is effected by means of turning down a stopcock of the sort which has been described. All we say is that upon the facts found by the magistrate in this case we do not think we can say it is a finding that there was a cutting off and ceasing to supply within the meaning of the 49th section of the Public Health (London) Act, 1891. This appeal, therefore, will be dismissed with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

IN BANKRUPTCY.

Q. B. Div.
Vaughan Williams, J. } April 21; May 19.

In re BRALL.
Ex parte NORTON. (a.)

Bankruptcy—Voluntary settlement—Avoidance—Mortgage of settled property by donee before settlement declared void—Bonâ fide purchaser for valuable consideration—Title of trustee in bankruptcy—Construction of statute—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 47.

The true meaning of the word "void" in section 47 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, is "voidable." The title of a purchaser for valuable consideration in good faith from the donee under a voluntary settlement prior to the avoidance of such settlement cannot afterwards, therefore, be defeated by the trustee in bankruptcy of the settlor.

Application by the trustee in the bankruptcy of Louis Brall and W. H. Brall that a certain indenture of assignment dated the 14th of April, 1892, and made between the said Louis Brall of the one part and Ada Brall of the other part, whereby certain leasehold hereditaments, No. 206, Tufnell Park-road, Islington, were assigned by the said Louis Brall to the said Ada Brall; and also a certain memorandum of charge dated the 14th of September, 1892, and executed by the said Ada Brall, whereby it was declared that the said hereditaments and the fixtures thereon for the time being should be charged with the payment to the directors of the London and Westminster Bank (Limited) of all moneys due to the said bank from the above-named W. H. Brall, or his estate, might be set aside on the ground that the said indenture of assignment was a voluntary settlement within section 47 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883; and that the trustee might be declared to be entitled to the said hereditaments.

The debtor, Louis Brall, carried on business in partnership with his son, W. H. Brall, but the leasehold house, No. 206, Tufnell Park-road, was his separate property, and on the 14th of April, 1892, he assigned these premises to his daughter, Ada Brall, the consideration of the assignment purporting to be natural love and affection.

On the 14th of September, 1892, Ada Brall, by the persuasion of her brother, W. H. Brall, and without the knowledge of her father, Louis Brall, deposited the lease and assignment with the London and Westminster Bank as security for a loan of £400, a joint promissory note by Miss Brall and her brother being also given at the same time. The proceeds of the advance were carried to the partnership account.

In October, 1892, a receiving order was made against the firm; and application was now made by the trustee of the estate for an order setting aside the assignment as being a voluntary settlement and "void" under section 47, and directing the London and Westminster Bank to deliver up the deeds in their possession.

Farwell, Q.C., and Broomfield, for the trustee.—The settlement was clearly a voluntary settlement without valuable consideration. Such a settlement is "void" by section 47, and the bank cannot, therefore, make title through or under the donee of the settlement. The settlement is void under section 47, and the bank, taking with notice that it was a voluntary settlement, cannot claim any better title than Ada Brall had to give them. In the recent case of In re Vansittart, Ex parte Brown, ante, p. 286, it is true that under somewhat similar circumstances the court held that the trustee could not defeat the title of the purchaser. But the distinction between that case and this is that in that case the purchaser had no notice that the settlement was a voluntary one. Here the bank clearly had notice, because the lease and the assignment were deposited with them.

They also referred to Patman v. Harland, 29 W. R. 707, 17 Ch. D. 353; Ex parte Hillman, In re Pumfrey, 27 W. R. 567, 10 Ch. D. 622; In re Briggs & Spicer, 39 W. R. 377, [1891] 2 Ch. 127.

Herbert Reed, Q.C., and Muir Mackenzie, for the London and Westminster Bank.—The bank gave valuable consideration, and that valuable consideration relates back so as to prevent the settlement being without valuable consideration, as has always been held with reference to conveyances under the 27 Eliz. Especially must this be so where, as in the present case, the estate of the settlor has had the benefit of the consideration subsequently given. Further, the word "void" in section 47 really means "voidable," and, that being so, a purchaser for valuable consideration without notice prior to the avoidance of the settlement has a better title than the trustee.

Farwell, Q.C., replied.

Cur. adv. vult.

May 19.—VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J.—In this case Mr. Brall, senior, settled on his daughter, Miss Ada Brall, a leasehold house in April, 1892. The consideration of the settlement purported to be natural love and affection. Mr. Brall carried on business in partnership with his son, Mr. W. H. Brall, but the leasehold house in question was the separate property of Mr. Brall, senior. In September, 1892, the partnership being in financial difficulties, Mr. Brall, junior, without the knowledge of his father, induced his sister to mortgage the leasehold house to secure a sum of money advanced to him on the joint promissory note of himself and his sister. The proceeds of this advance were carried to the partnership account, but it does not appear that Mr. Brall, senior, had any knowledge of this, although as partner he in fact took the benefit of the advance. Mr. Brall, senior, having become bankrupt, the trustee in his bankruptcy claims as against the respondent bank a declaration that he is entitled to the leasehold house.

It is said on his behalf that the settlement was a voluntary settlement without valuable consideration, and that as such a settlement is void by section 47 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, the bank cannot make title through or under the donee of the settlement.

It is contended by the bank that the valuable consideration given by them relates back so as to prevent the settlement being without valuable consideration, as has been held with reference to conveyances under the 27 Eliz., and that especially is this so in a case where the estate of the settlor has had the benefit of the subsequent consideration given by the bank. It is contended further that the word "void" in this section means "voidable," and that therefore a purchaser for valuable consideration without notice prior to the avoidance of the settlement has a better title than the trustee; and that the fact that this section contains no proviso in favour of purchasers for value like that contained in sub-section (2) of section 48 is accounted for by the fact that the necessity for such a proviso in section 48 arises from the fact that a conveyance by way of fraudulent preference is an act of bankruptcy, whereas a voluntary conveyance under section 47 is not an act of bankruptcy.

On the whole, I have come to the conclusion that the word "void" in section 47 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, means "voidable," and that consequently anyone who claims, under a settlement affected by this section, as a purchaser for valuable consideration without notice, has a good title as against the trustee in bankruptcy. It is quite plain that the word "void" may mean "voidable," and there are several reasons why it should receive that construction in this Act. The test, to my mind, is whether the object of public policy in view in this section requires the strict construction.

Now it is to be observed that the object of this section is one for which the Legislature has made provision in a long series of Bankruptcy statutes, and that in all the Bankruptcy statutes prior to 1883 the wording of the section was such as to make the settlement voidable and not void, because under those statutes the avoidance of voluntary settlements was effected by an order in bankruptcy for the sale by the trustee of the subject-matter of settlement, and neither the word "void" nor the word "voidable" was used. It may be said that the object of the alteration in the words of the section was to make such settlements void and not voidable, but I think that the object of the Legislature has remained unchanged, and that the purpose of the alteration in the wording was merely convenience of drafting, and to make it clear that the title of the trustee could not be avoided by anything done between the commencement of the bankruptcy and the declaration of the trustee's title.

It seems to me that the judgment in the case of In re Holden, Ex parte the Official Receiver in effect decides that a settlement declared void under section 47 is not void ab initio, because in that case the court decided that the trustees of a settlement which became void on the bankruptcy of the settlor by reason of the provisions of section 47 were entitled as against the trustee in bankruptcy to a lien on the trust property for expenses incurred in the performance of their duties as trustees, that is to say, in resisting an action brought to set the settlement aside, for had the settlement been void ab initio it would never have had a legal existence, and trustees could not have established a lien.

I am further of opinion that the mere fact that the bank had notice—as I think they in fact had—that the mortgagor claimed under a voluntary settlement is not sufficient to prevent them claiming as purchasers for value in good faith. The bank had no notice of any fact avoiding the voluntary settlement. The bank had no notice that the settlor was insolvent; and the bankruptcy which brought the settlement within the operation of the section had not occurred at the time of the advance and mortgage.

Moreover, the moment it is assumed that the settlement is not void ab initio, all those authorities apply under which it was decided under the 27 Eliz. that a purchase for valuable consideration from a person making title under a voluntary conveyance relates back so as to prevent the original conveyance being a voluntary conveyance within the meaning of the Act. And even if this were not so, I should have been inclined to hold that the fact that the settlor's estate got the benefit of the advance made by the bank was itself sufficient to prevent this settlement being a voluntary settlement within the meaning of section 47. I have only to add that in my opinion the argument on behalf of the trustee based upon the absence from section 47 of any clause in favour of purchasers for value like that appearing in section 48 is fallacious. The necessity of the clause in section 48 arises from the fact that fraudulent preference is an act of bankruptcy. The result will be that this motion fails, and the trustee must pay the costs.

Application refused.

Court of Appeal.

From Q. B. Div. (Lord Esher, M.R., and Bowen and Kay, L.JJ.) — June 7.

PATTLE v. ANSTRUTHER. (a.)

Frauds, Statute of—Memorandum in writing—Interest in land—Mortgage—Description of mortgagee—Solicitors to "proposing lender"—29 Car. 2, c. 3, s. 4.

Upon a contract for a mortgage of land, the solicitor for the intending mortgagor wrote a letter in which he said that he had called on "the solicitors to the proposing lender and had arranged the proposed loan as follows."

Held, that this was not a sufficient description of the intending mortgagee to satisfy section 4 of the Statute of Frauds.

Appeal from the judgment of A. L. Smith, L.J., at the trial of the action without a jury.

The defendant being desirous of obtaining a loan of £1,000 upon mortgage of certain land, her solicitor entered into negotiations for that purpose with a firm of solicitors, who were acting on behalf of an unnamed client. On the 6th of November, 1891, the defendant's solicitor wrote to the defendant a letter in which he stated: "I called on the solicitors to the proposing lender, and have arranged the proposed loan as follows," &c., setting out the terms of the advance. Eventually the mortgage was not completed, and the plaintiff, who, it appeared, was the person about to advance the money on mortgage, and who alleged that he was always ready to advance the money, but that the defendant refused to execute the mortgage, brought an action to recover damages for breach of contract by the defendant in refusing to complete the mortgage to him. The defendant pleaded that no concluded contract had been entered into, and alternatively that the 4th section of the Statute of Frauds had not been complied with. At the trial the question of the Statute of Frauds was not argued, and the learned judge came to the conclusion that there was a concluded contract for a mortgage, and gave judgment for the plaintiff.

The defendant appealed.

Bowen Rowlands, Q.C. (Firminger with him), for the defendant.—Assuming, as the learned judge found, that there was a concluded contract for a mortgage, there is no memorandum in writing sufficient to satisfy section 4 of the Statute of Frauds. The description of the proposed mortgagee is insufficient. The words "proposing lender" in the letter of the 6th of November do not describe him with sufficient certainty to satisfy the statute. [He was stopped.]

Manisty, for the plaintiff.—The words "proposing lender" describe the plaintiff with sufficient particularity. The "proprietor" of an estate is a sufficient description: Sale v. Lambert, 22 W. R. 478, L. R. 18 Eq. 1; Rossiter v. Miller, 26 W. R. 865, 3 App. Cas. 1124. Here the proposing lender is described with sufficient certainty as the person who was then instructing a particular firm of solicitors to carry out the mortgage. That at once identifies the lender.

He also referred to Skelton v. Cole, 1 De G. & J. 587, 6 W. R. Ch. Dig. 84; Potter v. Duffield, 22 W. R. 585, L. R. 18 Eq. 4; Morris v. Wilson, 5 Jur. N. S. 168, 7 W. R. Ch. Dig. 91.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—It seems to me that this is not a sufficient description of the mortgagee to satisfy the Statute of Frauds. The question is really concluded by authority. In Rossiter v. Miller Lord Cairns stated the law on the subject:—"In point of fact the question is, is there that certainty which is described in the legal maxim Id certum est quod certum reddi potest. If I enter into a contract on behalf of my client, on behalf of my principal, on behalf of my friend, on behalf of those whom it may concern, in all those cases there is no such statement, and I apprehend that in none of those cases would the note satisfy the requirements of the Statute of Frauds. But if I, being really an agent, enter into a contract to sell Blackacre, of which I am not proprietor, or to sell the house, No. 1, Portland-place, on behalf of the owner of that house, there, I apprehend, is a statement of matter of fact, as to which there can be perfect certainty." Therefore it requires a statement of fact as to which there is perfect certainty, or perfect certainty such as is described in the maxim Id certum est quod certum reddi potest. That is the principle of law stated by the House of Lords, and that is the principle which was previously applied by Sir George Jessel, M.R., in Potter v. Duffield, where he said:—"The counsel for the plaintiff contends that you may describe one of the parties as the vendor of the estate; but the statute cannot mean that. It requires the parties to be described in such a manner as that there can be no fair or reasonable dispute as to the person who is selling or buying." That is an application of the principle to the description of one of the parties as "the vendor," and that case shows that such a description will not do. The law is summed up by Kay, J., in Jarrett v. Hunter, 35 W. R. 132, 34 Ch. D. 182, where he deals with the cases as follows:—"The law on this subject at present is this: If the vendor is described in the contract as 'proprietor,' 'owner,' 'mortgagee,' or the like, the description is sufficient, although he is not named; but if he is described as 'vendor' or as 'client' or 'friend' of a named agent, that is not sufficient; the reason given being, in the language of Lord Cairns, that the former description 'is a statement of matter of fact, as to which there can be perfect certainty, and none of the dangers struck at by the Statute of Frauds can arise': Rossiter v. Miller, Sale v. Lambert, Potter v. Duffield; the reason against the latter description being that, in order to find out who is vendor, client, or friend, you must go into evidence on which there might possibly, as in Potter v. Duffield, be a conflict, and that, says the late Master of the Rolls in the last named case, 'is exactly what the Act says shall not be decided by parol evidence.' 'I should be thrown,' he continues, 'on parol evidence to decide who sold the estate, who was the party to the contract, the Act requiring that fact to be in writing.'"

Let me now apply that principle of law to this case. "The solicitors for the proposing lender" are the words relied on as being a sufficient description of the mortgagee. It seems to me that it would be breaking through the rule if we were so to hold.

With regard to Morris v. Wilson, that case was decided upon another principle. The headnote states that "when an agent contracts, it may be proved by parol evidence who is his principal." That case, to my mind, means this: the agent had signed a document so as to make himself personally liable; therefore there was a contract in writing in which both parties were named. That being so, it followed that it could be shown by parol evidence who the agent's principal was, the agent having rendered himself personally liable. That seems to be the meaning of that decision, and it does not affect this case. The appeal must therefore be allowed and judgment entered for the defendant, though I must add that this point was not brought to the attention of the learned judge.

BOWEN and KAY, L.JJ., concurred.

Appeal allowed.

(Lord Esher, M.R., and Bowen and Kay, L.JJ.) June 9.

LISTER v. LANE AND NESHAM. (a.)

Landlord and tenant—Covenant to repair—Defects due to age and character of demised premises.

In determining whether there has been a breach of a covenant to repair, regard must be had to the age and character of the demised premises; and if the premises through their own inherent defects fall in the course of time into a particular condition, the results of their being in that condition are not breaches of a covenant to repair.

Appeal of the plaintiffs from the judgment of Grantham, J., at the trial in favour of the defendant Nesham.

The plaintiffs were the lessors, and the defendants, Lane and Nesham, were the lessees of certain premises in Lambeth. The action was brought for damages for alleged breach of a covenant in the lease to repair the demised premises. After delivery of defence the defendant Lane died, and the action was continued against Nesham alone.

By a lease dated the 22nd of November, 1883, the plaintiffs demised to the defendants for a term of seven years from the 23rd of September, 1883, certain premises in Lambeth consisting, inter alia, of a messuage called The Cottage. The defendants covenanted that they would at their own costs and charges, when and where, and as often as occasion should require, well, sufficiently, and substantially repair, uphold, sustain, maintain, amend, and keep the said premises and yield up the same at the end of the term in such good and substantial state and condition as the lessors might be bound to deliver up the same premises to their superior landlord. The defendants entered and remained in possession of the premises until the end of the term. In August, 1890, the plaintiffs delivered to the defendants a notice requiring them to execute certain repairs specified. By their statement of claim the plaintiffs alleged that the defendants did not do the said repairs pursuant to the said notice and that in consequence the cottage fell into a dangerous condition and had to be pulled down. The plaintiffs claimed £700, the chief item in which was a sum of £569, the cost of rebuilding the cottage. The defendant Nesham by his defence pleaded that the defendant was not bound by his covenant to do the repairs mentioned in the notice; that there had been no breach of the covenant; and that the house had not been pulled down in consequence of any default on his part.

From the evidence given at the trial on behalf of the plaintiffs it appeared that the house was at least 100 years old, and was built on what was called a "mud cill," that is to say, the soil being of a boggy nature, a platform of timber was placed on the muddy soil and the house was built on the timber. The mud was about seventeen feet deep and beneath that was gravel. In consequence of the mud cill being of timber instead of concrete, it gradually decayed and caused the foundations of the house to sink, and this caused the south wall of the house to bulge. The plaintiff's surveyor stated that if the wall had been pointed and underpinned no difficulty would have arisen. In August, 1890, he gave notice to the defendants to pull down the wall, but he did not think this could have been done without pulling down the whole house. In this latter opinion he was corroborated by the district surveyor, who inspected the house in November, 1891, and condemned it as a dangerous structure, and it was then pulled down. The cost of putting the house right was estimated at about £520. All the repairs specified in the notice of August, 1890, were executed with the exception of the repairs to the wall.

Grantham, J., held that there had been no breach of the covenant, and gave judgment for the defendant Nesham.

The plaintiffs appealed.

T. Terrell, for the plaintiffs, argued that, although in construing a covenant to repair regard must be had to the age of the demised premises, yet the language of this covenant was wide enough to include the repairs required.

He cited Bullock v. Dommitt, 6 T. R. 650; Payne v. Haine, 16 M. & W. 541; Easton v. Pratt, 12 W. R. 157, 805, 2 H. & C. 676; Proudfoot v. Hart, 38 W. R. 730, 25 Q. B. D. 42; Gutteridge v. Munyard, 7 C. & P. 129, 1 Mood. & Rob. 334. [BOWEN, L.J., referred to Soward v. Leggatt, 7 C. & P. 613.]

McCall, Q.C., and Stewart-Smith, for the defendant Nesham, were not called upon.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—In determining this case we have to consider by what rules our inquiry is to be governed. In Smith's Landlord and Tenant, 3rd ed., at p. 302, the result of the cases on the subject is correctly stated to be as follows: "These cases established that where there is a general covenant to repair, the age and general condition of the house at the commencement of the tenancy are to be taken into consideration," not only in considering the amount of repair which the tenant is bound to do, but "in considering whether the covenant has been broken." I do not cite that passage as an authority, but I adopt it as being a correct statement of the rule to be deduced from the cases. The passage is based on the observations of Tindal, C.J., in his summing up in Gutteridge v. Munyard, which is always cited on this point, where he said: "Where a very old building is demised, and the lessee enters into a covenant to repair, it is not meant that the old building is to be restored in a renewed form at the end of the term, or of greater value than it was at the commencement of the term. What the natural operation of time flowing on, effects, and all that the elements bring about, in diminishing the value, constitute a loss which, so far as it results from time and nature, falls upon the landlord." Therefore the nature and condition of the house at the time of the demise must be looked at. If it is a wooden house, the tenant, in repairing, is not bound to make it a brick house, or, if the house is built on wooden piles driven into soft ground, the tenant is not obliged to replace the wooden piles by concrete. That is laid down by Lord Abinger in Soward v. Leggatt, where he points out that the repairs done usually exceeded the amount of the estimate, "because, when the work is actually done, improvements are made for which the tenant is not liable, of which the improved mode of laying the joists in the kitchen is an example; and if the joists have now been laid in a manner which will make them more durable, and last longer, before new ones are again wanted, that is a thing for which the tenant is not liable on the covenant to repair." The cases therefore show that if a person takes a house which is of such a kind that by its own inherent nature it will, in course of time, fall into a particular condition, then the natural consequences of its being in that condition are not within the tenant's covenant to repair, however large the words of the covenant may be, because a covenant to repair a house is not a covenant to deliver up at the end of the term something different from that which the tenant took at the commencement of the term.

In this case the evidence shows that the house is a very old house in Lambeth. In former days, whenever there was an unusually high tide, Lambeth was often under water, and the soil became saturated with water, and was converted into mud. Therefore, before building the house a platform of timber was constructed on the muddy, shifting soil, and on this platform the house was built. That is the nature and condition of the house, and the effects of anything which happens in course of time through natural causes to such a house are results from time and nature which fall upon the landlord, and are not breaches of the covenant to repair, though they are matters which must be taken into account in considering whether the covenant has been broken.

That seems to me to be the state of things in this case, and therefore Grantham, J., was right in holding, on the plaintiffs' evidence, that there was no breach of the covenant. The tenant from time to time did the proper repairs, and now the plaintiffs want him to do something which he is not bound to do, and which would be of no avail unless he built a house of an entirely different kind.

BOWEN, L.J.—I am of the same opinion.

KAY, L.J.—I agree, and have only a few words to add. In construing this covenant regard must be had to the character of what was demised. Assuming that the terms of this covenant were in the widest language, and imposed upon the tenant the liability to put the premises into repair, as well as to keep them in repair, still the case of Payne v. Hayne shows that the age and character of the house must be taken into account. The character of this house has been described by the Master of the Rolls, and the only way of repairing it during the tenancy would have been by means of what is called underpinning—i.e., it would have been necessary to dig down through the seventeen feet of mud until the solid gravel was reached, and then build up from that to the brickwork of the house. That would not be repairing or upholding or maintaining a house of the same character as was demised. It would be making an entirely new and different house, and, besides that, it is doubtful whether it could be done at all without pulling down the house and rebuilding it. It is not suggested that the repairs could have been done by putting in a new timber foundation in the place of the old one; underpinning such as I have described was the only means of repairing the house, but such work as that does not, in my opinion, come within the covenant to repair, and there has, therefore, been no breach.

Appeal dismissed.

Under section 90 of the Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883, requiring an applicant for rectification of the register of trade-marks to be a "person aggrieved," any person who is in the same trade as the person who has registered the mark which is alleged to be wrongfully registered, and who may at some future time in the ordinary scope of his business desire to deal in the article covered by the registration, even though at the time of making the application to rectify he has no present or immediate intention or desire to deal in it, is primâ facie a "person aggrieved."

In 1884 P., on behalf of G. & Co., a firm of sauce manufacturers, registered the words "Yorkshire Relish" as a trade-mark for a certain sauce, on the ground of user of those words as a trade-mark before the 13*th of August,* 1875. P. had previously, in 1876, on behalf of the firm, registered two other trade-marks, the characteristic feature of which was the device of a willow pattern plate, claiming for them (as subsequently in the case of the words "Yorkshire Relish") user as trade-marks prior to 1875. In 1891 P. brought an action against the B. Co., who were also sauce manufacturers, to restrain them from using what he alleged to be a colourable imitation of his registered willow pattern mark. The B. Co. then moved to expunge from the register P.'s "Yorkshire Relish" trade-mark, on the ground that they were "aggrieved" by it being there. The words "Yorkshire Relish" alone had, prior to 1875, *only been used by P. on packing cases containing bottles of the sauce; the bottles of sauce were put upon the market with the willow pattern mark upon them. Held, that the B. Co. were "persons aggrieved" within section 90 so as to be entitled to apply to rectify the register; and that upon the evidence the user of the words "Yorkshire Relish" upon the packing cases had not constituted user as a trade-mark prior to the passing of the Trade-Marks Registration Act, 1875, and the words must accordingly be expunged.

Principle in In re Apollinaris Co.'s Trade-Mark, [1891] 2 Ch. 186, 39 W. R. Dig. 237, extended.

Appeal from a decision of Chitty, J.

In 1876 William Powell, on behalf of the firm of Goodall, Backhouse, & Co., who were manufacturers of sauces at Leeds, registered two trade-marks—Nos. 3,101 and 3,102—the former consisting of a label with the words "The Celebrated Yorkshire Relish," and the device of a willow pattern plate, the latter, the device of the willow pattern plate alone—claiming many years' user as a trade-mark prior to the 13th of August, 1875, the date of the passing of the Trade-Marks Registration Act, 1875.

In 1884 Powell, in the name of the firm, registered as a trade-mark, No. 37,030, the words "Yorkshire Relish" alone, user as a trade-mark for about eleven years previous to the 13th of August, 1875, being claimed in respect of it.

In 1891 Messrs. Goodall, Backhouse, & Co. brought an action against the Birmingham Vinegar Co., who were manufacturers of sauces at Birmingham, to restrain them from using a label for a sauce of theirs called "London Relish," which they alleged was a colourable imitation of their willow pattern registered trade-mark. The defendant company thereupon moved to expunge from the register the plaintiff's trade-mark No. 37,030, on the ground that they were "aggrieved persons" who were hampered in their business by the retention of that mark on the register, and contending that the trade-mark was bad because the words "Yorkshire Relish" alone had never been used as a trade-mark before 1875.

It did not appear from the evidence that prior to August, 1875, the words "Yorkshire Relish" alone, were used by the plaintiffs except upon packing cases containing bottles of the sauce, the words being stencilled on the cases. The bottles containing the sauce were put upon the market with the words "Yorkshire Relish" and the name of the firm "Goodall, Backhouse, & Co." impressed on the bottles themselves in the making, and also with labels with the willow pattern mark on them placed on the side of the bottles and over the corks. It did not appear that the defendant company had formed any definite present intention or immediate desire to manufacture or sell sauce under the name of "Yorkshire Relish"; a Mr. Thompson, the manager of the defendant company, made an affidavit in which he stated that "the said firm of Goodall, Backhouse, & Co., by means of their said wrongly registered trade-mark, have narrowed and are narrowing the area of business open to the said Birmingham Vinegar Brewery Co., and are excluding the said company from a portion of the trade into which they desire to enter, and the rights of the said company as persons who are engaged in the same trade as the said Goodall, Backhouse, & Co. are restricted by the retention on the register of the said wrongly registered mark, and damage is thereby caused to the company"; but, on his being put in the witness box for cross-examination when the appeal was heard, it appeared that the question of competing in respect of the particular article "Yorkshire Relish" had never been dealt with or discussed by the directors of his company.

Section 64 of the Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883, provides (3) that "any special and distinctive word or words, letter, figure, or combination of letters or figures, or of letters and figures used as a trade-mark before the 13th day of August, 1875, may be registered as a trade-mark."

Section 90 provides as follows:—"The court may, on the application of any person aggrieved by . . . any entry made without sufficient cause in any such register," i.e., any register kept under the Act, "make such order for . . . expunging or varying the entry, as the court thinks fit."

Chitty, J., held that the applicants were "persons aggrieved" within section 90 of the Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883, so as to be entitled to apply for the trade-mark to be expunged, and that the words "Yorkshire Relish" alone, had not been used as a trade-mark prior to the passing of the Trade-Marks Registration Act, 1875, and they must be expunged from the register.

From that decision Powell appealed.

Sir Horace Davey, Q.C., Aston, Q.C., and J. Cutler, for the appellant.—The first question is whether the respondents are "persons aggrieved" by our mark "Yorkshire Relish" being on the register: the second is whether, if they are, they have made out that the mark is wrongly on the register. As to the first point, the respondents are not "persons aggrieved"; in order to be such, they must be hampered in their trade: In re Apollinaris Co.'s Trade-Mark, [1891] 2 Ch. 186, 224, 228, 39 W. R. Dig. 237, which they are not. As to the second point, the words "Yorkshire Relish" were used alone, on the packing cases as a trade-mark, as "distinctive words" indicating that the contents were Goodall & Co.'s goods. Richards v. Butcher, [1891] 2 Ch. 522, 39 W. R. Dig. 237, is distinguishable, as in that case there was no independent or isolated use of the word "Monopole"; but here the user of the words

"Yorkshire Relish" on the cases was an isolated user, no other words were used. A man may have more than one trade-mark, one for use on packing cases in the wholesale trade, and the other for use on bottles in the retail trade.

They also referred to Montgomery v. Thompson, [1891] A. C. 217, 39 W. R. Dig. 235.

Moulton, Q.C., Farwell, Q.C., and P. H. Fothergill, for the respondents.—The name "Yorkshire Relish" was put on the cases as the name of the thing, to show what was inside the cases, and not as a trade-mark. [They were stopped by the court.]

LINDLEY, L.J.—The first question which here arises is whether the applicants, the respondents on this appeal, are "persons aggrieved," that is to say, whether they have any locus standi at all to complain of this trade-mark No. 37,030, even if it should be wrongfully on the register. In order to consider that question we must turn to the authorities which have decided the true construction to be put on the expression "person aggrieved." The real state of things appears to be this: The applicants are a company—they make sauces, they make Worcester Sauce and they make London Relish. They have not considered, as I understand Mr. Thompson, whether they will or will not make Yorkshire Relish; and their position is this, that so long as Yorkshire Relish is on the trade-mark register it is no use considering that, because they cannot do it; but if it were removed it is possible for anything I know that they might; and having regard to the tests which were laid down in the Apollinaris case it strikes me that they are persons aggrieved in this sense, that we cannot refuse to hear the case on the merits at their instance. They have such an interest in this matter—they are not common informers, they are not persons who have nothing on earth to do with the sauce trade—and it may well be (I do not know whether it is well founded or not) that if they can get rid of this mark they will sell Yorkshire Relish. Therefore I think the first point fails, notwithstanding that it is true that there is no evidence forthcoming that they really will or do intend to make Yorkshire Relish. It is sufficient for them to say, "We should like to consider that, when we are in a position to do it if we wish."

The next point is whether this entry is improperly made on the register. In order to determine that we must go back to the 64th section, clause 3; and now comes the question whether the words "Yorkshire Relish" were used as a trade-mark before the 13th of August, 1875. Now the evidence shows that this term "Yorkshire Relish" has been used by the appellants to denote some kind of sauce made by them ever since 1862, and they have got a reputation for it; but what is most important to observe is this, that they have no exclusive right to the use of the words "Yorkshire Relish" unless they can maintain his particular registered mark. Their right apart from that, is to prevent anybody from selling "Yorkshire Relish" in such a way as to pass off their goods as the appellants' goods.

Now, in what sense and to what extent was it used before 1875? Cases beginning with the Braided Fixed Star case (Re Palmer, 32 W. R. 306, 24 Ch. D. 504), and going down to the Diamond Cast Steel case (Re Spencer, 3 Rep. Pat. Cas. 73, 34 W. R. Dig. 200) and the Monopole case (Richards v. Butcher), all show that the user as a trade-mark must be the user of that which is registered as a trade-mark by itself, and not user of it in combination with something else. What is the user here relied upon? In this case a sauce is sold in bottles, and the bottles are not marked "Yorkshire Relish" alone, far from it. The appellants have put upon their bottles a label, which has been in use for a great number of years containing a willow pattern plate, their own names, and other things; and there is a general look about the bottles which would protect the appellants against anybody who sold similar sauce, or any other sauce of a similar name, in bottles similarly got up; but they have never used on their bottles the words "Yorkshire Relish" alone. The only use they have ever made of these words alone, before 1875 was this, that "Yorkshire Relish" was put on the packing cases in which these bottles were sold, and sold in considerable quantities. Upon those packing cases, and upon those alone, the words "Yorkshire Relish" did appear—"Yorkshire Relish" pure and simple, apart from the names of the makers, apart from a plate, and apart from everything else. There may have been, and I believe there were on the packing cases some numbers for booking purposes, but that is not material. Therefore, to that extent they used the words "Yorkshire Relish" alone, on the packing cases, and that is the user on which they rely.

Now, was that user as a trade-mark? Against the appellants' contention there is this fact which is very extraordinary, that in 1876 Powell registers what he calls his trade-mark, and he registers, not "Yorkshire Relish," either alone or in combination with anything else, but he registers the willow pattern plate, and in the interval between 1876 and 1884 he sells his bottles with the old label, as I understand it, but with the addition of a label which runs thus: "Yorkshire Relish," with the willow pattern plate at the corner, "Trade-mark registered, willow pattern plate." Therefore, upon the bottles at all events, and upon the register in 1876 and between 1876 and 1884, he tells you that his trade-mark is the willow pattern plate. Now if, notwithstanding that, it appeared that the packing cases sold the sauce in the same sense in which packing cases do sometimes sell their contents—as when you buy a box of cigars with a peculiar brand on the framework of the box that is the trade-mark of the cigar, although the trade-mark is not repeated on each cigar—if those words were used on the packing cases in the same sense and with the same meaning as we find brands and marks on cigar boxes or eau de Cologne cases or chocolate cases, and so on; if the packing case sold the article there would be a great deal in it; but to my mind it is perfectly hopeless for anybody to come to the conclusion which is requisite in order to pull this contention through, and to show that "Yorkshire Relish" on packing cases sold the article. What sold the article was what appeared on the bottle, not the words "Yorkshire Relish" put on the packing cases once on each of four sides. No doubt they were put there to indicate the contents—that they were bottles of "Yorkshire Relish." It appears to me, therefore, that the proof in fact of the user of these words as a trade-mark before 1875 breaks down. For these reasons I am of opinion that this mark ought to be removed, and that this appeal must be dismissed.

BOWEN, L.J.—I am of the same opinion, and I shall take first the last question my brother has treated, namely, the question whether there is evidence here to satisfy us that the term "Yorkshire Relish" had been used as a trade-mark before the 13th of August, 1875. The term "Yorkshire Relish" has been impressed on packing cases on the outside of the four sides. Is that user a user as a trade-mark of the term "Yorkshire Relish"? It seems to me that the answer is to be given by the simplest consideration of what is really the function of a trade-mark, about which there really can be no question. The function of a trade-mark is to give an indication to the purchaser as to the manufacture or quality of the goods, to give an indication to his eye of the trade source from which the goods come, or the trade hands through which they pass on their way to the market. It tells the person who is about to buy, or considering whether he shall buy, that what is presented to him is either what he has known before under the similar name as coming from a source with which he is acquainted, or that it is what he has heard of before, as coming from that similar source. A trade-mark in that sense is impressed upon or connected with articles which have to be sold. It is obvious that if it is to be an indication to the purchaser's eye of what I have stated, it must either be impressed on the goods or accompany the goods in such a sense as to produce that effect upon the purchaser. Accordingly it may be either marked on the goods themselves, or, if that is not possible or convenient, it may be marked on the vehicle of the goods, and may be, and sometimes, I dare say, is, marked upon the covering or exterior of the packing case of the goods. But when you are considering a mark upon the vehicle as distinct from a mark upon the goods, or, indeed, just as you would if you were considering the mark on the goods, but, à fortiori, when you are considering the mark on the vehicle that conveys the goods—especially an outer covering, like a packing case—you must ask yourself carefully, Is this mark, though it is a mark used by these particular persons, used as a trade-mark? Is its object and use to indicate to the purchaser what I have suggested?

The alternative view of what is put outside a packing case is that its object is not to indicate anything at all to the purchaser, but to indicate to those who are handling the packing case either for the purpose of carriage or storage, or otherwise, what the contents are. We have to decide which of those views is the true view.

It seems to me, though it is perfectly possible that a mark on a packing case may be intended to be used as a trade-mark, it can only as a rule be so, when the packing case is intended to sell the goods, and the packing case is intended to be the thing shown to the purchaser by which he is to judge. I feel very great doubt indeed myself as to whether it would be reasonable to come to the conclusion in such a case as this, that the packing cases were intended to be used in that way for the sale of the goods. Certainly nobody is going to lay down as a matter of law—and it would be impossible to lay down as a matter of law without a universal knowledge of trade, both all trades present and all trades to come—that there may not be trades, and may not be conditions of particular trades, in which marks on packing cases may be and are marks used as trade-marks. I am not going to lay down anything of the sort. I sum up the evidence in this case by saying that so far as the evidence goes I very much doubt whether this was one of that class of cases.

But the balance of judgment falls in one direction most heavily as soon as we learn the history of this case. It is on the bottles, in the case of a sauce, that I should particularly look to find a trade-mark if there is one. Though I do not say as a matter of law it must be so, as a matter of business I should have expected to find it on the bottle. The appellants use on the bottle a different mark altogether, and have used this different mark on the bottle as long as they have used the term "Yorkshire Relish" on the cases, and in 1876 when they came to register, having the power at law, if "Yorkshire Relish" really was a trade-mark of theirs at that time, to register "Yorkshire Relish" as a trade-mark, they do not register "Yorkshire Relish" as a trade-mark at all, but they register this other mark; and on the outside of their bottle is a willow pattern plate device, with "Trade-mark registered, willow pattern plate" upon it; so that they indicate to the world who use these bottles that the trade-mark is not "Yorkshire Relish," but the willow pattern plate. It is not a question of estoppel at all; do not let it be supposed for a moment I am putting it on that. But when we are making up our minds as to the true inference of fact to be drawn and find that in 1876, so far from stating to the world that they were looking upon "Yorkshire Relish" as their trade-mark, they state to the world exactly what their trade-mark is—the willow pattern plate—and do not register at the same time "Yorkshire Relish," I think we may be pretty certain that the conclusion of fact at which we have arrived is the correct one—namely, that the use of this term stamped on the packing cases was not a user of the term as a trade-mark at all. The explanation of it is the simple one that it was put on the packing case to show what was inside the packing case. On these grounds it appears to me that this appeal must so far fail.

But then there is the other point of the appellants, that the respondents to this appeal are not persons who are aggrieved. Persons who are aggrieved are persons who are in some way or other persons interested substantially in having the mark removed from the register or persons who would be substantially damaged if the mark remained. It is very difficult to get a nearer definition than that. In the Apollinaris case it was pointed out, not as a complete or exhaustive identical proposition, that people would be aggrieved if they were in the same trade and dealt in the same article. To my mind it is equally true that persons would be aggrieved if they are in the same trade, and if they are persons who might reasonably be expected to deal in the same article, though not prepared to declare at the moment a positive determination to do so, and for this reason: Supposing that this mark ought not to be on the register it hampers those who are in the trade not to be able to consider the question of embarking in another branch of the trade, if lawfully entitled to do it. It would be, to my mind, an unbusinesslike construction to place on the term "aggrieved" to say that it could be only applicable to those who actually manifested and had formed a fixed and crystallized intention of dealing in the particular article. There may be fluctuating moments in which business men have to make up their minds upon the future and the prospective chances of their affairs, and they are not bound to say definitely, "I intend to do this, or to do that," in a contingency which has never yet been determined. If it is on the whole a substantive damage to a man, as hampering him in the conduct of his affairs—not merely in the dealing with the article he is selling, but in the arranging his busines for the future—if it hampers him in his arrangement of business matters in the future that a trade-mark is on the register which ought not to be there, he is a person who, to my mind, is sufficiently aggrieved to come within the section. In this particular case it is perfectly true that "Yorkshire Relish" denotes the article which is, and has been for many years, made by the appellants, and to my mind it looks extremely unlikely that any person, even the respondents, could use the term "Yorkshire Relish" without running great risks. If "Yorkshire Relish" is not a term to which the appellants have the exclusive right, it is conceivable that the respondents or any other persons in the trade might, by an honest and strong endeavour, carried out effectually, so distinguish the sale of the article which they were making from the sale of the appellants', or so distinguish the manufacture of the article which they manufacture from the manufacture of the appellants, as to prevent the possibility of the outside customer being deceived. It is impossible for a court of law to say that might not be done, and it is impossible for a court of law to say, if that can be done, that the trade has not a right to have that door left open to them. On that ground it seems to me that, though "Yorkshire Relish" be an article which up to this time has been made by the appellants, and which up to this time has been identified with their manufacture, nevertheless, unless this trade-mark is rightly upon the register, it cannot be said that the respondents are not interested in having it taken off.

It is admitted that if an action were brought against them for infringing this trade-mark they then would be "persons aggrieved," and would then have a right to take it off. Look at the absurdity to which that leads us. We say to people in the trade who are prevented by this trade-mark, amongst other things—not the only thing, but amongst other things—from using it as theirs: "If any action is brought against you, you then will be sufficiently aggrieved to remove this from the register, but as long as no action is brought against you it may stay on the register so as to terrify you." That is impossible. The true view, to my mind, is that we must look to see, not merely, as we had in the Apollinaris case, whether people are in the same trade and actually intend to carry on the business, but whether, in the reasonable scope of the conduct of their affairs, they may want to carry it on, excluding remote possibilities and attaching oneself to real and substantial business chances. I had formed an opinion even before I heard Mr. Thompson in the box, that sauce manufacturers manufacturing relishes of the kind which the respondents are manufacturing would be sufficiently within the area of grievance to become persons aggrieved; and on hearing his evidence in the box I was more than ever satisfied that the possibility is within a reasonable distance of being realized that if this is taken off the register some attempt may be made—a risky attempt, perhaps, but some attempt may be made—which might honestly be made to manufacture "Yorkshire Relish," distinguishing the manufacture from that of the appellants. In this case it seems to me the appeal fails, and ought to fail with the usual result.

KAY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion on both points.

As to the question whether the respondents are "persons aggrieved," in the Apollinaris case Fry, L.J., said: If you are actually suing the persons who apply to have the mark taken off the register you might sue them on two grounds: you might sue them first because they were infringing your registered trade-mark, and, as to that, you would have only to prove that your trade-mark was registered, and if there was no application to take it off you would succeed at once if you showed that the use they were making, was of any substantial part of your trade-mark; and you might sue them in the same action, if you liked, for using words calculated to pass off their goods as being the goods of the plaintiff in the action. If you were actually suing, the man who is being sued has a right to say that it is not a proper trade-mark, and has a right to defend himself by applying to have it expunged as being improperly on the register. I agree that the language of Fry, L.J., is confined to the case of an actual pending action for that purpose. If an action were brought against the person who was using the trade-mark for an injunction to prevent an infringement of that trade-mark, that person is a "person aggrieved"; but I entirely deny that the case is confined to that. If he be a person engaged in the same trade, who, in the development of his trade hereafter, may find it necessary or expedient to use these words, and who might be able to use them either alone or in conjunction with some other words, if it were not that there was a trade-mark on the register, then, to my mind, he is a person aggrieved by having this trade-mark on the register, which prevents his using those words in any kind of way. Therefore I think the respondents, being persons in the same trade, as to whom I am not at all satisfied it may not be expedient in the development of their trade hereafter to use the words "Yorkshire Relish" either alone or in conjunction with some other words, and, not being at all satisfied that they may not, for anything that appears to the contrary in this case, have some right to do that, I say that they are "persons aggrieved" by the fact of this trade-mark being on the register if it is improperly there.

Then as to the question of the mark being improperly on the register, I agree entirely with what Fry, L.J., said in the Monopole case. You would not expect to find the trade-mark of goods like a sauce which is sold in bottles with labels on the bottles, on the packing cases containing numbers of those bottles which are sent out to retail dealers. They are sent out wholesale in cases to retail dealers packed in those cases. You would not expect those to be the cases on which the trade-mark would be put; but what to my mind is quite conclusive is this: in 1876 the persons who made this "Yorkshire Relish" and sent it out in such cases did register a trade-mark, which they represented they had been using from about the year 1864; but they did not then register the words "Yorkshire Relish" either as part of that trade-mark or as a separate trade-mark. They waited until 1884, and in 1884 they registered the words "Yorkshire Relish" as a trade-mark which they had been using contemporaneously—namely, from 1864. I do not think that any evidence that could be given could be more satisfactory than the act which they themselves did in 1876 to show that they thoroughly understood that the use they had made of the word "Yorkshire Relish" was not the use of a trade-mark. In my opinion the only meaning of the words on the outside of the cases was to indicate that the cases contained "Yorkshire Relish." I think that this appeal should be dismissed, with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

In re MANCHESTER, MIDDLETON, AND DISTRICT TRAMWAYS CO. (a.)

Tramway company—Abandonment of undertaking—Paper company—Application of parliamentary deposit — Depositors — Solicitors — Parliamentary agent — Creditors—Parliamentary Deposits and Bonds Act, 1892 (55 & 56 Vict. c. 27), s. 1.

The undertaking of a tramway company, incorporated by Act of Parliament, and in respect of which the necessary parliamentary deposit had been made, was abandoned, no land having been acquired or work done.

(a.) Reported by ARNOLD GLOVER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Held, that, under the Parliamentary Deposits and Bonds Act, 1892, s. 1, sub-sections 1 and 2, all the creditors of the company, including the solicitors and parliamentary agents concerned in the promotion of the Bill, were entitled to payment out of the deposit in priority to the depositors; but,

Held, that, the company being a "paper company," neither the solicitor nor the parliamentary agent was entitled to payment of his costs out of the parliamentary deposit.

The Manchester, Middleton, and District Tramways Co. was incorporated by a special Act of 1885, section 10 of which was as follows:—"If the company do not, previously to the expiration of the period limited for the completion of the tramways, complete the same and open them for the public conveyance of passengers, then and in every such case the deposit fund, or so much thereof as shall not have been paid to the depositors, shall be applicable, and after due notice in the London Gazette shall be applied towards compensating any landowners or other persons whose property has been interfered with or otherwise rendered less valuable by the commencement, construction, or abandonment of the tramways, or any portion thereof, or who have been subjected to injury or loss in consequence of the compulsory powers of taking property conferred upon the company by this Act, and for which injury or loss no compensation or inadequate compensation has been made, and also in compensating all road authorities for the expense incurred by them in taking up any tramways, or materials connected therewith, placed by the company in or on any road vested in or maintainable by such road authorities respectively, and in making good all damage caused to such roads by the construction or abandonment of such tramways, and shall be distributed in satisfaction of such compensation as aforesaid, in such manner and in such proportions as to the Chancery Division of the High Court of Justice in England may seem fit; and if no such compensation is payable, or if a portion of the deposit fund has been found sufficient to satisfy all just claims in respect of such compensation, then the deposit fund, or such portion thereof as may not be required as aforesaid, shall either be forfeited to her Majesty, and accordingly be paid or transferred to or for the account of her Majesty's exchequer in such manner as the Chancery Division thinks fit to order on the application of the solicitor to her Majesty's Treasury, and shall be carried to and form part of the Consolidated Fund of the United Kingdom; or, in the discretion of the Chancery Division, if the company is insolvent and has been ordered to be wound up, or a receiver has been appointed, shall wholly or in part be paid or transferred to such receiver or to the liquidator or liquidators of the company, or be otherwise applied as part of the assets of the company for the benefit of the creditors thereof. . . ."

The promoters of the company were Richard Robinson, Joseph Cunard Morrow, and Isaac Jackson Morrow, who provided the necessary parliamentary deposit of £2,710 3s. 3d., having borrowed the sum from Messrs. Dimsdale, Fowler, Dimsdale, & Barnard, a firm of bankers, and given them a charge on the fund.

The time for completing the tramways was extended by various special Acts, but the company's powers expired in August, 1891. No lands were ever acquired by the company, and no work was ever done. Two of the promoters, Richard Robinson and Joseph Cunard Morrow, held meetings of the company, and purported to pass resolutions, but the company had merely a parliamentary existence.

Four summonses were taken out by (1) Messrs. Elmslie, Forsyth, & Elmslie, the solicitors who acted for the company in the passing of the Bills through Parliament; (2) The Globe Industrial and General Trust Corporation (Limited) who advanced money to the company for the expenses of one of their Bills, and who were judgment creditors on a Lloyd's bond; (3) the widow and legal personal representative of C. J. Hanly, the parliamentary agent of the company, claiming to have a judgment for costs against the company, and contending that her husband had been appointed by a resolution of the company; and (4) Messrs. Dimsdale, Fowler, Barnard, & Dimsdale, who claimed as assignees of the depositors.

Section 1. "(1) Where in pursuance of any general or special Act of Parliament, or of any rules made thereunder, moneys or securities have been deposited with, or are standing in the name of, the Paymaster-General, to secure the completion by any company of any undertaking authorized by Parliament, or by any certificate issued under the authority of an Act of Parliament, and the undertaking has not been completed within the time limited in that behalf, the High Court may, notwithstanding anything in any such general or special Act or rules, order that the moneys or securities (in this Act called the deposit fund), or any part thereof, be applied towards compensating any landowners or other persons whose property has been interfered with or otherwise rendered less valuable by the commencement, construction, or abandonment of the undertaking, or any portion thereof, or who have been subjected to injury or loss in consequence of any compulsory powers of taking property given in connection with the undertaking, and have received no compensation, or inadequate compensation, for such injury or loss; and also, in the case of a tramway company, towards compensating the road authorities for the expenses incurred by them in taking up any tramways or materials connected therewith placed by the tramway company in or on any road vested in or maintainable by the road authorities, and in making good all damage caused to such roads by the construction or abandonment of the tramway.

"(2) Subject to payment of any such compensation, and notwithstanding any provision as to forfeiture to the Crown, the High Court may, if a receiver has been appointed, or the company is insolvent and has been ordered to be wound up, or the undertaking has been abandoned, order that the deposit fund, or any part thereof, be paid or transferred to the receiver or to the liquidator of the company, or be applied as part of the assets of the company for the benefit of the creditors thereof.

"(3) Subject to such application as aforesaid, the High Court may, after such public notice as to the court seems reasonable, order that the deposit fund, or any part thereof, be paid or transferred to the depositors or the persons claiming through or under them."

It was contended by Messrs. Dimsdale that the depositors were entitled to the deposit in priority to all the creditors, and the case was argued in the first place on that contention, the contest between the various creditors being reserved for subsequent decision.

Alexander, Q.C., and J. G. Fawcus, for Messrs. Dimsdale.—The distinction between "meritorious" creditors and "non-meritorious" creditors has not been affected by the Act of 1892, and still forms the only ground on which the court can exercise the discretion given to it by section 1, sub-section 2, of that Act. We rely on In re Lowestoft, Yarmouth, and Southwold Tramways Co., 25 W. R. 525, 6 Ch. D. 484, and In re Birmingham and Lichfield Junction Railway Co., 33 W. R. 517, 28 Ch. D. 652, cases under Board of Trade rules substantially identical with our special Act. The Act of 1892 merely substituted the depositors for the Crown, and enabled the abandonment of an undertaking without an application to Parliament.

They referred also to In re Barry Railway Co., 25 W. R. 201, 4 Ch. D. 315.

KEKEWICH, J.—To my mind there really is no reasonable doubt on this point, though, as Mr. Alexander has pointed out, it would have been easy for the Legislature to alter the law by express words. It did not see fit to do so, though it has introduced provisions to which I can only give effect by conceiving an implied intention to alter the law, and to give a class of creditors a claim which they had not before. Mr. Alexander's statement of the principle which he relied on was accurate, but the more accurate the more suicidal it is. The principle as stated by counsel is, in substance, that the depositors belong to a class of persons who have had a hand in bringing into existence a paper company, or a company which had not been competent to fulfil the undertaking of a public character which deserved and obtained the sanction of the Legislature. The depositors themselves taking nothing under the old Acts and the Board of Trade Rules, it follows that those who have joined hands with the depositors are to be placed in the same category as the depositors themselves. Therefore, the solicitors who promoted the Bill, the other promoters of the Bill, the parliamentary agents employed by the solicitors, or anyone else who takes the pains to spend money and time in bringing the company before the Legislature, ought not to be paid out of the deposited funds, whereas meritorious creditors, outside the promotion of the Bill, ought to be paid. Subject to that, the deposit was forfeited to the Crown as a warning to promoters, whether depositors, parliamentary agents, or others, that they would get nothing out of such promotion as I have mentioned.

Then the Legislature passed this Act of 1892, every word of which deserves particular attention, and leads up to the conclusion at which I have arrived. The Act is entitled, "An Act to authorize the release of certain deposits, and the cancellation of certain bonds, made or given to secure the performance of undertakings authorized by Parliament," and therefore the Legislature had before it not only the deposits which were to be released, but the exact character of the deposits. They are all "made or given to secure the performance of undertakings authorized by Parliament," not necessarily to secure the Bills being passed, but to give tangible effect to the undertakings sanctioned by Parliament; and they are not to be forfeited or dealt with in any other way, but they can be released; and so, in the 3rd sub-section of section 1, I find that, instead of the deposits being forfeited to the Crown, what is not wanted for the payment of creditors may (subject, of course, to the exercise of a discretion by the court if a proper case requires it) be transferred to the depositors. It does seem a strange thing for the depositors to say, "The Act was passed for our benefit. We who promoted this paper company, who in fact did more than anyone else, because we found the cash, without which nothing could have been done at all, are to have our money back, but the solicitor and parliamentary agent who worked with us, and were as guilty as we were, are to be left out in the cold." That does seem to me to be manifestly unfair. I observe that—partly, no doubt, as has been pointed out, because the Legislature did not wish to be burdened with abandoned Bills, but partly also because the old form of conditions was insufficient—the Legislature has introduced the provision that, when the company is insolvent, and an order to wind up is made, "or the undertaking has been abandoned" (the very event we have now to contemplate), the whole matter has to be considered, and this deposit has to be dealt with. No doubt the words authorizing the application of the fund "for the benefit of the creditors" are the same as before. The fund may still be applied "for the benefit of the creditors"; and those words were construed before, and no doubt would in similar cases be construed again, as applying to meritorious creditors, because there was an ultimate appropriation in favour of the Crown; but now, under this Act, the Crown not coming in, and having nothing whatsoever to say in the matter, and the ultimate gift being to the depositors, on that ground, quite apart from the question of participation in guilt, to my mind all the creditors are intended to take. It would be monstrous to say that the depositors are to be allowed to take this fund away and put it in their own pockets without satisfying all the creditors so far as the fund will go. In re Colchester Tramways Co., the only case on the Act, has very little to do with the case before me, except that it was the case of an abandoned tramway, and that this Act was mentioned.

I am not deciding now—and I must be taken as leaving this open—the question whether, where there is a contest between "meritorious" and "non-meritorious" creditors, the "non-meritorious" will share rateably, or in any proportion at all, with the "meritorious." I leave that open for discussion hereafter. What I do decide is that all creditors, "meritorious" and "non-meritorious," come in before the depositors.

The court then proceeded to hear the claims of the various creditors.

Cur. adv. vult.

KEKEWICH, J.—Having already decided that, as between the depositors and those hitherto styled non-meritorious creditors of the company, the latter are entitled to claim against the deposit which, by the Act of 1892, is directed to be applied "as part of the assets of the company for the benefit of the creditors thereof," I am now called upon to determine whether the claimants are creditors of the company. Some minor points require consideration; but the main question as regards each of these claimants is whether he is entitled to sue the company. The answer to that depends on the established relation between the claimants and the company. It is a question of law, dependent, of course, on the admitted or proved facts, but still a question of law only. Many cases bearing on it were cited in argument, and I have studied them all; but there is no occasion particularly to refer to any but that of In re Skegness and St. Leonards Tramways Co., Ex parte Hanly, where all the earlier authorities come under review, and the law is fully discussed and expounded. On behalf of the claimants that case was said to establish that all a solicitor, parliamentary agent, or other person who has rendered services in connection with the company has to prove in order to maintain his claim as a creditor is, that he has no other paymaster to look to but the company. The phrase just used is taken from the judgment of Lindley, L.J., in the case cited, and similar or equivalent language is to be found in the judgments of the other Lords Justices, and also in that of Chitty, J., from whom the appeal was brought.

It must be granted, then, that this absence of any other paymaster is an essential condition to the maintenance of a claim against the company. It does not follow that this is the only essential condition of such claim, and, in my opinion, it is not the only one. It may very well be that a solicitor or parliamentary agent has intentionally or unintentionally, wisely or unwisely, omitted to take such precautions as will enable him to maintain an action for his costs against any other person, and yet he may not be a creditor of the company. That is, positive relations are required to be proved in the ordinary way to the satisfaction of the court, and cannot depend only on the negation of the creditor and debtor relations as regards other persons. It is therefore necessary, in this or any other case, to inquire under what circumstances the claimant rendered the services in respect of which he claims; and whether these circumstances, which of course include all relevant documents, justify the conclusions—first, that he looked to the company for payment, and, secondly, that the company contracted an obligation to pay him.

As regards services rendered in promoting the original Bill for the incorporation of the company, the first inquiry only is needed. The company, not being then in existence, could not directly or indirectly contract an obligation to pay; and, on the other hand, the equivalent of such a contract is upheld by the statute of incorporation, provided only the claimant can be said to have looked to the company for payment, by which I mean to the company and to no other paymaster. Persons who promote Bills in Parliament in the sense of being themselves petitioners for the Bill, or perhaps supporting the petition by contribution, actual or promised, to the costs incurred, may fairly be said, in the absence of any agreement or other indication to the contrary, to look to the company, that is, to the capital of the company, for reimbursement; and it might be assumed, in the absence of evidence of indemnity by others, that they had no other paymaster. They therefore would be entitled to rank as creditors of the company under the usual provision to which I have above referred. But is it reasonable to suppose that a solicitor or parliamentary agent promotes a bill in this sense? To my mind nothing can be more unreasonable. It may be that solicitors and parliamentary agents are occasionally engaged in speculative business to a certain extent, that is, they undertake work which they hope and believe will be successful and remunerative, and they are content to run some risk of losing their costs should the event not fulfil their expectations; but it is not the business or the habit of solicitors or parliamentary agents to promote Bills. Their business is to act on instructions to work as the agents or attorneys for others, who are their principals, and to look to those principals for payment. This is only expressing in my own language what is forcibly put by Lindley, L.J., in the Skegness case. I am satisfied that the Lord Justice did not intend to exclude from the view there expounded a case such as I am now considering, viz., one where the solicitor and parliamentary agent say that they have no claim against the promoter, and that therefore they have one against the company. As the Lord Justice says, "The idea will not work." To my mind there is nothing here to show that the solicitor and parliamentary agent had not a claim against the promoters, and everything points to an entirely different conclusion.

Mr. Elmslie says that his firm were solicitors "for the Bill," and the phrase is used to show that he had no client, or at best an incorporeal one.

It is obvious that they were really instructed by Messrs. Robinson and Morrow, the real promoters of the Bill. Of course they took their instructions from someone, and there was nobody else to give them. The bill of costs has been furnished to me, and if confirmation of this view were needed the bill of costs largely confirms it. True, it is not made out to any particular person, and is stated to be "Messrs. Elmslie, Forsyth, & Elmslie's charges in reference to promoting and passing the Manchester, Middleton, and District Tramways Bill"; but the first item of charge is for several attendances upon Mr. Morrow in reference to the proposed application to Parliament, and conferring thereon, and advising, and every page of a somewhat lengthy document illustrates the accuracy of that item. With whom did the solicitors confer? Whom did they advise? There is but one answer—Mr. Morrow and those who co-operated with him in the promotion of the company. Therefore, even if the solicitor has no other paymaster, into which I do not further inquire, he is not, in my opinion, a creditor of the company in respect of the costs incurred about the original Bill. And the parliamentary agent is in the like position. There is no occasion to reason his case out. He was no more a promoter of the Bill than the solicitor was. He acted throughout in a professional character only, received his instructions and fulfilled them as agent, and must look to his principal for payment. At my request his bill of costs also has been furnished, and a perusal of it equally confirms the view above expressed. Indeed, it is compiled on similar lines. It might be said that the promoters are creditors by virtue of the statute, and that to prevent circuity of action the solicitor and parliamentary agent might claim directly against the company. This is quite possible; but the solicitor and parliamentary agent have come here to say that they have no claim against the promoters; that they looked to only one paymaster, namely, the company, and I must deal with the case on that footing. If they have thus defeated themselves the fault is their own.

This course of reasoning does not necessarily dispose of claims founded on services rendered subsequently to the incorporation of the company. It will be presently seen that in my view it does dispose of them also; but of course it does not do so necessarily, because one might find a liability of the company after incorporation and independently of statutory provision founded on retainers, agreements, or the like, rendering the company liable in its corporate character. Such things are, in fact, put forward both by the solicitor and parliamentary agent as supporting their claim to subsequent costs. But what are they worth? There are documents purporting to be sealed, and in fact sealed, with the common seal of the company. There are documents purporting to be signed on behalf of the company in pursuance of resolutions passed, and if the company could be regarded as having had any real existence for such purposes, it might not be right to go behind those documents, and they might be treated as authoritative, and binding the company even though there was some question touching their propriety. There were addressed to the court, in opposition to this part of the claimants' case, arguments founded on the provisions of the general and special Acts by which this company is governed respecting the election of directors, the number required to constitute a board, and so forth. Far be it from me to say that these arguments, and the statutory provisions on which they rest, do not deserve attention; but, in my opinion, it is not necessary to go so far to find an answer to the claims. Let me say boldly and plainly that, for such purposes as are now under consideration, the corporation did not exist at all. This is, of course, somewhat paradoxical. The corporation was in fact constituted by the Act of 1885 as consisting of "Richard Robinson, Joseph Cunard Morrow, and all other persons and corporations who have already subscribed to or shall hereafter become proprietors in the undertaking," and it is paradoxical to say that the corporation, having been thus constituted, did not for some purposes exist at all. But it is a statutory corporation called into existence by a special Act of Parliament (in which certain general Acts are incorporated) for special purposes, and according to the special and general Acts there is required for the fulfilment of those purposes certain machinery which cannot be set in motion until the original corporation has been enlarged beyond the promoters, Messrs. Robinson and Morrow. The Legislature did not intend that those two gentlemen should by themselves exercise the powers vested in the corporation.

This, to my mind, is of the essence of all that vast body of legislation which is familiar to us through the railway companies, canal companies, and many other companies of a like character, in which the capital and industry of the country are so largely embarked.

Possibly no decision goes quite so far as this; but we are familiar with companies existing only for the purposes of liquidation and devoid of active powers; and the principle upon which I rely is recognized in the already cited case of In re Skegness and St. Leonards Tramways Co., Ex parte Hanly, and especially by the judgment of Cotton, L.J., who says: "It is true that in one sense it was called into existence by Act of Parliament; but it never had any existence except upon paper and by Act of Parliament." Mr. Warmington says that Messrs. Robinson and Morrow, in passing resolutions, making agreements, sealing retainers, and so forth, did so, not as directors, but as proprietors; but the answer is that they had no rights as proprietors, that they had no powers other than those conferred by statute, and that the powers conferred by statute could not be exercised but on the lines and according to the terms which the statutes prescribe.

Two subsidiary arguments must be noticed. First, it is said that this reasoning fails because there must be a step or steps towards the extension of the corporation and the performance of its duties, which could only be taken by Messrs. Robinson and Morrow, inasmuch as, in the first instance, they alone were members of the corporation. This may be conceded. The earlier members of the company would be added to the list, consisting, first, of two only by co-optation, and in the first instance Messrs. Robinson and Morrow would be the only co-optators; but, because some such powers were necessarily vested in them, it does not follow that they were intended to exercise the larger powers for which corporate action was required.

Then it is urged that in the last Act, that of 1890, there is a recital that the company have entered into a contract for the construction and completion of the tramways, and that this is a parliamentary recognition of the existence of a company having power to contract. It behoves me to speak carefully and in guarded language. I suppose that Parliament was satisfied that a contract had been entered into, and deemed it right that an opportunity should be given to the company to carry that contract into effect; but it would be pressing the recital too hard to make it say that the contract was one to be fulfilled by Messrs. Robinson and Morrow, or with the proper and effective constitution of the machinery required by statute to work the undertaking.

A separate agreement deserves separate notice. Judgments have been obtained against the company for the sums alleged to be due. It is conceded that, notwithstanding these judgments, the amounts for which they were recovered are not conclusive, and bills of costs are still liable to taxation; but it is insisted that they are conclusive that some amount is due, and due in repect of the services comprised in those bills of costs.

Further, it is argued that if the judgments are not for all purposes conclusive they are so in these proceedings, and that they must be treated as binding on the company until set aside in an action for that purpose. I entertain no doubt that I am entitled to inquire in this matter whether these judgments can be supported or not. Mr. Alexander referred me to a case, Ex parte Kibble, where that view was upheld in bankruptcy; and I am sure that like cases might be found in administration proceedings in Chancery. It may well be that if in any given case there arose on a judgment a question of difficulty depending on the study of documents and argument of intricate points of law, and, still more, if it depended on a conflict of evidence requiring oral examination, and possibly the verdict of a jury, the court would decline in administration proceedings to disregard a judgment, and would give the parties an opportunity of contesting it by independent action. This was what occurred in Bowes v. Hope Life Assurance Co., where, be it observed, the petitioners had declined to go into evidence in support of their claim, and there were no materials enabling the court to determine whether the judgment was impeachable or not. But here all the facts are before us. It is not intended that anything worth attention can be added. The judgments were obtained under order 14, and no defence was offered by the company, which on these occasions, as on all others, was really only another name for Messrs. Robinson and Morrow. If what I have already held is sound, the judgments can be of no more avail to the claimants than retainers under seal, or agreements purporting to be entered into with a paper company.

What has been said applies directly to the claims of the solicitor and parliamentary agent, the clients of Mr. Warmington and Mr. Swinfen Eady; but in truth it governs also the claims of Mr. Renshaw's clients, the Globe Industrial and General Trust Corporation. So far as this latter claim rests on a judgment there is nothing to add. It rests also on a bond intended to be in the form of what is generally styled a "Lloyd's bond," but really given for money advanced. I do not propose to examine the case of Chambers v. Manchester and Milford Railway Co., or any other cases bearing on statutory powers of borrowing. Haply they would suffice to show that the Globe Corporation could not sue on the bond. My judgment, however, is founded on the more general principle that it was not competent to such a corporation, or rather to Messrs. Robinson and Morrow, purporting to act on behalf of the corporation, either to borrow money or give a bond. This claim fails with the others and on like grounds. But it is said that although the Globe Corporation cannot recover on their judgment or on their bond, they are entitled to stand in the place of those who really had the money advanced, and that it was expended in paying the costs of the Act of 1890, in which the usual provision for payment of costs, charges, and expenses of and incident to applying for, obtaining, and passing the Act is found. Granted that they are subrogated to the rights of the persons to whom the money was paid, they cannot be in any better position than those persons, and my decision is that the latter could not themselves sue the company. This argument, therefore, also fails, and the result is that all three claims will be rejected.

It remains to deal with the costs. The contest here is entirely between the claimants and the depositors. The latter would have it thought that they appear in a representative character to defend the deposit for the sake of other claimants against it. There is some truth in this; but it is not the whole truth. They are fighting for their own hand. The Act of 1892 allows them to claim the deposit so far as it is not required to be applied as part of the assets of the company for the benefit of the creditors thereof. There is not a word to be said against bankers who in the ordinary course of business find money to satisfy the Standing Orders of Parliament requiring deposits on the application for private Bills; but they must be taken to be aware, and those gentlemen were, in fact, aware, of the circumstances under which the money was required and found. Bankers providing money for such a purpose must know that they must incur some risk, and it is for them, as a matter of business, to make their own terms to cover that risk. Coming into this court to protect and recover the deposit, they can scarcely be said to have meritorious claims, whether against the solicitor, parliamentary agent, or other persons who have also incurred their own risk in the same matter. That they have incurred costs in resisting these claims may assist their application for what is ultimately left of the deposit after such debts, if any, as may be established against the company have been satisfied; but there for the moment the matter must rest.

The order will simply be one for the refusal of all the summonses, and nothing will be said about costs of any party.

THORNE v. HEARD. (a.)

Mortgage — Sale—Proceeds of sale — Negligence—Payment of interest by agent—Trustee Act, 1888.

The defendants were first mortgagees and the plaintiff second mortgagee of a property called "The Nest." The defendants in 1878 sold the property under their power of sale, the purchase-money being received by one J. S., a solicitor, who acted usually for the plaintiff and also for the defendants in any legal business. He gave the defendants a receipt for the balance of the purchase-money after payment of the sum due to them, the receipt stating that the balance was due to the plaintiff. J. S. never handed over the balance to the plaintiff, but continued to pay him interest as if from the defendants down to the year 1891, when he became bankrupt, and it was then discovered he had applied the surplus of the sale moneys to his own use.

Held, that the defendants were not liable to the plaintiff for the balance of the sale moneys, since, even if they had been guilty of negligence in not seeing that J. S. had authority from the plaintiff to receive the money for him, and in not seeing that J. S. paid it to him, section 8 of the Trustee Act, 1888, barred the claim, and the payment of interest by J. S. until 1891 did not keep the right of action alive against the defendants.

Trial of action.

The defendants, Henry Ellis Heard and William Marsh, were the transferees of two indentures of mortgage dated respectively the 5th of August, 1868, to secure £1,000 charged on a leasehold property called "The Nest" held under a lease for ninety-nine years from the 24th of June, 1869.

The plaintiff, Henry Thorne, was the transferee of a subsequent mortgage on the same property to secure £333.

James Searle, a solicitor, acted in these mortgage transactions both for the plaintiff and the defendants.

In the year 1878 the defendants in exercise of the power of sale contained in the mortgages of the 5th of August, 1868, sold the leasehold premises to Eliza Stewart for £1,700, and the premises were conveyed to her. The purchase-money amounted to £1,700, and the defendants retained £1,000 in satisfaction of their own mortgage and handed the remainder to Searle to be dealt with as to £333 for the plaintiff's benefit, Searle having fraudulently represented himself to them as the plaintiff's agent.

Searle handed two receipts to them, which were in the following terms, and dated the 5th of February, 1878:—

"Received of Messrs. Henry Ellis Heard and William Marsh the sum of £333 being principal money due to Mr. Henry Thorne on two further charges by way of mortgage on 'The Nest,' Torquay, Devon, dated respectively the 25th of June, 1868, and the 22nd of November, 1870, and I undertake to deliver to them the indentures dated the 15th and

(a.) Reported by J. W. GREIG, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

18th of March, 1872, being transfers of such mortgages, and Mr. Thorne's receipt indorsed thereon within fourteen days from this date.

"JAMES SEARLE."

"Received of Messrs. Henry Ellis Heard and William Marsh the sum of £375 3s. 6d., being the balance of the purchase-money of 'The Nest,' Torquay, Devon, sold to Mrs. Eliza Stewart for £1,700 (after their retaining the sum of £1,000 due on their first mortgage, and paying to Mr. Henry Thorne the sum of £333 due to him on mortgage of the same premises, subject to the first security to them), the sale thereof having been carried out by Messrs. Henry Ellis Heard and William Marsh with the approval of Mr. Henry Thorne, and at my request.

"JAMES SEARLE."

Searle did not pay the £333 over to the plaintiff, but made use of it for his own purposes, though he continued to pay interest to the plaintiff as if on his mortgages down to 1891. On the 18th of February, 1892, Searle presented his petition in bankruptcy, and it then transpired that he had used the moneys so received for his own purposes. This action was then brought by the plaintiff, claiming as against the defendants the sum of £333, or for an account of the surplus moneys realized by the sale after satisfying the moneys due to the defendants.

The writ was issued on the 30th of August, 1892.

The defendants by their defence alleged that the plaintiff's claims were in the nature of a stale demand, and that the plaintiff's right to any relief was barred by the Statute of Limitations (21 Jac. 1, c. 16), and they also relied on section 8 of the Trustee Act, 1888.

The plaintiff pleaded that the solicitor acted as agent for the defendants in paying the interest on the second mortgage, and that, therefore, the case was taken out of the Trustee Act, 1888.

The mortgage under which the defendants sold contained a provision that the moneys arising from any sale in pursuance of the power should be held upon trust, in the first place thereout to pay all the expenses incurred on such sale or otherwise in relation to the premises, and in the next place to apply such moneys in or towards satisfaction of the moneys for the time being owing on the security of the mortgage, and then to pay the surplus (if any) to the mortgagor, his executors, administrators, or assigns.

Neville, Q.C., and Borthwick, for the plaintiff.—The debt was kept alive by Searle having paid interest, even though he had no authority: Rew v. Pettet, 1 Ad. & Ell. 196. Searle's acts were fraudulent, and time did not begin to run until the discovery of the fraud, and that was when Searle became bankrupt in 1892: Gibbs v. Guild, 30 W. R. 591, 9 Q. B. D. 59. The surplus sale money was "retained" by the defendants within the meaning of the Trustee Act, 1888.

Chadwyck Healey, Q.C., and Creed.—Searle acted throughout as the business man of the plaintiff, and therefore, defendant cannot by any possibility be liable.

ROMER, J.—The facts are not substantially in dispute, and the only real question in the case is whether the plaintiff's claim is not barred by lapse of time and the operation of the Trustee Act, 1888, s. 8. I think it is. The plaintiff's first point is that his claim is kept alive by the payment of interest by Searle. But this interest was admittedly not paid with the defendants' knowledge, and in my opinion was not paid on their behalf or by their agent or under such circumstances as would keep on foot the claim as against them. What happened was really this. Searle acted as solicitor for the defendants in the sale. He was trusted by them and left to do what was right in the matter. He received the purchase-money and discharged himself of it as between himself and the defendants, as to the balance after paying defendants' first mortgage debt, by paying it to himself on behalf of the subsequent mortgagees. In particular, as to the mortgage due to the plaintiff, he gave the receipt of the 5th of February, 1878, relating to the £333. That receipt, to my mind, shows that, as between Searle and the defendants, he held the £333 no longer for them or as their agent, but he held it on behalf of the plaintiff, Thorne, and I think it would have been impossible for Searle to say, as against the defendants, after this receipt, that he did not represent himself as having authority to receive the same for Thorne. As a matter of fact he had no such authority, and instead of paying over the £333 to the plaintiff, for whom he held it, he gradually used it for his own purposes, and paid Thorne interest on it, as if the mortgage debt was still existing. But I cannot see how, under these circumstances, it can be successfully contended that such payment of interest was a payment by the defendants or their agents on their behalf, or kept alive the plaintiff's claim as against the defendants. The defendants were no doubt negligent in not inquiring as to the solicitor's authority, and in not seeing that the plaintiff got his money, and as against the plaintiff himself they would remain liable if no Statute of Limitations applied, but this negligence could not be held in any sense fraud by them or prevent their claiming the benefit of any Statute of Limitations, if such statute would protect them from the plaintiff's claim if made after the prescribed lapse of time. This leads me to the consideration of the question whether the Trustee Act, 1888, s. 8, applies in defendants' favour. I think it does. The claim is not founded on any fraud or fraudulent breach of trust to which they were party or privy. Searle's fraud was not theirs, nor were they party or privy to it, nor is the property the subject of the action still retained by them, nor has it been converted to their use. The circumstances under which the balance of the proceeds of sale was dealt with I have already indicated, and I cannot see how, under those circumstances, it can be fairly said that they retained that balance by Searle as their agent, or that they received it and converted it to their own use within the meaning of that phrase as used in section 8. Under these circumstances sub-section (6) applies, and the plaintiff's claim is barred. The action must be dismissed with costs.

Where a lessor has brought an action against the lessee and his underlessees claiming possession of the demised premises under a proviso for re-entry upon the bankruptcy of the lessee, it is competent for the underlessees to set up by way of defence and counter-claim in that action a claim for an order vesting in them the property in question for the remainder of their lease under section 4 of the Conveyancing and Law of Property Act, 1892. It is not necessary that the application for such an order should be made by summons at chambers.

Summons under ord. 25, r. 4, to strike out the defence and counter-claim in an action on the ground that they disclosed no reasonable answer or cause of action.

The summons was referred by the judge at chambers to the court.

The facts and arguments are sufficiently stated in the judgment.

Cur. adv. vult.

June 26.—The judgment of the COURT (Lord COLERIDGE, C.J., and HAWKINS, J.) was delivered by HAWKINS, J.—I have to deliver the judgment of the Lord Chief Justice and myself in this case, argued some time ago.

This is a summons referred to us from chambers. It prays that judgment may be entered for the plaintiffs for possession of the premises known as "The London Coffee House," or, in the alternative, first, that the defence may be struck out, on the ground that it discloses no reasonable answer to the plaintiff's claim. Secondly, that the counter-claim may be struck out or disallowed, on the grounds that it is embarrassing and discloses no reasonable cause of action, and cannot be conveniently disposed of in this action.

The plaintiffs are lessors of the premises in question, and the object of this action is to recover from the defendants, who are underlessees thereof, possession under a proviso contained in the original lease for re-entry in case of the bankruptcy of the lessee, his executors, administrators, or assigns.

The object of the defence and counter-claim is to obtain relief against such forfeiture by means of a vesting order under the Conveyancing Act, 1892. The plaintiffs contend that such relief can only be obtained upon application by summons at chambers. The defendants contend that, even assuming it may be obtained at chambers, it may also be obtained by resisting, either by plea or counter-claim, the plaintiffs' action for possession.

The statement of claim delivered on the 3rd of January, 1893, alleges that by a lease granted on the 14th of June, 1878, the plaintiffs demised "The London Coffee House" to John Jones for fifty years, subject to a proviso for re-entry if the lessee, his executors, administrators, or assigns, or any of them, should be adjudged bankrupt; that by various assignments the interest of Jones became vested in one Richard Sewell (a defendant); that in September, 1890, Sewell sublet the premises by way of mortgage to the defendants Nicholson, and subsequently, by way of second mortgage, to the defendants Flower & Son; that on the 19th of July, 1892, Sewell was adjudicated bankrupt, and the defendant Wildy was appointed trustee under the bankruptcy; that the Nicholsons are in possession, claiming title under the underlease, and refuse to give possession though requested so to do.

The plaintiffs claim, first, a declaration that they are entitled to possession; secondly, possession; and thirdly, rent apportioned and mesne profits.

The statement of defence by the defendants Nicholson admits the lease, the assignments, and the mortgage (which was to secure £24,500), and alleges that on the 31st of May, 1892, they took possession in accordance with the underlease, and that they paid the quarter's rent due at Midsummer, 1892, and have always been willing and ready to pay the rent which has accrued due, but the plaintiffs have refused to accept it.

They deny that the plaintiffs are entitled, as against them, to possession or to any apportionment of rent or mesne profits, and submit that they are entitled to relief from the alleged right of re-entry under the provisions of the statute 55 & 56 Vict. c. 13.

They also counter-claim an order vesting in them the property in question for the term of their underlease on such conditions as to the court may seem fit.

By the Conveyancing Act, 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 41), s. 14, sub-section 2, it is enacted that "where a lessor is proceeding, by action or otherwise, to enforce a right of re-entry or forfeiture, the lessee" (this includes an underlessee, sub-section 3) "may, in the lessor's action, if any, or in any action brought by himself, apply to the court for relief; and the court may grant or refuse relief as the court, having regard to the proceedings and conduct of the parties under the foregoing provisions of this section, and to all the other circumstances, thinks fit," and the relief, if granted, is to be upon such terms as the court thinks fit. By sub-section 6 (i.) the section already mentioned was not to extend to a condition for forfeiture on the bankruptcy of the lessee; but the Conveyancing Act, 1892, by section 2, sub-section 3, enacts that sub-section 6 of section 14 of the Act of 1881 shall not apply to a condition for forfeiture on bankruptcy in such a case as the present.

The same statute (1892) also enacts in section 4 that "where a lessor is proceeding by action or otherwise to enforce a right of re-entry or forfeiture under any covenant, proviso, or stipulation in a lease the court may, on application by any person claiming as underlessee any estate or interest in the property comprised in the lease or any part thereof, either in the lessor's action (if any) or in any action brought by such person for that purpose, make an order vesting for the whole term of the lease or any part of the term the property comprised in the lease or any part thereof in any person entitled as underlessee to such estate or interest in such property upon such conditions, &c., as the court in the circumstances of the case shall think fit, but in no case shall any such underlessee be entitled to require a lease to be granted him for any longer term than he had under his original sublease."

Mr. Graham, for the plaintiffs, in his argument before us contended that the defence and counter-claim were both bad: the defence, as disclosing no defence to the plaintiffs' action; the counter-claim as disclosing no reasonable cause of action in the defendant, and also on the ground that it is em-rassing and could not be conveniently disposed of in this action.

As to the first and second of these points, it would be rash to suggest that they are absolutely free from doubt—for, as regards the defence, it is obvious that at the present moment there is no actual and complete legal answer to the claim for possession, simply because hitherto no relief from the plaintiffs' right to re-enter has yet been obtained. It must, however, be observed that if the defendants' case, as disclosed on the pleadings, be found or admitted to be true in fact and the court shall think fit to grant such relief as is claimed, there will, before the judgment in the action is given, be brought into existence a perfect defence, both to the claim for a declaration that the plaintiffs are entitled to possession and to the claim for actual possession. At this moment it is but an inchoate defence impliedly given by the statute 55 & 56 Vict. c. 13, which will or will not be perfected according to the view taken by the court before which the action is tried.

Both defence and counter-claim depend on the true interpretation of the sections in the statutes of 1881 and 1892 (which are to be read as one Act), to which we have already referred. The 4th section of the Act of 1892 expressly enables an underlessee to apply by way of relief in the lessor's action (if any), or in an action to be brought by himself. It does not, it is true, prescribe how or in what form that application is to be made, but it is clear, if it is to be made "in the lessor's action," that it must be made to the court in which that action is pending, and it seems to us that, in the absence of any enactment to the contrary, it may be conveniently made in the form of a counter-claim, which is in substance an application for a vesting order, which if granted would put an end to plaintiffs' right to possession.

It is necessary to refer to the 69th section of the Act of 1881, which enacts (sub-section 1) that "all matters within the jurisdiction of the court under this Act shall, subject to the Acts regulating the court, be assigned to the Chancery Division of the court," and (sub-section 3) that "every application to the court shall, except where it is otherwise expressed, be by summons at chambers."

It is difficult to suppose that the Legislature intended these sub-sections to be applicable to proceedings for relief under section 14. The lessor has a right to bring his action in either division of the Supreme Court. In the present case he has brought it in the Queen's Bench Division. The defendants propose to apply for relief, as the 14th section gives them a right to do in such action. We do not see how the sub-sections requiring applications to be made in chambers in the Chancery Division can be applied to them. So, again, supposing an underlessee were minded—as the section allows him—to apply for relief in an action brought by himself, in such an action his claim must be for relief in the shape of a vesting order, and if he could so claim in an action brought by himself, why should he not, in the lessor's action, counter-claim for relief against the forfeiture sought to be enforced by that action?

We think there is good reason for the contention that the course taken by the defendants is sanctioned by the not too clear language of the enactments. The vesting order mentioned in the 4th section of the Act of 1892 is a novel form of relief expressly given by that section, and that section points to the necessity of the application for that form of relief being made in an action—whether such action be brought by the lessor for possession or by the underlessee for the purpose of claiming relief. The Legislature could scarcely have contemplated the bringing of an action by the underlessee for the mere purpose of enabling him to make an application at chambers, and we do not think there is any objection to the course adopted by the underlessees in this case who desire to have the important link in their title placed on record if the court thinks fit to grant the vesting order claimed.

In Ruttledge v. Whelan, 10 L. R. Ir., before Palles, C.B., and Fitzgerald, B., in a lessor's action for possession the court refused a motion for relief from right of re-entry under section 14 of the Act of 1881, upon the ground that the defendants' proper course was to have filed a counter-claim seeking equitable relief. We do not feel called upon to determine whether or not application for relief might, after action brought, be made by motion or summons as well as by counter-claim, as to which see In re Peach, North, J., 33 SOLICITORS' JOURNAL, 575. Nor do we feel it necessary to our decision in the present case to discuss any of the various enactments, orders, and rules mentioned and referred to in the arguments addressed to us other than those we have discussed. They do not, in our opinion, materially assist us to determine the sole question before us—viz., whether the defence and counter-claim ought to be struck out: the one because it discloses no defence, the other because it is embarrassing and inconvenient. We think they ought not. See The Attorney General of the Duchy of Lancaster v. London and North-Western Railway Co., [1892] 3 Ch. 274. They are pleaded bonâ fide, and in our judgment are warranted by the statute of 1892.

We therefore dismiss the summons with costs.

Summons dismissed.

(a.) Reported by JOHN P. MELLOR, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 63), in satisfaction of a debt owing to them.

An application was then made by the liquidator of the hotel company under the winding up to the county court judge for an order declaring the transfer void on the ground that it was a fraudulent preference within section 164 of the Companies Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 89).

The county court judge held that it was not a fraudulent preference, inasmuch as the transfer was void as being made by the manager without the authority of the hotel company. But the transfer being void, he made the order appealed from.

The material sections of the Companies (Winding-up) Act provides as follows:—

By section 1, sub-section 3, it is enacted that "where the amount of the capital of a company paid up or credited as paid up does not exceed £10,000, and the registered office of the company is situate within the jurisdiction of a county court having jurisdiction under this Act" as provided in sub-section 1, "a petition to wind up the company or to continue the winding up of the company under the supervision of the court shall be presented to that county court."

By sub-section 6: "Every court having jurisdiction under this Act to wind up a company shall, for the purposes of that jurisdiction, have all the powers of the High Court."

Yate Lee, for the appellants.—The county court judge had no jurisdiction to make an order of this kind, which decides a question of title as to property arising out of a transaction which took place previously to the winding up. There was a specific enactment in bankruptcy giving such jurisdiction to county courts (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52, s. 102, sub-section 1), but not in the Winding-up Act.

Muir Mackenzie, for the liquidator.—I rely on the on the 98th section of the Companies Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 89), by which jurisdiction is given to "cause the assets to be collected and applied in discharge of its liabilities," extended to county courts by the Act of 1890, and upon section 13 of the latter Act and rule 90 made under it, which in effect is similar to section 50 of the Bankruptcy Act of 1883, and provides that the liquidator shall apply to the court to enforce the acquisition of property. The county court judge found out that the wine in question was, in point of fact, an asset of the hotel company.

He referred to In re Liverpool and London Guarantee and Accident Insurance Co., Mason and Others' case, 30 W. R. 378; In re Civil Service and General Stores, 57 L. J. Ch. 119, 36 W. R. Dig. 42. [CAVE, J.—The point as to jurisdiction was not taken in either of those cases.] In re Inns of Court Hotel Co., L. R. 6 Eq. 82, 16 W. R. Dig. 65.

CAVE, J.—In this case I have been asked by my lord to give my opinion first, as it is a matter with which I am, perhaps, especially familiar. It appears to me to be quite clear that the county court judge had no jurisdiction to make the order appealed against. An application was made to him to declare that the transfer of this wine was a fraudulent preference. A question was raised in the course of the argument as to whether he had any jurisdiction to hear that application. But it is not necessary to decide that, and I do not propose to express any opinion upon the point. Now the learned county court judge came to the conclusion that the manager had no authority to make it, and that there was therefore no valid transfer of the wine. He consequently directed the wine to be given up.

The question is whether the judge had jurisdiction to make that order. Under the Bankruptcy Act of 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 102, sub-section 1, the judge of the High Court in Bankruptcy has authority to make such orders as this. So has the county court judge within certain limits; he may entertain such questions where the amount in dispute does not exceed £200. But that jurisdiction is subject to an appeal to the High Court on questions both of law and of fact. So that the whole circumstances may come before the High Court, and the jurisdiction is subject also to a limit.

But under the Winding-up Acts, things are altogether different. In the first place, there is nothing to be found approaching, in wideness of scope, to the sections of the Bankruptcy Act to which I have referred. Then, again, section 98 of the Companies Act, 1862, is simply a general statement of the powers which the court is to have of collecting and applying the assets. Where there is no dispute obviously the official liquidator will take possession of and distribute the assets. But that is quite consistent with the view that the Legislature has not given the jurisdiction to county courts which has been exercised here. The functions of the court are necessarily administrative, and unless an intention to give such power to the court as has been exercised here is to be clearly gathered from the Acts, it cannot be assumed. In my opinion no such intention can be extracted from the Acts—and the other sections which have been referred to are all of them capable of being construed without giving to the court such extensive powers. What would be the consequences of the opposite view? The county court judge would then have power in cases of dispute to entertain a jurisdiction without any limit whatever between the company and another party, and there would be no appeal from his decision, except on questions of law, even though it might involve a matter of £20,000. It could not have been the intention of the Legislature to create such a state of things as that, so careful as it has been to limit the jurisdiction of the county courts in other matters, a state of things which would give him a jurisdiction not possessed by any judge of the High Court. I am of opinion, therefore, for these reasons, that the appeal must be allowed with costs.

Upon the appointment of new trustees by the court the common form of vesting order in the case of Government stock is to be adhered to, which vests in the trustees the right to call for the transfer of the same, and to receive the dividends due and to accrue due thereon, and which further directs the trustees to transfer the same "into their own names," but if in any particular case a judge thinks it proper to depart from the usual form, and to make a special order, it is perfectly competent for him to do so.

Motion.

This was a motion for an order directing the Governor and Company of the Bank of England to act upon and in accordance with an order made in this matter, and dated the 15th of May, 1893. Prior to the date of the said order J. Sharp and W. M. Gregson were the trustees of a certain indenture of settlement, dated the 9th of August, 1848, and were as such trustees jointly entitled to a sum of £2,135 4s. 7d. 2¾ per Cent. Consols standing in their names, that being the fund then subject to the settlement upon a trust within the meaning of the Lunacy Act, 1890. William May and Mary Garbett were beneficially interested in the said fund. W. M. Gregson was a person of unsound mind not so found by inquisition, and upon the petition of the beneficiaries and of J. Sharp and H. Garbett, Kay, L.J., made the order in chambers of the 15th of May, 1893, appointing H. Garbett trustee of the settlement of the 9th of August, 1848, in substitution for the said W. M. Gregson, and he ordered that the right to call for the transfer of the said sum of Consols standing in the names of J. Sharp and W. M. Gregson, and to receive any dividends due and to accrue due thereon, should vest in the said J. Sharp and H. Garbett as trustees of the settlement. This order was in the form adopted by the Lords Justices in the case of In re New Zealand Trust & Loan Co., ante, p. 457, [1893] 1 Ch. 403.

The order was lodged with the officials of the Bank of England, but they declined to act upon it unless it was amended by the insertion of the words, "and that they do transfer the same into their own names to be held by them upon the trusts of, &c.," and they further stated that they could not accept the order made in In re New Zealand Trust & Loan Co. as being a general precedent, but only as applying to that particular case. It appeared that it was the intention of the trustees to distribute the fund among the persons entitled thereto, and not to hold it upon the trusts of the settlement. The applicants applied to the court for directions in the matter.

Farwell, Q.C., and Hornell, for the applicants.—This point came before the court in In re New Zealand Trust & Loan Co., but the Bank of England were not concerned in that case. [LINDLEY, L.J.—No, that was a case of shares in a company upon which there was a liability for calls. That made all the difference. I may say that I have been speaking to Kay, L.J., about it. He tells me that his attention was not called to the form of the order, and that he intended to make the usual order. On inquiry it appears to me that these are two totally distinct classes of cases. If the order is intended to be to the effect that the trustees shall hold the stock or shares themselves, then the old form of order is quite right, and there is no reason for departing from it. If, on the other hand, that is not intended (and of course in a case where there is a liability on shares that is not intended), then the other form of order is quite right. On looking at the Trustee Act, 1850, it strikes me that it is perfectly competent for a judge to make an order in either form, and if for any reason he thinks it right to make an order in this form I take it for granted that it would be obeyed; but there was nothing here to call the attention of the Lord Justice to the matter, and he would not have made the order in this form if his attention had been called to it.] Here the trustees do not want to hold the stock. The fund being now divisible under the trust, they desire merely to divide it among the beneficiaries, but inasmuch as one of the trustees is of unsound mind they are obliged to come to the court for an order to make the transfer.

Latham, Q.C., and Howard Wright, for the Bank.—There should be some direction in the order that the trustees should distribute the fund if it is immediately divisible. The order we now ask for has been the only one in use since 1850 in the case of Government stock. It simplifies the book-keeping of the Bank to have the stock transferred into the names of the new trustees before they transfer it. The point has therefore been raised in the public interest, for the more simple the method by which the Bank administers the debt the cheaper it can be done. The order in In re New Zealand Trust & Loan Co. was only intended to apply to that particular case, and not to be a precedent. In that case your lordships were discussing the form of the order in In re Peacock, 28 W. R. 801, 14 Ch. D. 212. Of course, if a judge should make a special order the Bank would obey it, but there was no intention in the present case to depart from the common form. That form contains a direction to the trustees to transfer into their own names: Seton on Decrees, 4th ed., p. 509, 5th ed., vol. 2, pp. 1033 and 1040. In the case of In re Joliffe's Trusts, W. N., 1893, p. 84, Kekewich, J., commented on In re New Zealand Trust & Loan Co., and made a vesting order in respect of Consols according to the form in Seton.

Farwell, Q.C., in reply.—This case is governed by section 136, sub-sections 2, 5, and 6 of the Lunacy Act, 1890, and the order is in accordance with that section. The Bank, relying on its practice since 1850, contends that it can disregard the provisions of the Act of 1890, but if they had wished to preserve their former practice they could have obtained the insertion of a proviso in the Act to that effect. In the case of the death of a man in whose name Consols are standing, the Bank enter in their books the death and the names of the executors, and they could, under an order such as the present, make an entry of the vesting order against the name. In In re New Zealand Trust & Loan Co. the court followed the form given in Tripp's Chancery Forms, p. 222-3, in preference to that in Seton. None of the orders made since that order have directed a transfer into the names of the trustees. Section 139 of the Act of 1890 enables the judge in Lunacy to make declarations and give directions as to the manner in which the right to any stock or chose in action vested under the Act is to be exercised. But it would not be proper for the court to give any directions as to the distribution of the fund on the mere new appointment of a trustee. The order was consequently rightly made.

LINDLEY, L.J.—I will speak to Kay, L.J., about the order, and we will give our decision later.

In the course of the day the judgment of the court was delivered by

LINDLEY, L.J., who said:—In this matter I have inquired of Kay, L.J., and I find that he never intended to make an order departing from the old form; and the order was drawn up in the present form simply by, I think, attaching importance to to what I said in In re New Zealand Trust & Loan Co., (which is a different case) and applying it to ordinary stock, as to which there is no necessity to depart from the common form. Therefore what we propose to do is this. We have ascertained that there are two or three appeals in lunacy upon this question—not more—and we propose to alter the orders back into the old form and date them as of to-day (of course they will be signed), and then it must be understood that if in any particular case a judge thinks right to depart from that old form and make a special order, as Chitty, J., did in In re New Zealand Trust & Loan Co., it is perfectly competent for him to do so. And if the order is so drawn, of course the Bank of England and all other companies must obey the order, but in this particular case, being satisfied that there was no intention to depart from the ordinary form, we will alter the order back into the old form, and date it as of to-day. In similar cases the old form will be adhered to unless the judge sees fit to depart from it. If he does not see fit to depart from it, we shall uphold it as we did before. Mr. Farwell's clients will take their costs out of their own trust fund. I do not think we ought to make the Bank pay costs. I think it was inadvertence really. The new form will be perfectly right when the shares are not paid up. Unless the trustees really intend to become shareholders, and expose themselves to the liability, it is perfectly obvious that the old form must be wrong in such a case; but that is quite another matter, and is not the case upon the motion before us.

Company—Winding up—Syndicate—Opening up of business—Issue of shares as fully paid up—Consideration—Registered contract—Companies Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 89), ss. 8, 38 (4)—Companies Act, 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 131), s. 25.

A company limited by shares registered under the Companies Act, 1862, has no power to issue shares as fully paid up for which no consideration is given. This is so, although the shares are issued under a contract filed in accordance with the provisions of section 25 of the Companies Act, 1867.

The company is not estopped by recitals in the agreement purporting that consideration has been given from showing that there was none.

Appeal from a decision of Wright, J.

The Eddystone Marine Insurance Co. was registered under the Companies Acts on the 14th of September, 1887, with a capital of £20,000 in 200 shares of £100 each. These shares were afterwards subdivided into 1,000 shares of £20 each. The company was a private company, being composed of a small number of persons forming a syndicate. Subsequently it was determined to increase the capital of the company and to invite subscriptions for shares from the outside public. It was arranged as part of the scheme for throwing open the company to the public that 300 shares of £20 each should be allotted as fully paid up to the directors and shareholders, sixteen persons in all, who held all the shares up to that time issued, and constituted the company. Resolutions were passed to carry the arrangement into effect. On the advice of a registration agent it was decided that the shares should be issued under an agreement to be filed in accordance with the provisions of section 25 of the Companies Act, 1867. An agreement was accordingly drawn up, dated the 15th of June, 1888, and made between the company of the one part and the sixteen directors and shareholders of the other part, which recited that the company was indebted to the parties of the second part "for services rendered and expenses incurred" by them in the formation of the company and establishing its business, and that the company (being desirous to remunerate them for such services and expenses) had unanimously passed a special resolution at an extraordinary general meeting, and afterwards confirmed the same, that 300 shares of £20 each, to be credited as fully paid up and free from any liability for such payment, should be allotted to them in the proportions therein set forth (which was to directors and shareholders in the proportion of three to one); and it was agreed that immediately after execution the agreement should be filed with the Registrar of Joint-Stock Companies, pursuant to section 25 of the Companies Act, 1867, and that the company would thereupon issue the shares referred to. The agreement was executed and registered, and the shares were subsequently issued. The shares were, by the evidence, estimated to be of the value of the goodwill of the undertaking and the cash in hand. It did not appear to have been contemplated at first to have a registered agreement at all, and it was with a view to meet the 25th section of the Act of 1867 that such a method of carrying out the plan was employed; in the same way the agreement was drawn in the terms in which it was, purporting that the issue of shares was in consideration of "services rendered," though, in fact, no attempt seemed to have been made to estimate the value of any such services and allot the shares in proportion to such services, nor did it appear that when the "services" were rendered it was with any idea of being thus paid for them.

On the 22nd of November, 1890, a compulsory order in the usual form was made for winding up the company, and the official liquidator placed the names of Messrs. John and Henry Greenway, who were two of the sixteen directors and shareholders to whom the 300 shares as fully paid up were issued, on the list of contributories in respect of such of those shares as had been issued to them. Each certificate for such shares was marked with the word "Bonus." Originally, and at the date of the winding up, Mr. J. Greenway had ten of these shares; Mr. H. Greenway originally had thirty, but at the date of the winding up he had only fifteen, having transferred the other fifteen in 1889. The matter came before the chief clerk on notice to settle the list of contributories. Evidence was filed, and in May, 1892, the chief clerk ordered the cases as to the Messrs. Greenway to be placed in the list of witness actions for trial as quasi-test cases.

Wright, J., held that there had been nothing which could be treated as consideration given for the shares, and that the names were properly placed upon the list of contributories.

Messrs. Greenway appealed.

Neville, Q.C., and G. Henderson, for the appellants.—The issue of fully paid-up shares, such as has been made here, is valid, there having been a registered contract, whether there is consideration for the shares or not. The court cannot go behind the recitals in the agreement and say there was no consideration or no adequate consideration. If the transaction is to be invalidated it must be done by the company applying to have the contract set aside or to make the allottees trustees for the company. The company is estopped by the agreement and the certificates, from saying the shares are not fully paid up.

They referred to Ooregum Gold Mining Co. of India v. Roper, ante, p. 90, [1892] A. C. 125; Spargo's case, 21 W. R. 306, L. R. 8 Ch. App. 407; Henderson v. Bank of Australasia, 37 W. Chadwyck Healey, Q.C., and Younger, for the respondent, were not called on.

June 12.—LINDLEY, L.J.—This case is in some respects a hard one on the appellants, because I quite agree with Wright, J., that everything that has been done in this case has been done openly and honestly and bonâ fide. There is no attempt to conceal, or to take anybody in, or anything of the kind.

Now the question is whether what has been done is authorized by the Act of Parliament which relates to limited companies. This was a small company—what is called a private company—that is to say, the persons who composed it were not numerous, but there were some fifteen or sixteen of them. They did not contemplate appealing to the public to take up a large issue of shares, and they came to the conclusion that they all might have some paid-up shares for nothing. They resolved by special resolution, which was duly confirmed, to give each other, and to allot to each other, fully paid-up shares for nothing. I say distinctly for nothing, because, having gone through the correspondence and seen how the expression "in consideration of services" got into the agreement, it is obviously a mere blind. There is nothing dishonest in that that I know of, but can it be done? Having passed those resolutions, these gentlemen, the directors, allot, and the other shareholders accept, shares in this company which purport to be fully paid-up shares, and for which nothing has been paid. Now unfortunately the company has got into liquidation, and the liquidator finds these gentlemen registered as shareholders in respect of these shares, which purport to be fully paid up. He looks into it and says, "They are not paid up at all. Therefore pay up." They say, "We are not liable to pay up because these shares have been allotted to us as fully paid in consideration," as it is expressed, "of services." I put the services out of the question. I treat it as a simple proposition of law, new, so far as I know, in detail, but I do not say new in principle. Can a limited company give its members fully paid-up shares for nothing, so that when the company is wound up those shareholders are not liable to pay calls in respect of those shares? It is a simple question, and so far as I know (I have had a great deal of experience in these things) I do not think it has ever come before the court—I mean the decision in that simple naked form.

Now the answer to that question of law, to my mind, is as clear as the sun at noonday, and it is, It cannot be done. It is contrary to the Act of Parliament. To make that out we must look, not at the Companies Act, 1867, but we must go behind that, and beyond that, to the Companies Act of 1862, and see what it is that a shareholder in a company becomes liable to do, when he takes shares.

The sections which are important are section 8 and section 38 (4). When a man takes shares in a company—I do not care whether limited or unlimited—what is his liability? His liability is upon winding up to contribute in proportion to his share, to the liquidation of the debts and expenses of winding up. If it is an unlimited company he must do so to his utmost farthing. If it is a limited company there is a restriction put upon that liability The restriction is expressed in section 38 (4), which says, "In the case of a company limited by shares no contribution shall be required from any member exceeding the amount, if any, unpaid on the shares in respect of which he is liable." Now, pausing there for a moment, if he has paid nothing what is he liable for? Only the nominal amount of the shares he has taken up in the limited company. He must pay it if he has paid less. If he has paid something he must pay the difference. I agree, under the Act of 1862, payment may not have been in cash, for it was decided in a great many cases to the effect that it might have been paid in land, goods, or services. That state of the law led to considerable abuses, which are perfectly well known to those who have had much experience in company matters, and the law was altered by the Act of 1867. The Act of 1867 says (section 25) that shares are to be paid up in cash, unless it is otherwise agreed by a registered agreement. But the Act of 1867 does not affect the liability to pay in some shape or other. You must pay. The liability to pay is imposed, not by the Act of 1867, but by the Act of 1862. The difficulty here is that nothing has been paid, and although there is an agreement registered to the effect that nothing shall be paid, that is contrary to the Act of Parliament. That is the whole solution of this case.

I do not propose to refer to the authorities, because, although the case is new in point of detail, it is covered in point of principle by a string of authorities.

The leading case is, after all, Trevor v. Whitworth, 36 W. R. 145, 12 App. Cas. 409; but the later case of Ooregum Gold Mining Co. of India v. Roper, which shows that you cannot issue shares at a discount so that a person taking shares at a discount is not liable to pay the proportion of the shares which has not been paid, is conclusive to show that if you paid nothing at all you must pay in full. To my mind the case is as plain as plain can be. Mr. Henderson has argued that some proceedings must be taken to get rid of the contract. But if once you arrive at the solution that this stipulation about payment up in full was ultrà vires, the company cannot be estopped by putting into the document an untruth. You cannot estop a company from saying that it is acting ultrà vires, in that way. That would be evading the law in every possible view. I have no doubt that the decision is right, though I think it is hard upon these gentlemen, who did not know the law, and thought they were keeping on the right side, and found they were on the wrong side.

The appeal must be dismissed, with costs.

LOPES, L.J.—It appears to me that this case is an easy case, if, as I think, that which took place was a gift of these paid-up shares. I have come to the conclusion that, in truth and in fact, it was nothing more than a mere gift.

Now Mr. Neville boldly asserted that paid-up shares might be given in the way that these were given to directors or to shareholders. Now I cannot think that that is good law. Mr. Buckley, in his treatise on companies, speaking of the limited liability Acts, describes them in this way:—"The dominant and cardinal principle of these Acts is that the investor shall purchase immunity from liability beyond a certain limit." How? "On these terms, that there shall be and remain a liability up to that limit." Now how can that liability be got rid of? It appears to me that that may be answered by reading a few lines from the judgment of Lord Halsbury in the case of Ooregum Gold Mining Co. of India v. Roper, where he says: "The whole structure of a limited company owes its existence to the Act of Parliament, and it is to the Act of Parliament one must refer to see what are its powers, and within what limit it is free to act. Now confining myself for the moment to the Act of 1862"—I think it is not necessary to go beyond that Act for the purpose of deciding this case which we have now before us—"Now confining myself for a moment to the Act of 1862, it makes one of the conditions of the limitation of liability that the memorandum of association shall contain the amount of capital with which the company proposes to be registered divided into shares of a certain fixed amount. It seems to me that the system thus created by which the shareholder's liability is to be limited by the amount unpaid upon his shares, renders it impossible for the company to depart from that requirement, and by any expedient to arrange with their shareholders that they shall not be liable for the amount unpaid on the shares." Now it seems to me that that passage is a complete answer to this case. The only other point that was made was with regard to the estoppel, which has been dealt with by Lindley, L.J., and I entirely agree with what has been said by him on that subject, that in the circumstances of this case there is no estoppel.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The issue of fact in my judgment had to be tried by Wright, J., and he was perfectly right in coming to the conclusion that these shares had been given by the company to the Messrs. Greenway, and that there were no services rendered or expenses incurred as consideration for which those shares were given to these gentlemen. With regard to that conclusion of fact I think he is quite right. Now what is the result? After the case of Ooregum Gold Mining Co. of India v. Roper the matter is unarguable, as it is seems to me, because in that case their lordships said the company could not issue to shareholders shares at a discount, or in other words could not issue to shareholders £1 shares when only 15s. was paid. If they cannot do that I suppose they cannot issue to a shareholder a £1 share with nothing paid. Therefore these two gentlemen are liable. They are liable to be placed on the list of contributories, which is as good as a call on these shares, on which nothing in fact has been paid. I think the judgment of my brother right, and I agree with him.

Appeal dismissed.

Adjourned summons.

This was a summons taken out under the Vendor and Purchaser Act, 1874, by the Marquis of Ailesbury asking for a declaration that he had power under section 20 of the Settled Land Act, 1882, to convey the Savernake Estate, which he had contracted to sell to Lord Iveagh discharged from two several jointure rent-charges of £1,000 and £500 a year created in favour of Maria, Marchioness of Ailesbury, by indentures dated the 19th of August, 1833, and the 21st of January, 1836, respectively, and also from a similar charge of £3,000 a year created in favour of Lady Evelyn Riddell by an indenture dated the 3rd of January, 1863. This last-mentioned rent-charge had upon the second marriage of Lady Evelyn Riddell been settled so that she was restrained from anticipation in respect of it.

By an indenture of settlement dated the 13th of July, 1826, the Savernake Estate was limited to such uses as Charles, Marquis of Ailesbury, and George, afterwards Marquis of Ailesbury, should jointly appoint, with remainder in default of appointment to the use of Charles, Marquis of Ailesbury, for life, with powers of jointuring a future wife, with remainders over. The rent-charges in favour of Maria, Marchioness of Ailesbury, were created in exercise of those powers. By an indenture of settlement dated the 10th of May, 1837, the estate was in exercise of the joint power of appointment reserved by the indenture of the 13th of July, 1826, and subject to the jointure rent-charges, limited to the use of Charles, Marquis of Ailesbury, for life, with remainder to George, Marquis of Ailesbury, for life, with remainder to the use of his first and other sons in tail male, with remainder to the use of Ernest, afterwards Marquis of Ailesbury, for his life, with remainder to his first and other sons in tail male. George John Brudenell Bruce was the eldest son of Ernest, Marquis of Ailesbury, and the estate tail so limited to him was duly barred and resettled by the said indenture of the 3rd of January, 1863.

By this indenture, which was the settlement made upon the marriage of the said G. J. B. Bruce (the father of the present Lord Ailesbury) with Lady Evelyn Riddell (then Lady Evelyn Craven) the Savernake Estate was, subject to certain charges, limited, among other uses, to the use of Ernest, Lord Ailesbury, for life, with remainder to the use of G. J. B. Bruce for life, with remainders to uses to secure the said jointure rent-charge of £3,000 a year to Lady Evelyn for her life, with remainder to the first son of G. J. B. Bruce, in tail male.

G. J. B. Bruce died in 1868, leaving the present marquis, his only son, and he in 1884 converted his estate tail into a base fee, which by a disentailing deed, dated the 25th of June, 1885, he enlarged into a fee simple. By an indenture dated the 16th of July, 1885, the estate was limited among other uses to the use of Ernest, Lord Ailesbury, for life in restoration of his former life estate under the settlement of 1836, with remainder to the use of the present Lord Ailesbury, with remainders over. Ernest, Lord Ailesbury, died in 1886.

In June, 1891, the present marquis, as tenant for life, contracted under the Settled Land Acts, 1882-1890, to sell the Savernake Estate to Lord Iveagh. Clause 3 of the contract provided that "the vendor shall . . . apply to the court under the provisions in that behalf of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, for the discharge of all incumbrances having priority to the settlement of the Ailesbury estates under which the vendor is tenant for life, and the persons entitled to which shall not consent in writing to concur in the conveyance to the purchaser, and shall bear the expense of and incidental to and consequent on every such application."

Lady Evelyn Riddell had applied to the court by summons to remove her restraint on anticipation, but Lord Iveagh was not a party to those proceedings, and Stirling, J., directed the matter to stand over to give Lord Iveagh an opportunity of considering his position. The Marquis of Ailesbury was unwilling to apply to the court under the Conveyancing Act, 1881, but insisted that he was able to make a good title without having recourse to the court, and he thereupon took out this summons.

Buckley, Q.C., and T. Cyprian Williams, for Lord Ailesbury.—Under section 2, sub-section 1, of the Settled Land Act, 1882, a settlement is created by an instrument, or any number of instruments, whether made before or after, or partly before or partly after, the commencement of the Act under or by virtue of which any land stands for the time being limited to or in trust for any persons by way of succession. Here the settlement is created by the whole series of deeds, beginning with the deed of the 13th of July, 1826, and ending with that of the 16th of July, 1885. Lord Ailesbury is the tenant for life in possession (section 2, sub-section 4), and can, therefore, under section 20, sub-sections 1 and 2 convey the estate to Lord Iveagh free from the jointure rent-charges for which the purchase-money arising from the land will become a security in the place of the land, under section 22, sub-sections 5 and 6, and section 24, sub-section 4. Under section 31, sub-section 1 (vi.), which enables a tenant for life to enter into a contract to do any act for carrying into effect any of the purposes of the Act, he may enter into an arrangement with a jointress, if necessary, to enable him to dispose of the land. The case comes within the letter, and is in accordance with the spirit and policy of the Act as explained in Bruce v. Marquis of Ailesbury, ante, p. 318, [1892] A. C. 356. The object of the Act is to enable the tenant for life to sell every estate in the land so as to give clear possession to the purchaser. Every interest in the land is included in the sale, and every instrument creating an interest or imposing a fetter on the land is included in the settlement: section 3, sub-section 1. The tenant for life can grant leases in priority to jointures: sections 6, 7, 8. The court will give the widest construction possible to the word "settlement" in order to carry into effect the intention of the Act. If the deed of 1826 forms part of this settlement all the jointures are interests under the settlement and not prior to it, and Lord Ailesbury can, therefore, make a good title and complete the sale which is for the benefit of all concerned.

Spencer Butler, for Lord Iveagh.—The contention that all instruments effecting a settlement, however old they may be, are part of the same settlement is surprising, and even revolutionary. The definition of a settlement in the Act of 1882 is substantially the same as the definition in the Leases and Sales of Settled Estates Acts, 1856 and 1877. The jointure must either be an interest in land or an incumbrance. If the jointress is not to be looked upon as having a life interest concurrent with that of the tenant for life, she must be an incumbrancer with a charge on land prior to his interest. [STIRLING, J.—Under section 2, sub-section 4, of the Act of 1882 the determination of the question whether land is settled or not must be governed by the state of facts, and the limitations of the settlement at the time that the settlement takes effect.] If the Act is read in the way contended for there never could be any estate taking precedence of the settlement. In cases under sections 2 and 4 of the Succession Duty Act, 1853, the courts have held that a disposition of property takes effect once, and once only: In re Lovelace's Settlement, 7 W. R. 575, 4 De G. & J. 340; In re Barker, 7 H. & N. 109, 10 W. R. C. L. Dig. 85. The word "incumbrance," which, according to the definition in section 2 (vii.) of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, includes a charge of a portion, annuity, or other capital or annual sum, would clearly include a jointure rent-charge; and section 5 of that Act contains a provision for the discharge of incumbrances on the sale of land upon payment into court of money sufficient to meet such incumbrances. Lord Iveagh could no doubt by that means get a good title, but it would not be according to the contract, which provides for completion in six weeks' time and gives the purchaser the right to rescind if there is delay caused by anyone but himself. Should the settlement be held to be the compound settlement that is contended for, trustees of it will have to be appointed, and delay will be caused thereby. Section 20, sub-section 2, which provides that the deed executed by a tenant for life to give effect to a sale shall operate subject to all estates, interests, and charges having priority to the settlement, is against the theory of the compound settlement. Under section 2, sub-section 5, a tenant for life is the person for the time being under a settlement beneficially entitled to possession of settled land for his life; but Lord Ailesbury is not so entitled under the settlements by which the jointures were created, and has, therefore, no power to convey the estates freed from those jointures. [STIRLING, J.—If there is this compound settlement, trustees of it must be appointed to receive the money. Should the trustees of the settlement of July, 1885, consent to act as trustees of such compound settlement, if I hold that there is one, the matter might be carried out. Sir R. Cust.—I have no instructions as to that.] Lord Iveagh considers that there has already been unreasonable delay, which is causing inconvenience to the persons interested in the estate. Tenants want reductions of rent, and as neither the receiver nor anyone else can give such reductions they are throwing up their farms. If an order cannot now be made which will protect Lord Iveagh he will have to consider whether he will exercise his option to rescind or bring an action for specific performance.

Sir Reginald Cust, for the trustees of the settlement of 1885.—On a sale under the Act all the charges on the estate are not ipso facto transferred to the purchase-money. If a jointress releases her jointure both the estate and the purchase-money are freed. Lord Ailesbury is tenant for life under the settlement of 1885; under the settlement of 1863 he was tenant in tail, and that settlement came to an end on the death of Ernest, Marquis of Ailesbury. The question is under which settlement he acquired power to sell as tenant for life. He did so under the deed of 1885, only, for at most the former settlements impose fetters on the land, and are not instruments under which the estate stands limited by way of succession. A tenant for life cannot do more than trustees for sale could have done. Section 21, sub-section 2, does not imply a power to sell free from incumbrances. Section 22 deals merely with wills under the particular settlement. Section 31 is only auxiliary to the powers given by the Act, and gives no fresh powers. The power to make contracts is introduced as a protection in case the tenant for life should die before completion. It will be difficult to protect the jointresses unless the money is paid into court.

Vernon R. Smith, for Captain Riddell and the trustees of his settlement.

Williams, in reply.—A tenant for life within the Act of 1882 is, under section 2, sub-section 7, of that Act, to be deemed to be such notwithstanding that under the settlement or otherwise the settled land or his estate and interest therein is incumbered or charged. He can displace a charge or incumbrance though he could not displace an estate of freehold. [STIRLING, J.—Is there any definition of what is a charge in the Act of 1882?] No, but the policy of the Act is to enable a tenant for life, for the purpose of carrying out a sale, to displace interests prior to his own which are only interests in a limited part of the rents of the land. The interest of a jointress is such an interest; she does not take concurrently with the tenant for life. It was the intention of the contract that the vendor should apply to the court for the discharge of any incumbrances which he could not get rid of himself.

STIRLING, J., after stating the facts, continued:—Section 20 of the Settled Land Act of 1882 provides in sub-section 1 that, "on a sale . . . the tenant for life may, as regards land sold . . . convey . . . the same by deed for the estate or interest the subject of the settlement to the uses and in manner requisite for giving effect to the sale"; and according to sub-section 2, "such a deed . . . is effectual to pass the land conveyed . . . discharged from all the limitations, powers, and provisions of the settlement, and from all estates, interests, and charges subsisting or to arise thereunder, but subject to and with the exception of (1) all estates, interests, and charges having priority to the settlement." Now, in order to ascertain what is the power of the tenant for life under that section, and the effect of the deed executed by him in pursuance of such power, it is necessary to determine what constitutes "the settlement" within the meaning of the section. This is to be ascertained from section 2, the definition clause, the material sub-sections of which are as follows:—Sub-section 1.—"Any deed . . . or other instrument or any number of instruments, whether made before or after the commencement of this Act, under or by virtue of which instrument or instruments any land or any estate or interest in land stands for the time being limited to or in trust for any persons by way of succession, creates, or is for the purpose of this Act a settlement, and is in this Act referred to as a settlement or as the settlement, as the case requires." Sub-section 3.—"Land and any estate or interest therein which is the subject of a settlement is for the purposes of this Act settled land." Sub-section 4.—"The determination of the question whether land is settled land for the purposes of this Act or not is governed by the state of facts and the limitations of the settlement at the time of the settlement taking effect." Sub-sections 1 and 3 are in substance taken from the Settled Estates Act of 1856 (19 & 20 Vict. c. 120, s. 17), under which it was held by the Court of Appeal in In re Birtles' Settled Estates, 11 W. R. 739, decided in 1863, that in determining the question whether or not an estate was to be treated as settled for the purposes of that Act, regard was to be paid to the state of facts existing at the time when the provisions of the Act were sought to be put in operation, and not to that which existed at the date of the settlement. This led to the passing in 1864 of an enactment substantially identical with sub-section 4. The enactments embodied in sub-sections 1, 3, and 4 were repeated in the Settled Estates Act of 1877, section 2. It plainly appears, therefore, that the Legislature intended that the powers conferred by the Settled Estates Acts should be applicable in cases where the land was settled at the time of the settlement taking effect, even though most of the limitations might be spent at the time when the exercise of those powers was invoked. The Settled Land Act, 1882, contains analogous enactments, expressed in almost identical language, and it seems right to attribute to the Legislature a like intention with respect to them, unless there is discovered something in the nature of the provisions of the Act to prevent such a conclusion from being arrived at. It has been established by the decision of the House of Lords in this very case (see Bruce v. Marquis of Ailesbury), that the Settled Land Act of 1882 is founded on a broader policy and has a wider scope than the Settled Estates Acts. In the Settled Land Act it is said the wellbeing of settled land is the paramount object, in the Settled Estates Acts the interests only of the persons interested under the settlement.

There is nothing therefore in the scope of the Settled Land Act which would lead one to suppose that the powers conferred by that Act were to be applied within a narrower ambit than those conferred by the Settled Estates Acts. On the contrary, it tends to the well-being of settled land, and is for the benefit of those interested in it under the settlement that the persons vested with the powers conferred by the Act should be able to give a title to the land, and not merely to some limited estate or interest in it. The machinery, however, of the Settled Land Act differs from that of the Settled Estates Acts, as does also the mode in which that machinery is put in operation. Under the Settled Land Act the powers are given directly to the tenant for life of the settled land, as defined by section 2, sub-section 5, and section 58. Under the Settled Estates Act of 1877 (as under the previous Acts) the powers are to be exercised by the court upon the application (see section 23) of any person entitled to the possession or receipt of the rents and profits of the settled estate for a term of years determinable on his death, or for an estate for life or any greater estate. Regard being had to this difference of language, it may well be that a person entitled to apply to the court under the Settled Estates Acts is not vested with the powers of a tenant for life under the Settled Land Act.

The conclusion at which I arrive is that, though the question whether land is settled land or not is to be determined under both sets of Acts by the state of facts and the limitations of the settlement at the time when the settlement takes effect, the provisions of the Settled Land Act may cease to be applicable when the limitations have been exhausted to an extent which would not prevent recourse being had to the powers of the Settled Estates Act. Now on the 16th of July, 1885, there was executed an instrument, operating inter vivos, under which the Savernake Estate became limited to various persons by way of succession. It was not, however, the only instrument under which at that date the estate stood so limited. There then existed, under and by virtue of the settlement of 1863, the life estate of Ernest, Marquis of Ailesbury, and the rent-charge of Lady Evelyn Riddell. I think that the deeds of the 3rd of January, 1863, and the 16th of July, 1885, are instruments under which (in the language of section 2, sub-section 1) the Savernake Estate, at the date of the latter deed, stood limited to various persons by way of succession, and together created or were a settlement for the purposes of the Settled Land Act. This being so, the powers of the Settled Land Act will be exercisable as regards the estate which forms the subject of the settlement effected by those two instruments, provided there is under that settlement an existing tenant for life within the meaning of the Act. I think the present Marquis of Ailesbury is such. If on the 16th of July, 1885, the Savernake Estate had been vested in Ernest, Marquis of Ailesbury, in fee simple, and had by the deed of that date been for the first time limited to the use of Ernest, Marquis of Ailesbury, for life, with remainder to the present marquis for life, with remainders over, it was admitted (and in my opinion rightly admitted) at the bar that (subject to a question with which I shall presently deal) after the death of Ernest, Marquis of Ailesbury, the present marquis would have been a tenant for life capable of exercising the powers of the Settled Land Act, and, consequently, of conveying the estate under section 20 free from the jointure of Lady Evelyn Riddell; and in my opinion he is equally tenant for life under the settlement constituted by the two instruments of 1863 and 1885.

It was suggested, however, that the present Marquis of Ailesbury was not the sole tenant for life for the purposes of the Act, but that he and Lady Evelyn Riddell together constituted such tenant for life. Sub-section 5 of section 2 provides that the person who is for the time being under a settlement beneficially entitled to possession of settled land for his life is for the purposes of the Act the tenant for life of that land, and, sub-section 6, that if in any case there are two or more persons so entitled as tenants in common, or as joint tenants, or for other concurrent estates or interests, they together constitute the tenant for life for the purposes of the Act. The marquis is beneficially entitled to possession or—see sub-section 10 (i.)—receipt of the profits of the Savernake Estate; but it is said that Lady Evelyn by virtue of her jointure is so entitled for a concurrent estate or interest. I think, however, that so long as her rent-charge remains paid (as I understand it to have been down to the present time) she has merely a charge on the settled land, and not an estate or interest concurrent with that of the marquis. It follows, therefore, that the marquis can convey under section 20 of the Settled Land Act, 1882, discharged from the jointure of Lady Evelyn Riddell.

I now turn to consider whether the marquis can in like manner convey the estate discharged from the jointure of Maria, Marchioness of Ailesbury. As to this I have not so complete information, but, so far as I can ascertain, the title appears to stand as follows. [His lordship referred to the state of the title, and continued:—] It appears, therefore, that the life estate to which Ernest, Marquis of Ailesbury, was entitled on the 16th of July, 1885, was first created by the deed of the 10th of May, 1837, which derives its force from the settlement of the 13th of July, 1826, being made in exercise of the joint power thereby reserved. The limitations in the deed of the 10th of May, 1837, take effect as if they were contained in the deed of the 13th of July, 1826. Upon the principles which I have already applied in dealing with Lady Evelyn Riddell's jointure, I think that if what I have stated as to the title be correct, then upon the execution of the deed of the 16th of July, 1885, the Savernake Estate stood limited to uses in favour of various persons by way of succession, under or by virtue of a series of instruments beginning with the deed of the 13th of July, 1826, and ending with that of the 16th of July, 1885; that the present Marquis of Ailesbury is now tenant for life of the settlement created by those instruments, and can, consequently, convey the estate discharged from the jointure rent-charges of Maria, Marchioness of Ailesbury, as well as from that of Lady Evelyn Riddell.

Under section 22, sub-section 1, of the Settled Land Act, 1882, the purchase-money is to be paid either to the trustees of the settlement or into court, at the option of the tenant for life. The Marquis of Ailesbury does not desire that the money should be paid into court, and there are at present no trustees for the purposes of the Settled Land Acts except those nominated by the deed of the 16th of July, 1885. They are trustees only of the settlement created by that deed, and are not trustees of the settlement made by the deeds of 1863 and 1885, still less of that made by the series of instruments beginning in 1826 and ending in 1885. I understand, however, that they do not object to be appointed such trustees; and, if so, I am willing to appoint them on the present application. By section 31, sub-section 3, the court may, on the application of the tenant for life, or of any person interested in any contract, give directions respecting (amongst other things) the carrying into effect thereof. By section 44, if at any time a difference arises between a tenant for life and the trustees of the settlement respecting the exercise of any of the powers of the Act, or any matter relating thereto, the court may, on the application of either party, give directions respecting the matter in difference. It may be thought desirable that under one or other of these clauses I should give directions with respect to the conveyance and the application of the purchase-money. I am therefore willing to declare that Maria, Marchioness of Ailesbury, and Lady Evelyn Riddell are respectively bound by the contract entered into between the present marquis and Lord Iveagh; that the latter is not entitled to require the concurrence of either in the conveyance to him; and that upon the payment of the purchase-money to the trustees of the settlement created by the series of instruments to which I have referred, the income of the investments of such purchase-money will be applicable for payment of the rent-charges of Maria, Marchioness of Ailesbury, and Lady Evelyn Riddel respectively, as the income of the Savernake Estate, if not sold, would have been applicable. And I am further willing to direct such trustees to pay these rent-charges out of such income accordingly.

His lordship then made an order on Lady Evelyn Riddell's summons, removing her restraint on anticipation for the purpose of enabling her consent to the payment off out of the purchase-moneys of certain mortgages to which her jointure had priority.

REG. v. JUDGE OF THE BROMPTON COUNTY COURT AND VAGUE. (a.)

County court—Jurisdiction—Contempt of court—Unqualified person practising before the court—Power to commit to prison—Attorneys and Solicitors Acts, 1843 (6 & 7 Vict. c. 73), ss. 2, 35, 36; and 1860 (23 & 24 Vict. c. 127), s. 26—County Courts Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 43), s. 162.

The judge of a county court has no jurisdiction to make an order committing to prison a person who has acted as a solicitor in an action in his court without being duly qualified so to act, his jurisdiction to imprison for contempt being confined, by section 162 of the County Courts Act, 1888, to contempts committed in the face of the court.

Mandamus calling upon his honour Judge Stonor, the judge of the Brompton County Court, and John Alfred Vague to show cause why the judge should not hear and determine the matter of an application by the Incorporated Law Society for the committal to prison of the said J. A. Vague, under the 26th section of the Attorneys Act, 1860, 23 & 24 Vict. c. 127, for his contempt of court in having acted as a solicitor in an action in the said county court of Burr v. Key, contrary to section 2 of the Attorneys Act, 1843, 6 & 7 Vict. c. 73.

On the 3rd of November, 1892, application (pursuant to notice) was made to the county court judge for an order for the attachment of J. A. Vague on the ground that he had been guilty of the alleged contempt. The judge refused to hear the motion, on the ground that he had no jurisdiction to commit for a contempt which had not occurred in the face of the court as provided by the County Courts Act, 1846, and re-enacted in the County Courts Act, 1888, s. 162, and he thereupon dismissed the application without hearing the evidence contained in the affidavits filed in support of the motion.

The rule nisi for a mandamus was then obtained upon the application of the Incorporated Law Society.

The following enactments were referred to during the argument:—

The Attorneys and Solicitors Act, 1843 (6 & 7 Vict. c. 73), s. 2, which provides that no person shall act as an attorney or solicitor in any court of law in England and Wales unless he shall be "admitted and enrolled and otherwise duly qualified to act as an attorney or solicitor," and section 36, which enacts that an unqualified person who has appeared for any litigant other than himself in a county court shall be incapable of maintaining any action for fees for so appearing, "and such offence shall be deemed a contempt of the court in which such action, suit, or proceeding shall have been prosecuted, carried on, or defended, and shall and may be punished accordingly." This section was repealed by the Statute Law Revision Act, 1874 (No. 2).

The County Courts Act, 1846 (9 & 10 Vict. c. 95), s. 113: "If any person shall wilfully insult the judge or any juror, or any bailiff, clerk, or officer of the said court for the time being during his sitting or attendance in court, or in going to or returning from the court, or shall wilfully interrupt the proceedings of the court or otherwise misbehave in court, it shall be lawful for any bailiff or officer of the court, with or without the assistance of any other person, by the order of the judge, to take such offender into custody, and detain him until the rising of the court, and the judge shall be empowered, if he shall think fit, by a warrant under his hand, and sealed with the seal of the court, to commit any such offender to any prison to which he has power to commit offenders under this Act for any time not exceeding seven days, or to impose upon any such offender a fine not exceeding five pounds for every such offence, and in default of payment thereof to commit the offender to any such prison as aforesaid for any time not exceeding seven days, unless the said fine be sooner paid." This Act was repealed by the County Courts Act, 1888.

The Attorneys and Solicitors Act, 1860 (23 & 24 Vict. c. 127), s. 26: "Every person who acts as an attorney or solicitor contrary to the enactment in section 2 of the first hereinbefore mentioned Act" (the Attorneys and Solicitors Act, 1843), "or who, in his own name, or in the name of any other person, in anywise acts as a proctor in or with respect to any proceeding in the Court of Probate or the Court for Divorce and Matrimonial Causes, without being duly qualified so to act, shall be deemed guilty of a contempt of the court in which the action, suit, cause, matter, or proceeding in relation to which he so acts is brought, had, or taken, and may be punished accordingly, and shall be incapable of maintaining any action or suit for any fee or reward for or in respect of anything done or any disbursement made by him in the course of so acting, and shall, in addition to any other penalty or forfeiture and to any disability to which he may be subject, forfeit and pay for every such offence the sum of fifty pounds, to be recovered, with full costs of suit, by action brought with the sanction of her Majesty's Attorney-General in the name of the Incorporated Law Society in any of the superior courts of law at Westminster, or in any county court, and such penalty shall be applied in like manner as fines imposed for practising without a stamped certificate are now by law applicable."

The County Courts Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 43), s. 5: "Every court held under this Act shall have all the jurisdiction and powers at any time prior to the coming into operation of the County Courts Act, 1846, belonging to any county court for the recovery of debts and demands as altered by this Act throughout the whole district for which it is held"; and section 162, which substantially re-enacts section 113 of the County Courts Act, 1846.

Feb. 9, 10.—Sir Charles Russell, A.G. (Henry Sutton with him), for the county court judge, showed cause against the rule.—The judge of a county court has no jurisdiction to commit a person to prison for contempt of court, except where the contempt has been committed in the face of the court. The powers of the modern county court are defined by statutes commencing with the County Courts Act, 1846, under section 113 of which a limited power to commit for contempt is conferred upon the judge of the court; that section is re-enacted in section 162 of the County Courts Act, 1888. No reference is made in that Act to the contempt of court created by section 26 of the Attorneys and Solicitors Act, 1860, and that section, which expressly refers to the then recently created courts of probate and divorce, is silent as to county courts. There is no inherent jurisdiction in the county court to punish for contempt as there is in the High Court: R. v. Lefroy, 21 W. R. 332, L. R. 8 Q. B. 134; and the jurisdiction conferred upon it by statute does not cover this case.

He also referred to R. v. Jordan, 36 W. R. 589 and 797.

Sir R. E. Webster, Q.C., and Crump, Q.C. (Hollams with them), for the Incorporated Law Society, in support of the rule.—The learned county court judge had jurisdiction. A contempt committed in the face of court has always been punishable by an inferior court of record: Sparks v. Martyn, 1 Vent. 1; R. v. Clement, 4 B. & Ald. 218, at p. 232; Ex parte Pater, 12 W. R. 823, 5 B. & S. 299; R. v. Lefroy, L. R. 8 Q. B., per Quain, J., at p. 140. Ever since the passing of the Attorneys and Solicitors Act, 1843, it has been a statutory contempt of court for an unqualified person to practise in a county court. By section 36 of that Act—a section which relates solely to county courts—such an offence was made punishable as a contempt of court—that is, as a contempt committed in the face of the court was then punishable, by committal to prison for a period which was left to the discretion of the judge. Section 36 of the Attorneys and Solicitors Act, 1843, was repealed by the Statute Law Revision Act, 1874 (No. 2), having been in substance re-enacted by the more general provisions of section 26 of the Attorneys and Solicitors Act, 1860. Section 162 of the County Courts Act, 1888, does not deal exhaustively with the powers of a county court judge to commit for contempt; it deals with committal for contempt in face of the court, and does not touch the jurisdiction as to offences outside the court such as the present, which are made contempt by statute. It is necessary for the protection of suitors that county court judges should have this power. Otherwise, an unqualified person practising in a county court cannot be punished for his contempt; or where the contempt is committed in the county court the High Court has no jurisdiction to punish: In re an Application for an Attachment for Contempt of Court, 2 Times L. R. 351.

Cur. adv. vult.

May 19.—The judgment of the court (Lord HERSCHELL, C.J., and CAVE, J.) was delivered by CAVE, J.—The question in this case is whether a county court judge has power to deal summarily with the contempt of court created by the 26th section of the Solicitors Act, 1860. In order to answer this question the best plan is to follow the course pursued by Sir R. Webster in his ingenious argument, and take a chronological view of the legislation on the subject. The first enactment which deals with the question is the Solicitors Act of 1843, which enacts (section 35): that "from and after the passing of this Act, in case any person shall in his own name, or in the name of any other person, sue out any writ or process, or commence, prosecute, or defend any action or suit, or any proceedings in any court of law or equity, without being admitted and enrolled as aforesaid, or being himself the plaintiff or defendant in such proceedings respectively, every such person shall and is hereby made incapable to maintain or prosecute any action or suit in any court of law or equity for any fee, reward, or disbursement on account of prosecuting, carrying on, or defending any such action, suit, or proceeding, or otherwise in relation thereto, and such offence shall be deemed a contempt of the court in which such action, suit, or proceeding shall have been prosecuted, carried on, or defended, and shall and may be punished accordingly." And (section 36) that "In case any person shall commence or defend any action, or sue out any writ, process, or summons, or carry on any proceedings in the court commonly called the county court, holden in any county in that part of Great Britain called England and Wales, who is not or shall not then be legally admitted an attorney or solicitor according to this Act, or shall not himself be plaintiff or defendant in such proceedings respectively, such person shall and is hereby made incapable to maintain or prosecute any action or suit in any court of law or equity for any fee, reward, or disbursement on account of prosecuting, carrying on, or defending any such action, suit, or proceeding, or otherwise in relation thereto, and such offence shall be deemed a contempt of the court in which such action, suit, or proceeding shall have been prosecuted, carried on, or defended, and shall or may be punished accordingly."

No new jurisdiction in one sense is hereby given to the county court, but a new subject-matter is brought within the range of an old jurisdiction. The elliptical expression "shall and may be punished accordingly" means, when extended, "shall and may be punished as if it were a contempt of court." Now the county court there referred to is the ancient county court. The contempt of court therefore created by the 6 & 7 Vict. c. 73, s. 36, was punishable by indictment. Possibly, though it is not necessary to decide this point, and we should not like to give an opinion without further consideration, it was also punishable summarily by the judge of the court. The ancient county court is, however, extinct, and the present question arises, not with respect to that court, but to the new county courts constituted by the Act of 1846. In Reg. v. Lefroy it was decided that the county court, although an inferior court of record (9 & 10 Vict. c. 95, s. 3), had no power to commit for contempt, except in the cases specially provided for by section 113 of the 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95, now re-enacted by the Act of 1888 (section 162). Sections 35 and 36 of the Solicitors Act, 1843, have been repeated by the Solicitors Act of 1860, s. 26. [His lordship read that section, and continued:—] This enactment, however, only leaves the matter where it stood before. It simply provides that any person who does certain things shall be deemed guilty of a contempt of the court, &c., "and may be punished accordingly"—i.e., as if he were guilty of such contempt. In our judgment such contempt, although punishable by indictment, is not now and never has been punishable summarily in the county court, and the reasoning in Reg. v. Lefroy applies to and governs this case.

The case, in fact, stands thus. In 1846 the Legislature constituted new courts in the place of the ancient county court, and declared such courts to be courts of record. Under these circumstances it became necessary to decide as a matter of policy whether these courts should or should not have the power ordinarily incident to inferior courts of record of punishing by fine and imprisonment, at the discretion of the judge, contempt committed in the face of the court. The Legislature decided, as was held in Reg. v. Lefroy, that it would not entrust such a general and unlimited power to the county court judges, but gave them instead a special jurisdiction to punish by a limited fine or by imprisonment of limited duration certain specified offences, all of which were of the nature of contempts of court. Then came the Solicitors Act of 1860, which provided that certain acts therein specified should be deemed to be contempts of court, and should be punished as if they were such. Contempt of a county court, unless it was one of the acts specified by the Legislature to which a limited fine or imprisonment for a limited period was appropriated, was punishable by indictment, but not summarily. The enactment of 1860 has a perfectly legitimate interpretation if it is taken to mean that such acts committed in a county court shall be punishable by indictment. How, then, can it be necessary or even permissible to construe it as giving to a county court judge, in the case of the acts forbidden by section 26, a general indefinite power to fine and imprison, which the Legislature had in 1846 expressly determined it was not advisable that a county court judge should possess? The argument against assuming such a power to be given is strengthened by the fact that the Legislature has in the 26th section of the Act of 1860 imposed on the offender a limited penalty of £50. It was argued by Sir Richard Webster that it was convenient that the county court judge should have power to deal summarily with these cases, and that it would be often sufficient to order the offender to pay the costs of the proceedings. But the power of the county court judge, if it exists at all, cannot stop there. The argument from convenience is one for the Legislature and not for the judges, and in favour of the liberty of the subject we ought not to hold that an indefinite power to fine or imprison without appeal has been given to the county court judges unless it is quite clear that the Legislature has so intended. We are of opinion that the Legislature has not so intended, and that the learned county court judge was perfectly right in refusing to exercise a jurisdiction which had never been conferred upon him. The rule must be discharged, with costs.

Rule discharged.

PROUD v. PRICE AND OTHERS. (a.)

Ecclesiastical law—Chapel—Pew—Long user—Acts of ownership—Presumption of legal origin—Faculty—Prescription.

In the year 1782 a chapel upon the first floor of a building the ground floor of which was occupied by a school-house was licensed by the bishop of a diocese, and was constituted a perpetual cure and benefice under 1 Geo. 1, stat. 2, c. 10, s. 4, pews being allotted to the subscribers. These pew-holders sold and transferred their seats by entries in the chapel-book. In 1846 the chapel was removed, and a new chapel was erected upon the site of the school-house, which had then been demolished. The circumstances under which the new chapel was erected were such as to warrant the presumption of a conveyance of the site of the school-house for the purposes of the benefice. On the 12*th of February,* 1848, pews in the new chapel were allotted to the holders of pews in the old chapel, and on the 22*nd of February,* 1848, the new chapel was consecrated. These pews, and others which were substituted for them upon the re-pewing and repairing of the chapel under a faculty granted in 1867, were exclusively enjoyed by the persons to whom they were allotted and their successors in title down to the commencement of this action, and were dealt with by them by way of assignment and devise. There was no evidence of the pews having been repaired by these persons. The plaintiff, in whom the rights of the previous holders of three of these pews were vested, brought an action against the vicar and churchwardens of the parish, claiming a declaration that he was entitled to the pews and an injunction to restrain interference by the defendants.

Held, that the evidence did not justify the presumption of a legal origin for the user of the pews, and that the plaintiff could not maintain the action.

Special case stated for the opinion of the court by the parties to an action.

The plaintiff claimed a declaration that he was entitled to the pews numbered 68, 77, and 78, in the chapel of St. Ann's, Bishop Auckland, and an injunction to restrain the defendants—the vicar and churchwardens of the parish in which the chapel was situated—from interfering with the pews.

In the year 1781 a subscription was raised to provide more church accommodation for the inhabitants of the parish of St. Andrew's, Bishop Auckland, and in the following year, by an arrangement with the governors of a free grammar school, a chapel was formed upon the first floor of a building the ground floor of which was used as a school-house. This chapel was not consecrated, but was licensed by the bishop for the performance of Divine worship, and augmented by the Governors of Queen Anne's Bounty, and consequently became in the year 1782 a perpetual cure and benefice under 1 Geo. 1, stat. 2, c. 10, s. 4.

The pews in the chapel were allotted to the subscribers, and there was evidence that the pew-holders sold and transferred their seats by entries in the minute-book of the committee who managed the chapel.

In 1846 the chapel and the school were pulled down, and the site of the school was offered by the governors for the purpose of building a new chapel. The present chapel was erected in that year upon the site of the school-house. No conveyance of the site could be found.

(a.) Reported by T. R. COLQUHOUN DILL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The owners of pews in the old chapel consented to these alterations before they were effected upon the understanding that if the positions of their pews should be interfered with in consequence of the alterations, arrangements should be made to satisfy them.

On the 12th of February, 1848, the pews in the new chapel were allotted to the owners of pews in the old chapel, and on the 22nd of February the new chapel was consecrated upon the petition of the predecessors in title of the plaintiff and others. There was evidence that from that date the pew-holders had dealt with their pews by will and by assignment inter vivos, and had never paid any rent for them.

In 1867 it was proposed to repair and re-pew the chapel, and the original pew-holders (including the plaintiff or his predecessors in title) signed an assent, on condition that it should not in any way prejudice their rights as pew-owners; a faculty was then granted to the vicar and churchwardens of St. Andrew's, on the petition of the plaintiff (then a churchwarden) and others authorizing them to remove the pews and erect new ones and to re-allot the pews, due regard being had to the claims of those who by faculty or prescription were entitled to pews. The pews were so re-allotted, each pew having a door with an interior bolt, and the chapel minute-book contained a "register of the proprietary pews." Ever since then the churchwardens of St. Andrew's had acted as churchwardens of St. Ann's. The three pews in question had come to the plaintiff by assignment or other devolution of title, and had since been exclusively used by the plaintiff and his relatives and friends. It was alleged that one of them, No. 77, which had been exclusively used by a Mrs. Hodgson, through whom the plaintiff claimed, was annexed to the house in which she had resided, which was sold to the plaintiff, and in which he also had lived. The facts upon which that allegation was founded are dealt with in the judgment.

The defendants had petitioned for a faculty to enable them to pull down and remove the pews and substitute chairs, if necessary; they denied that the plaintiff had any private rights in any of the pews.

The plaintiff then brought this action.

A. B. Kempe, for the plaintiff.—The plaintiff is legally entitled to these pews, and the Ordinary, through whom the defendants claim, has no jurisdiction over them. It is clearly shown that these pews have been bought and sold from 1867 onwards, and there is a strong presumption that the same has been the case ever since their allotment in 1848. The plaintiff and his predecessors have had the exclusive enjoyment of these pews since 1848 and of the pews in the old chapel, for which they were substituted, since 1782, and the court ought to presume that that right of enjoyment has a legal origin: Philipps v. Halliday, [1891] A. C. 228, 39 W. R. Dig. 81. Private rights in these three pews may have been reserved when the site of the chapel was conveyed to the use of the benefice, and that would exclude them from the jurisdiction which the Ordinary exercised over the rest of the rest of the chapel: Buxton v. Bateman, Sid. 88; Buzard's case, 2 Rolle Abr., p. 288, par. 6; Churton v. Frewen, L. R. 2 Eq. 634, per Kindersley, V.C., at p. 651; Chapman v. Jones, 17 W. R. 920, L. R. 4 Ex. 273. There may be a freehold in a single seat in a church: Freem v. Dane, Skinner, 33. A grant of the freehold of these seats to the plaintiff's predecessors in title ought to be presumed, whether such a grant is probable or not: Bryant v. Foot, 16 W. R. 808, L. R. 3 Q. B. 497, at p. 508. In the case of pew No. 77 it has been exclusively enjoyed by the owner of a particular house ever since 1848, and the court must presume that a faculty has at some time been granted annexing the pew to the house: Halliday v. Philips, 37 W. R. 776, 23 Q. B. D. 48, at p. 57; Rogers v. Brooks, 1 T. R. 431n. Again, such a right to the user of a pew as annexed to a house is an easement. We have had twenty years' enjoyment of it, and are within the rule in Dalton v. Angus, 30 W. R. 191, 6 App. Cas. 740. The question whether a right to a pew is within section 2 of the Prescription Act (2 & 3 Will. 4, c. 71) was considered in Crisp v. Martin, 2 P. D. 15, but not decided. The continuous user of these pews by the plaintiff and his predecessors in title may be due to a legal origin in any of the ways suggested, and it is the duty of the court to presume such an origin.

F. L. Errington, for the defendant.—As to pew No. 77, Philipps v. Halliday decides that mere possession is not sufficient to support a presumption of a lost faculty, there must also be repairs and other such acts of ownership. Even renewing the linings and cushions of a pew were said by Sir John Nicholl in Pettman v. Bridger, 1 Phil., at p. 331, to be in no degree inconsistent with the fact of the pews belonging to the parish. The evidence that this pew was annexed to Mrs. Hodgson's house is insufficient, and it is improbable that it was so appropriated in the year 1848, for Sir John Nicholl in Butt v. Jones, (1829) 2 Hag. Eccl., at p. 425, says that the practice of appropriating pews to houses "is become quite obsolete and injurious." It is impossible to believe that the freeholds of these pews were reserved when the grant of the site of the chapel was made by the governors of the grammar school. A freehold interest in the nave of a church cannot be held by a private person. Any rights which the pew-holders may have had before the consecration of the chapel in 1848 were reduced at the moment of the consecration to mere easements: 3 Salk. 85; Corven's case, Coke Rep. pt. 12, 105; Hinde v. Chorlton, 15 W. R. 226, L. R. 2 C. P. 104; Brumfitt v. Roberts, 18 W. R. 678, L. R. 5 C. P. 224. Crisp v. Martin is a clear authority that a pew is not an easement within section 2 of 2 & 3 Will. 4 c. 71, neither does the rule in Dalton v. Angus apply to pews.

Kempe replied.

WILLS, J.—The question here is whether the plaintiff has any right to pews 68, 78, and 77 in the chapel of St. Ann's, Bishop Auckland, as against the Ordinary who, it may be assumed for the purposes of this case, is willing to grant a faculty for the re-pewing of the church. There can, therefore, be no question of possessory right, which, being a right referable to the consent of the Ordinary or of the churchwardens as his officers, cannot prevail against the Ordinary—a proposition which I take to be elementary. It is suggested that the plaintiff can claim as the owner in fee of the plots of land occupied by the pews, a reservation of those plots in the original grant of the land on which the church was built being, as it is said, to be presumed in order to account for the practice, which has prevailed, of the assignment of the pews from 1846, when the present church was built, downwards. The same state of things has prevailed with respect to between thirty and forty other pews in the church. The present church was built in 1846. Up to that time the only chapel was a room on the first floor of a building then pulled down. The holders of pews in the chapel on the first floor obviously had no rights in respect of the ground floor, which was then occupied as a school. The chapel on the first floor came into existence as a chapel in 1782. It was not consecrated, but merely licensed by the bishop for the performance of Divine worship. In the same year a grant of an augmentation in favour of the chapel was made by the Governors of Queen Anne's Bounty, and it was thereupon, by virtue of 1 Geo. 1, stat. 2, c. 10, s. 4, constituted a perpetual cure and benefice, and the minsters thereof and their successors were made bodies politic and corporate with a perpetual succession.

Under the circumstances set out in paragraph 18 of the case, a conveyance for the purposes of the benefice of the site of the chapel ought to have been executed on or about the 5th of September, 1846. It clearly ought to be presumed. Such a conveyance would be either to the vicar of St. Andrew's, the mother church, or to the perpetual curate of St. Ann's—probably to the former, inasmuch as the use of the expression "mother church" in the section cited from the Act of 1 Geo. 1 shows that the Legislature intended that the common law relation between a parish church and the church or chapel of a perpetual curacy within the parish should be created, in which case the incumbent of the parish would be the proper person in whom to vest the church.

Now, of course, upon a conveyance of land between ordinary persons there are few rights of property not capable of being reserved; certainly the right to occupy a stall for the purpose of attending lectures or discourses to be delivered within a building could be so reserved. It seems to me to be quite otherwise when land is conveyed for the purposes of a church, especially when the status of the building as a church is recognized by Act of Parliament; and a new kind of reservation unknown in the case of an immemorial church cannot, I think, be presumed. No such thing as a reservation to the founder at the time of the foundation of a church, except in a side aisle or the chancel, is known to the law: Chapman v. Jones, 17 W. R. 920, L. R. 4 Ex. 273, 280; Fuller v. Lane, 2 Add. 419, 427-8. I therefore put aside the supposition of a reservation, on conveyance, of a pew in the body of the church, as involving a legal impossibility.

If so, it is, apart from any other difficulty, clear that the pews can be claimed only by faculty or by prescription. But prescription and faculty are alike out of the question in respect of the two pews 68 and 78, for the only evidence upon which to found such a claim is that of dealings with the pews, which, if they had really been the subject of faculty, would have been illegal. They appear to have been dealt with apart from any connection with a particular house, and if any faculty can be inferred at all it would be a faculty to some one, his heirs and assigns, which would be bad: Brabin v. Tradum, Poph. 140, and other cases cited in 1 Burn's Ecclesiastical Law, 9th ed., pp. 359-362; Gibs. Codex 197; Stocks v. Booth, 1 T. R. 428.

There is a different case in respect of pew 77. No. 77 dates back, so far as that description is concerned, to 1867, when a faculty for reseating the church was obtained. It occupies the same site as a pew numbered 35 on the building of the chapel in 1846, which retained that number till 1867. No. 35 was allotted to Margaret Hodgson in 1848, in substitution for a pew in the old chapel on the first floor and numbered 31, the space of which, after the alterations of 1845, was in the air, and not over any part of No. 35. We therefore know exactly how No. 35 (now No. 77) came to the predecessor in title of the plaintiff. It was, according to paragraph 20 of the case, assigned in 1848 to Margaret Hodgson by a committee appointed by a meeting of the inhabitants of Bishop Auckland. There was nothing to attach the pew to any particular house, and it and all the other pews dealt with by the committee were allotted simply to the persons named in the plan contained in Appendix B. Margaret Hodgson dealt with the pew by her will made in 1861 upon the same footing. She left her house and also her "pew numbered 35" to her five nieces as tenants in common.

In 1867 a faculty for the re-pewing of the chapel was obtained with the consent of the persons who then held the pews which had been allotted in 1848, and on condition that such consent should not prejudice their rights as pew-owners. The faculty empowered the incumbent and churchwardens to re-allot the pews to the various persons according to the plan contained in Appendix C, in which the No. 35 of the plan of 1848 appears as No. 77, and the persons to whom it is to be allotted are described as the representatives of Margaret Hodgson. The consent in question was signed by the then holder of pew No. 35. It seems to me quite impossible in the face of this evidence to suppose that there could be then a faculty in existence by which pew No. 35 of the chapel of 1848 was vested in Margaret Hodgson or her heirs as attached to the house which she had occupied and owned. There could have been no such right acquired by the assignment made in 1848 by the committee. That did not even profess to have been in respect of any messuage. Margaret Hodgson's will contains no intimation of any claim in respect of the messuage, and I can see no circumstance whatever to raise any presumption in favour of a faculty at any time between 1848 and 1867 granting her this pew, either as attached to her mansion-house or in any other way. Her then successors in title assented to an allotment of a pew to them by the Ordinary, which is quite inconsistent with the notion of an existing right by virtue of a faculty. The allotment by the incumbent and churchwardens is, under the circumstances, nothing but an allotment by or on behalf of the Ordinary, revocable by him at any time. The case does not state whether the representatives of Margaret Hodgson—that is, I presume, the five nieces—made any use of the pew, but I will assume for the sake of argument that they did so. In 1873 the house and the pew No. 77, described as usually held by Margaret Hodgson, with her mansion-house, were sold to the plaintiff, who has been in exclusive enjoyment of the pew ever since. No repairs have been done to the pew by Margaret Hodgson or by her successors in title.

The evidence, therefore, in favour of a title by legal origin appears to consist entirely of occupation since 1867 by the owners of a particular house. Liability to repair is the essential condition of a faculty, and no repairs have been done. The absence of such evidence is fatal to the presumption of a faculty, 1 Burn's Ecclesiastical Law, 9th ed., 360-2, and cases there cited; Fuller v. Lane, 2 Add., at p. 426; Walter v. Gunner, 1 Hag. Consist., 314; Churton v. Frewen.

We were much pressed with authorities to show that after twenty years' enjoyment of a right every intendment should be made in its favour, and it was further urged that there was here twenty years' enjoyment, and that, therefore, the right could not be defeated merely by showing that the enjoyment might have originated since the time of legal memory. Lord Penzance said in Crisp v. Martin, 2 P. D. 1, at p. 27, that the Prescription Act does not apply to a claim to a pew, and I think, upon the language of the Act, 2 & 3 Will. 4, c. 71, s. 1, that there is very good ground for that opinion. If so, prescription is in the present case, absolutely out of the question. There is, however, here a deeper objection. It is (to use the language of Lord Penzance in the case cited) that the evidence does not go beyond occupancy which, in the case of a claim to a pew, is not sufficient evidence of prescription. There is, no doubt, some evidence that the incumbent and churchwardens supposed there was a proprietary right in the plaintiff's predecessors in title. But these admissions come to nothing when one finds, from the same books which contain them, that they admitted similar rights from 1783 to 1848, when they could not possibly have existed, and that from 1848 to the present time they would furnish equally cogent admissions of the title of persons as to whom evidence of enjoyment would tend to establish rights unknown to the law. It is quite true that it is possible to establish a claim by lost grant or lost faculty, though the instrument, if ever it existed, must have come into existence within a few years. In Rogers v. Brooks, 1 T. R. 431 n., a lost faculty was presumed, though, if it existed, it must have been granted within forty years. In Campbell v. Wilson, 3 East, 294, a lost grant was presumed, though twenty-six years before, it could not possibly have existed (see also Gray v. Bond, 2 Br. & B. 667). But, at all events, where the question relates, not to the ideal grant lost in the mists of antiquity, relied upon as the foundation of a prescription, but to a real grant actually made, but lost, the question whether there was such a grant is always one of fact. In each of the three cases cited it was left to the jury; and in Campbell v. Wilson Grose, J., said that he should hardly have made the presumption himself. In The Duke of Norfolk v. Arbuthnot, 5 C.P. D. 390, at p. 393, Bramwell, L.J., said:—"I refuse to find that there was a grant which has been since lost, for I am quite certain that it never existed"; and Brett, L.J., said:—"The question whether a lost grant did exist is one of fact, which must be considered by the tribunal which has to try the action." There are abundant reasons in the present case for the conclusion that there never was a faculty or a grant, and in my opinion there must be judgment for the defendants, with costs.

Bankruptcy—Sheriff's costs—Execution—Possession retained without selling, at request of execution creditor and the debtor—Receiving order—Possession money—Costs of the execution—Bankruptcy Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 71), s. 11, sub-section (1).

After seizure under a writ of fi. fa. the sheriff remained in possession of the debtor's goods without selling, at the request of the execution creditor and of the debtor. A receiving order was subsequently made against the debtor, and the sheriff handed over the goods to the official receiver, and brought in his bill of costs under section 11 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1890, in which he claimed possession money for the time he remained in possession. The claim was allowed on taxation by the county court registrar, but on a review at the instance of the Board of Trade the High Court taxing master allowed eight days' possession money only.

Held, that the possession money claimed by the sheriff was part of the costs of the execution within the meaning of section 11 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1890, and as such ought to be allowed.

Application by the sheriff of Glamorganshire for review of taxation of costs.

On the 2nd of December, 1892, a writ of fi. fa. was delivered to the sheriff, under which he levied execution on the goods of the debtor. Other writs were subsequently handed to the sheriff, under which he also seized.

The debtor was a cabdriver, and it was considered best that he should continue his business.

The sheriff, therefore, at the request of the judgment creditor and of the debtor, remained in possession until the 13th of January, 1893, when a receiving order was made against the debtor.

The sheriff then handed over the goods to the official receiver, and brought in his bill of costs against the estate under section 11 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1890, in which he claimed possession money for 43, 24, and 19 days respectively under the various writs.

This claim was allowed on taxation by the county court registrar, but was objected to by the Board of Trade, who obtained a review before the taxing master of the High Court, under rule 124 of the Bankruptcy Rules, 1886.

The taxing master reversed the registrar's allowance, and allowed only eight days' possession money in each case, and, in consequence of this decision, the sheriff now appealed to the court.

Herbert Reed, Q.C.—The contention of the sheriff is really that he had no option in the matter. He was directed by the creditor not to sell, and asked by the debtor not to sell. The sheriff could not sell, and so remained in possession. These fees, therefore, formed part of the costs of the execution. The taxing master said that eight days was a reasonable and ample time to remain in possession. This case differs from that of In re Finch, Ex parte the Sheriff of Essex, 40 W. R. 175, 8 Morrell's Bankruptcy Cases, 284, because there the sheriff remained in at the request of the execution creditor only, and he did not get the consent of the execution debtor. The real question is whether these are costs of execution under section 11 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1890.

He also referred to Ex parte Lithgow, In re Fenton, 26 W. R. 834, 10 Ch. D. 169.

Muir Mackenzie, for the Board of Trade.—The question is whether the estate is to pay where the possession is prolonged at the request of the debtor, and it really involves what is the true meaning of the costs of the execution.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J.—I am of opinion that these costs were part of the costs of the execution, and as such ought to have been allowed to the sheriff. All I decided in In re Harrison, Ex parte The Sheriff of Essex (see ante, p. 512), was that no costs could be allowed after the receiving order had been made and notice of it had been given to the sheriff. In that case the law provides what is to be done. But with regard to costs which are incurred by possession previous to the receiving order, it seems to me that the sheriff is entitled to those costs. The present case is not like that of In re Finch, because there the sheriff was doing what he had no right to do. He had no right to remain in possession. But here the sheriff remained in possession at the request of the execution creditor and of the execution debtor. It was really not denied that he was right in so doing, but it is said that when told to remain in possession he ought to have said that he would not do so unless provision was made for payment of his costs in the event of bankruptcy. I think the sheriff would be wrong if he did that. I really agree that the sheriff has no choice in the matter on receiving such instructions. It seems to me, therefore, that this item of possession money is part of the costs of the execution within the meaning of section 11 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1890, and the amount deducted by the taxing master must be allowed, with costs.

Application allowed.

"THE EDENMORE." (a.)

Shipping—Salvage—Amount of award.

In a case of salvage, where the services mainly consisted in towing a large steamer, disabled in her machinery, in the Atlantic Ocean in the winter for six and a half days into safety at Halifax, the values of the salved vessel, her cargo and freight, being £90,000, and the owners of the salving vessel having incurred expenses in consequence of deviation and delay, the court made a salvage award of £5,350; awarding to the owners of the salving vessel £4,225, to her master £375, and to her crew £750.

This was an action of salvage brought by the owners, master, and crew of the steamship Inchmarlo against The Edenmore, her cargo and freight, to recover for salvage services rendered to The Edenmore and her cargo in the circumstances stated in the judgment.

The suit was now heard before Barnes, J., assisted by two of the Elder Brethren of the Trinity House.

Aspinall, Q.C., and Buller Aspinall, for the plaintiffs.

Sir Walter Phillimore and Bateson, for the defendants, owners of The Edenmore.

BARNES, J.—The salvage services in this case were rendered by the steamship Inchmarlo, which is a screw steamer of 2,967 tons gross and 1,924 tons net, fitted with triple-expansion engines working up to 1,800 horse power, and which was at the time on a voyage from Savannah for Liverpool with a full cargo of cotton, and having on board thirty-one hands all told, to the steamship Edenmore, which is a vessel belonging to the port of Liverpool, of 2,459 tons gross and 1,564 net register. She had a full cargo of cotton and oil-cake, and was on a voyage from Galveston to Liverpool. The values on both sides are extremely large. According to the plaintiffs the values of The Inchmarlo, her freight and cargo, amount to a little over £155,000; but according to the defendants their value is £134,000. The values of The Edenmore, her freight and cargo, have been fixed for the purpose of this action as follows: the value of The Edenmore, £20,000, the value of her cargo, £64,636, and the value of the freight, £5,364, making a total of £90,000.

It appears that The Edenmore had broken down in the course of her voyage on the 20th of October last, having then broken her tail shaft, which after the breakage was found after examination to be in a state described by one of the engineers on board in the following terms: "After we got all cleared away we found the break in the shaft so near to the stern-bush that we could do nothing towards repairing it, so we closed up the after peak and put the cargo back into its place." The result of that state of affairs was that The Edenmore was entirely helpless, and she remained in that helpless position until the 4th of November last, when The Inchmarlo came to her assistance, so that she was seven days without being able to do anything, drifting without control. She met no vessels with the exception of one vessel on the 2nd of November, when a steamer going to the westward passed her, but took no notice of her signals for assistance. In this state of affairs she was found by The Inchmarlo, having drifted some forty or fifty miles to the north-east of where she broke down, and being at that time about 340 miles, speaking roughly, to the eastward and southward of Halifax. The Inchmarlo came up with her early on the morning of the 4th of November, and was unable, owing to the state of the weather, to make fast until towards seven o'clock in the evening of that day, during which time, I think, the vessels had drifted at the rate of about three knots an hour to the southward and eastward. The Inchmarlo, having got hold of The Edenmore at last, took her in tow and successfully towed her to Halifax, making that port on the 10th of November in the morning. There she left The Edenmore, and after coaling proceeded on her voyage the following evening, arriving in Liverpool on the 23rd of November, where, according to her master, she ought to have arrived ten or eight days sooner.

The principal matter to consider in this case is the risk to which The Edenmore, her cargo and freight, were exposed. The view I take, and which accords with that of the Trinity Masters, is that her position was a very serious one. She had been drifting about for seven days without being able to obtain assistance, and from her helpless condition her only hope of safety lay in the assistance of a steamer powerful enough to tow her safely into port. Without that assistance this large steamer would in all probability never have been heard of again.

It is suggested on behalf of the defendants that if The Edenmore had only been given time she would have drifted across and been found in the English Channel. Well, she would have taken, at the rate of three knots an hour, some two months to have so drifted, and what would have happened in the meantime if her provisions had held out? She would have had to encounter the violent weather of the months of November and December last. Such a suggestion really contains its own answer, because it really means that this vessel must have obtained, in order successfully to relieve her from a disastrous fate, a towage power able to perform a rescue such as was necessary. Another element to be considered in awarding salvage in this case is the risk to the salving vessel. With regard to that it is suggested that the agreement for the services of The Inchmarlo, which according to the evidence was made in this case between the masters of the two vessels, would minimise the risk of loss to the salvors in case their services had been unsuccessful. This agreement is as follows:—"It is this day mutually agreed between W. T. Ashby, master of steamship Inchmarlo, and myself, C. A. Watson, the master of The Edenmore, that the steamship Edenmore shall be towed into port, if possible, by The Inchmarlo, and whatever services are rendered and loss of time shall be settled between my owners and the owners of The Inchmarlo." I have considered that document with some care, and I incline to the opinion that it is possible that the proper construction of it would entitle the salvors to some remuneration, even if their services were not successful. In dealing with the amount of the award in this case I have borne that in mind, though I must say in a case of this character is it very difficult to say what precise amount of effect a consideration of this kind is to have on the reduction of the amount of the award where the services have turned out to be successful. But it does not minimise the danger to the salvors, because they run their risk whether they get paid for their services, or whether they get remunerated by a salvage award, and although no very special risk to the salvors has been proved in this case, except that of a possible collision in making fast, it must not be forgotten that these large vessels always run some risk in making fast, and in the performance of services of this character risk does occur, sometimes of collision and sometimes of straining, in the performance of the towage. Then there is another element, namely, the weather which was encountered. There is no doubt, I think, that the weather was for part of the time extremely severe. It is clear that during the first part of the time they were in company the two vessels could not be connected owing to the state of the weather. Then from the first part of the towage, from 7 to 8 o'clock in the evening of the 4th of November, till the afternoon of the 5th of November, they were only able to make a progress of between two and three knots an hour. From the 5th to the 6th, and from the 6th to the 7th, according to the case of The Edenmore, no progress was made at all. There is no entry in her log in the column headed knots, though there is a record on the 7th of November of forty-five miles by observation. But the master of The Inchmarlo says their progress was on one of these days only thirty miles, and that on the other days the vessels were losing ground. For the latter part of the time the weather was not apparently so severe, though there was some difficulty in getting into Halifax. It is said that the danger cannot have been so great, because the towage was not performed wi h any parting of the hawsers. I am not quite satisfied, nor are the Trinity Masters, that that is quite the right view to take. They think, and I agree, that it shows very considerable skill in handling the salving vessel, that in face of weather such as there was, the salvors should have been able to perform the services they did without parting the hawsers and without accident.

The salvors suggest that they have been put to certain expenses in consequence of the towage, port expenses, some repairs, docking and hawsers, also that a premium of £342, paid to the underwriters of The Inchmarlo for the reinstalment of insurance policies on ships which contained a warranty prohibiting the vessel going to certain North American ports, including, as I understand, Halifax, must be taken into account in considering the expenditure incurred by the owners, as they had to pay this sum to the underwriters of their ship to waive the breach of the warranty. What their position with regard to their cargo owners would have been has not been put before me.

One element of consideration brought to our attention was that the vessel was chartered or agreed to be engaged on terms which would have enabled her to make a profitable voyage to cotton ports and back again, whereas she had to be laid up, her charter being cancelled, and that she made not only no profit, but also made a loss of some £60 a month. That figure does not come to very much. It is said to be a fact that she would have made £300 in the course of the next three months or so, which she lost.

These are not items which are strictly recoverable in the form of actually giving them to the salvors. They form elements for consideration, and the great difficulty in a case of this kind is to give a proper award on a due consideration of all the elements which go to make it up. The great point, to my mind, is that the safety of this large steamer and her valuable cargo, amounting in all to a sum of £90,000, has been brought about by the services of the salvors, and, after giving due weight to the arguments which are properly entitled to be borne in mind in this case, I think the sum of £5,350 is the proper award to make.

Bearing in mind that the expenditure of the owners, to which I have referred, is to be taken into account, because the amount they will receive under the apportionment will not be all money into their pocket, as something will come off it for the expenditure which they have had to make, I apportion the sum in the following way: to the owners, £4,225; to the captain, £375; and to the crew, £750.

GOOCH v. GOOCH. (a.)

Divorce—Separation deed—Prior adultery of wife—Mutual covenant not to commence or prosecute proceedings—Subsequent adultery by husband—Prior adultery of wife a bar to relief.

A separation deed contained a clause, "No proceedings shall be commenced or prosecuted by or on behalf of either party against the other in respect of any cause of complaint which now exists or which has arisen before the date of these presents." Prior to the execution of the deed it was known that the wife had committed adultery. Subsequently the husband committed adultery, and the wife filed her petition for a judicial separation.

Held, that the wife's prior adultery was a bar to the court granting her the relief prayed for, and that the husband was not precluded by the covenant from pleading it, as he was not thereby "commencing or prosecuting" proceedings.

Rose v. Rose, 30 W. R. 736, 31 W. R. 573, 7 P. D. 225, 8 P. D. 98, considered.

Trial before Jeune, P., and a special jury of the wife's (Lady Gooch's) petition praying for a judicial separation from her husband, Sir Alfred Sherlock Gooch, on the ground of his adultery during the years 1889 and 1890.

The respondent, in addition to denying the acts of adultery with which he was charged, charged the petitioner with acts of adultery with one Eden before 1886.

The petitioner denied this, pleaded condonation, and that the respondent was not entitled to set up such acts of adultery, if any, by virtue of the covenant contained in clause 10 of a deed of separation executed by him and the petitioner, dated the 9th of July, 1886.

The clause 10 in question was as follows:—"No proceedings shall be commenced or prosecuted by or on behalf of either party against the other in respect of any cause of complaint which now exists, or which has arisen before the date of these presents."

There was one child of the marriage, aged eleven years.

The jury found that both the petitioner and respondent had committed the acts of adultery charged against them in the petition and answer.

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 15.—JEUNE, P.—On the finding of facts by the jury, the respondent was guilty of adultery after the separation deed of July 9, 1886, and the petitioner was guilty of adultery before it. It cannot be disputed that, but for some effect of that deed, the adultery of the petitioner must prevent her from obtaining the decree of judicial separation which she seeks. The case of Otway v. Otway, 13 P. D. 141, 37 W. R. Dig. 84, is sufficient authority for the proposition that the adultery of a petitioner in a suit for judicial separation is, unless its effect be in some way neutralized, a bar to obtaining the relief asked for. What is there in the present case to neutralize the proved adultery of the petitioner? Whether or no condonation could have such an effect, condonation in the proper, and what, I think, should be the sole use of the word—namely, forgiveness evidenced by conduct, and, according to English law, conditional on future good behaviour—there is none. It was pleaded, but no attempt was made to prove it. The separation deed was executed after accusations of the wife by the husband which he emphatically refused to withdraw, and subsequently to the deed the parties never lived together.

But it is argued that by reason of the 10th clause of the deed I have a discretion to grant, and should exercise it by granting, the judicial separation prayed for. Unless those words, on their true construction, amount to a covenant not to plead the adultery of the petitioner as the respondent has pleaded it, they constitute no imaginable reply to the respondent's plea. I am clearly of opinion that they do not. If it had been intended that such an obligation should be imposed nothing would have been easier than to have used unambiguous language, as in the case of Rose v. Rose, where the opening words of the clause are identical with those in the present case; but the clause goes on: "and every offence (if any) which has been committed or permitted by either party against the other shall be considered as hereby forgiven and condoned, and in case hereafter either shall commence or prosecute any proceedings against the other in respect of any cause of complaint which may hereafter arise, no offence or misconduct which has been committed or permitted before the execution of these presents, and no act, deed, neglect, or default of either party in relation to any such offence or misconduct shall be pleaded or alleged by either party, or be admissible in evidence." It is difficult to imagine why similar words do not appear in clause 10, unless it was expressly intended to exclude their obvious effect. Nor do the words of the present clause appear to me apt to forbid the use of past misconduct as a defence.

Reliance was placed by Mr. Deane on the phrase "commence or prosecute," and it was suggested that the words "or prosecute" were added to cover the case of a charge being set up by the respondent.

But it was pointed out by Mr. Lockwood, and it is, of course, the case, that as regards charges of misconduct before the date of the deed, the respondent's action is that of commencing as much as of prosecuting them. It would be possible, I think, to suggest more than one reason why the word "prosecute" was subjoined to the word "commence." But I do not think that the significance of the clause turns on these words. It appears to me that the respondent, in putting forward his wife's adultery solely as a defence, and not making it the foundation of any prayer of his own, does not in any proper sense of the word either commence or prosecute proceedings against her. It was urged before me that so to read the deed gives the husband license to commit adultery without fear of interference by his wife. This seems to me a fallacy. No doubt a husband whose wife commits adultery obtains—certainly if he does not condone it, and, perhaps, if he does—immunity from a petition for divorce or judicial separation, whatever be his subsequent conduct. But such immunity results from the provision of the law, and a deed does not confer it by abstaining from taking it away. In short the misconduct of a wife gives the husband two rights—one to sue for relief, the other to resist a claim for relief by the wife. It may well be that a husband is willing and agrees to part with the former right, but not with the latter, and this, I think, is what the respondent in this case has done.

In this view it is not necessary to decide what would be the effect of such a covenant as that contained in the words I have quoted from Rose v. Rose. No doubt in cases of judicial separation condonation gives to the court a discretion to grant the relief sought for notwithstanding the adultery of the petitioner. The case of Anichini v. Anichini, 2 Curt. 210, recognized as it is in Morgan v. Morgan and Porter, 17 W. R. 688, L. R. 1 P. & D. 644; Goode v. Goode and Hamson, 9 W. R. 552, 2 Sw. & Tr. 253; McCord v. McCord, 23 W. R. 684, L. R. 3 P. & D. 237; and Conradi v. Conradi, 16 W. R. 1023, L. R. 1 P. & D. 514, may I think now be taken as establishing such a proposition. An analagous discretion in cases of dissolution was conferred on the court by section 31 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857, although the cases point to the use of it only under exceptional circumstances: see Seller v. Seller, 8 W. R. 5, 1 Sw. & Tr. 482; Morgan v. Morgan and Porter; Goode v. Goode and Hamson; Collins v. Collins, 32 W. R. 501, 9 App. Cas. 205; Story v. Story and O'Connor, 36 W. R. 190, 12 P. D. 196; and Stoker v. Stoker, 37 W. R. 576, 14 P. D. 60; and it appears to me that the argument addressed to me by Mr. Deane that the discretion may be somewhat wider in cases of judicial separation than of dissolutions is well founded in reason, and finds some support in some expressions used in the judgment in McCord v. McCord. It may also be, though as to this I entertain considerable doubt, that an agreement that past misconduct is to be deemed to be condoned, or a covenant not to set up past misconduct as a defence, confers on the court the same discretion as is conferred by condonation. It is to me by no means clear that the parties can at their pleasure confer by agreement on the court the same discretion which the court founds on their actual conduct. I am not sure that they can give the court a jurisdiction not to refuse the prayer of a petition by agreeing that they should be deemed to have condoned, when in fact they have not, any more than they could give a jurisdiction to grant the prayer of a petition by agreeing that cruelty should be deemed to have been committed when in fact it had not.

But it is clear, I think, that the parties cannot by stipulation produce any higher effect than they can by condonation, or can impose on the court the necessity of granting a judicial separation notwithstanding the adultery of the petitioner. It is clear from the authorities, ending with the cases of Rowley v. Rowley, L. R. 1 H. of L. Sc. 63, 15 W. R. H. L. Dig. 6; Besant v. Wood, 12 Ch. D. 605, 27 W. R. Dig. 95; and Rose v. Rose, that no rule of public policy, nor any other rule, prevents parties from agreeing that they will not found an application to the court on past misconduct. The view of the law in the present day, no doubt, is that as parties can compromise and agree to compromise a suit, so they can agree not to bring it or can agree not to put forward specified matters as foundation for it. But it is altogether another thing to say, and I do not think that any of the last-mentioned cases show, that the parties can by any arrangement between themselves dictate to the court on what principle relief sought is to be granted. If it is a rule that an adulterous spouse cannot obtain a judicial separation or dissolution except under certain special circumstances recognized by judicial authority, the parties cannot surely by any agreement relax or modify that rule. They may contract themselves out of their right, but they cannot contract the court out of its duty. That would be to make a law for themselves.

I have touched on these points because, having had all the facts of the case before me, it appears to me right to say that if the terms of the deed give me a judicial discretion whether the adultery of the petitioner should bar her claim to a judicial separation, I cannot think that there are any such exceptional circumstances as would justify me in granting the prayer of the petitioner. The respondent has been guilty of adultery since the deed of separation, and some years before it he was guilty of conduct of which I was obliged to express my opinion to the jury in terms I do not wish to repeat. But I do not think that misconduct of the respondent before the deed, nor of course since it, conduced to the petitioner's misconduct. On the other hand, while not forgetting the terrorism exercised at some period over the petitioner by her paramour, and also giving weight to the absence of any charge of misconduct after the separation, I cannot help saying that the misconduct was singularly persistent, and in respect of its open character singularly degrading to the husband, and I think further that her attachment for the man to whom I have referred deepened, if it did not originate, the estrangement between herself and her husband, and, causing as it did that eventual separation, placed him in a position which conduced to, though it does not justify, his recent misconduct. Such a state of things does not fall within the principle of any of the cases in which, notwithstanding the adultery of the petitioner, either dissolution or judicial separation has been granted. I have hesitated whether, as the wife has a substantial income, she should not pay the costs, with a set-off with regard to the point on which she was successful; but on the whole, especially as there were grave faults on both sides, I think there should be no order as to costs.

Court of Appeal.

From Q. B. Div. (Lindley and Lopes, L.JJ.) — July 14.

BUDDEN v. WILKINSON. (a.)

Practice—Discovery—Affidavit of documents—Sufficiency—Production of documents—Privilege—Documents relating solely to the case of the party claiming privilege.

In an action of trespass, to which the defence pleaded was a right of way, the plaintiff made an affidavit of documents in the following terms:—"I have in my possession or power certain documents numbered 1 to 26 inclusive, which are tied up in a bundle marked A, and initialed by me; the said documents relate solely to the title or to the case of the plaintiff, and not to the case of the defendant, nor do they tend to support it, wherefore the plaintiff objects to produce the same, and says they are privileged from production."

Held, that the affidavit sufficiently described the documents so as to enable the court, if it thought fit so to do, to enforce production; and, consequently, that the affidavit was sufficient.

Taylor v. Batten, 27 W. R. 106, 4 Q. B. D. 85, followed.

Held, also, that the documents so described were privileged from production; and that the fact that the affidavit stated that the documents related to the case as well as to the title of the plaintiff, and omitted to state that the documents contained nothing impeaching the case or title of the plaintiff, did not render the affidavit insufficient for the purpose of supporting the plaintiff's claim of privilege from production.

Bewicke v. Graham, 29 W. R. 436, 7 Q. B. D. 400, followed.

McLean v. Jones, 66 L. T. N. S. 653, 40 W. R. Dig. 182, not followed.

Appeal by the plaintiffs from the judgment of a Divisional Court of the Queen's Bench Division (Mathew and Wright, JJ.).

This was an action in which the plaintiffs claimed damages for trespass against the defendant by reason of the defendant's passing through a certain archway passage, which the plaintiffs alleged to be their property. The defendant by his defence alleged that the archway passage was the only access to the defendant's premises, and pleaded a right of way over the locus in quo; the defendant also counterclaimed in ejectment.

The defendant applied for discovery of documents, and the plaintiffs made an affidavit in the following terms:—"We have also in our possession or power certain documents numbered 1 to 26 inclusive, which are tied up in a bundle and marked A, and initialed by the deponent G. S. Budden; the said documents last mentioned relate solely to the title or to the case of us, the plaintiffs, and not to the case of the defendant, nor do they tend to support it; wherefore we object to produce the same, and say they are privileged from production." The defendant thereupon applied that the plaintiffs might be ordered to make a further and better affidavit of documents.

The Divisional Court (Mathew and Wright, JJ.), considering itself bound by the decision of another Divisional Court in the case of McLean v. Jones, 66 L. T. N. S. 653, 40 W. R. Dig. 182, held that the affidavit of the plaintiffs in the form in which it was made was not sufficient, on the ground that privilege could only be claimed for documents of title as distinguished from case, and ordered a further and better affidavit to be made by the plaintiffs.

The plaintiffs appealed.

At the hearing of the appeal the attention of the court was not called to the fact that, by reason of the defendant's counter-claim, the question of the plaintiffs' possession of the locus in quo was one of the issues in the action; the case was argued, and was dealt with by the court as if the plaintiffs' possession of the locus in quo was not in dispute, and as if the only question in issue was whether the defendant had a right of way over the locus in quo.

C. Montague Lush, for the appellants.—The plaintiffs are entitled to claim privilege from production, not alone for the documents which the plaintiffs swear relate solely to the plaintiffs' title, but also for documents which they swear relate solely to the plaintiffs' case, and do not tend to support the defendant's case: Bewicke v. Graham, 29 W. R. 436, 7 Q. B. D. 400; Peile v. Stoddard, 1 Mac. & G. 192; Greenwood v. Greenwood, 6 W. R. 119; Attorney-General v. Thompson, 8 Hare, 106; Bulman v. Young, 31 W. R. 766; Jenkins v. Bushby, 14 W. R. 531, 35 L. J. Ch. 400, per Kindersley, V.C., at p. 401; Wigram on Discovery, 2nd ed., pp. 243, 244; and if the documents are privileged, then the affidavit, in the form in which it has been made by the plaintiffs, is sufficient, as the documents for which protection is claimed are therein sufficiently identified, and the plaintiffs were not bound in their affidavit to state what documents relate to title and what to case as distinguished from title: Taylor v. Batten, 27 W. R. 106, 4 Q. B. D. 85. [LINDLEY, L.J.—Mansell v. Feeney, 9 W. R. 610, 2 J. & H. 320, is rather against you.] That case was criticized in and is inconsistent with Bewicke v. Graham and Bulman v. Young; and McLean v. Jones is also really inconsistent with Bewicke v. Graham. The omission in the plaintiffs' affidavit of any statement that the documents in question "contain nothing impeaching the case or title of the plaintiffs" does not render the affidavit insufficient, nor is the omission of such a statement fatal to the plaintiffs' claim of privilege from production: Morris v. Edwards, 37 W. R. 271, 23 Q. B. D. 287, 15 App. Cas. 309, 39 W. R. Dig. 162; Ind Coope v. Emerson, 36 W. R. 243, 12 App. Cas. 300. The plaintiffs' affidavit is drawn exactly in the form that was used in Bewicke v. Graham, which the Court of Appeal there held was a sufficient affidavit. The defendant is bound to accept the oath of the plaintiffs as true.

J. E. Bankes, for the defendant, the respondent.—This is not a case of a claim for protection from production on the ground of professional privilege; it is another kind of privilege which is set up by the plaintiffs' affidavit, and to support this particular kind of privilege the plaintiffs' affidavit should give such a description of the nature of the documents as to enable the court to satisfy itself with reasonable certainty that the plaintiffs have not erroneously represented or misconceived the nature of the documents: Combe v. Corporation of London, 1 Y. & Col. C. C. 631, at p. 651; Attorney-General v. Emerson, 31 W. R. 191, 10 Q. B. D. 191, at p. 203-4. The plaintiffs' oath is not an oath as to a fact, but an oath as to the effect of documents, and the court is bound not to accept such an oath without some sufficient description of the documents being given. [LINDLEY, L.J.—How do you get over Bewicke v. Graham?] That was not a decision as to a sufficiency of the description of the documents on a claim for privilege against production; the question there was merely whether the documents were sufficiently identified. Secondly, the plaintiffs' affidavit should have contained a statement that the documents in question "do not contain anything impeaching the plaintiffs' case": Boyd v. Petrie, 17 W. R. 903, 20 L. T. N. S. 934. The cases of Morris v. Edwards and Ind Coope v. Emerson only decide that in an ejectment action those words need not be inserted. [LOPES, L.J.—In Morris v. Edwards Lord Herschell does not limit his observations to the case of an ejectment action.] Morris v. Edwards was in fact an ejectment action. Thirdly, McLean v. Jones is an express decision that such privilege from production as is claimed here can only be claimed as to documents of title as distinguished from documents of case: Bustros v. White, 24 W. R. 721, 1 Q. B. D. 423; Gardner v. Irvin, 27 W. R. 442, 4 Ex. D. 49.

Lush, in reply.—The defendant has not asked for production, but has merely applied that the plaintiffs be ordered to make a further and better affidavit; strictly speaking, the only question before the court at present is as to the sufficiency of the plaintiffs' affidavit; but I am willing that the court should now deal with the question as if an application for production of the documents had been made by the defendant. [Bankes.—I, too, am willing to have the matter treated as if it were an application for production.]

LINDLEY, L.J.—This is an appeal from an order of the Divisional Court, declaring that a certain affidavit of documents is insufficient. The affidavit runs thus:—"We have also in our possession or power certain documents, numbered 1 to 26 inclusive, which are tied up in a bundle marked A and initialed by the deponent, Budden. The said last-mentioned documents relate solely to the title or to the case of us, the plaintiffs, and not to the case of the defendant, nor do they tend to support it, wherefore we object to produce the same, and say that they are privileged from production."

The action is an action for trespass, and it is met by a plea of right of way, and the question in dispute therefore will be the existence of the right of way over the land. Possession is enough to support the plaintiffs' claim, and I suppose the possession is not in dispute; but the right of way, of course, may raise a question of title, as to which I say nothing.

Now the real point in dispute will be—I do not say it is at this moment, but will be—whether these documents in this bundle are sufficiently protected from production; the case has been argued before us as if that really were the substantial question. But in point of form what we have to consider is the sufficiency of the affidavit. Now, dealing with that, the question which arises is, What is it necessary to set out in the affidavit to make it a sufficient affidavit of documents? Upon that particular point Taylor v. Batten, 27 W. R. 106, 4 Q. B. D. 89, is conclusive; the principle of that case is enunciated in two or three lines, which I will read:—"The principle of our decision is that the object of the affidavit is to enable the court to make an order for the production of the documents mentioned in it, if the court think fit so to do, and that a description of the documents which enables production, if ordered, to be enforced, is sufficient."

In the present case the affidavit states that there are certain documents which are capable of being identified—tied up in a bundle, marked, and numbered. Nothing more is wanted to identify those documents or to enable the court to order them to be produced, and to enforce the order, if it is right so to do. Taking, therefore, the case of Taylor v. Batten as our guide—and there is nothing new in it, for the law there laid down is old law, familiar to all of us—the narrow point whether or not the affidavit here is sufficient, appears to us to be settled in favour of the plaintiff's contention. It is a sufficient affidavit.

That, however, leaves open one or two other points to which I will now allude. It has been argued that the affidavit is not sufficient, because of the expression "certain documents"; but that does not in any way throw any doubt or difficulty as to the identity of the bundle.

Then it was argued that the affidavit is not sufficient, because it does not say that these documents do not tend to impeach the plaintiff's title. This is a point which refers rather to the protection from production, and that is a question which will arise when the point as to production is raised before the court. That particular point—in an action for ejectment at all events—is met by the decision of the House of Lords in Morris v. Edwards, and I think also by the decision in Ind Coope v. Emerson, which also went to the House of Lords. The words "and do not tend to impeach the plaintiff's title" may apparently be omitted in the affidavit; but their omission does not affect the efficiency of the affidavit.

Then the affidavit is also quarrelled with by reason of the word "case" being introduced: that, again, is a point which does not arise on the sufficiency of the affidavit; the only point which arises on the sufficiency of the affidavit is that which I have already dealt with.

I might stop there, and say nothing at all about the right to the production of these documents, for which protection is claimed; but we have been invited to say something, and I will say this: that, having looked into the case of Bewicke v. Graham, I think it will be found—when the question of production is raised—that that case covers this point. I cannot distinguish that case from the present one; and as it was a decision of the Court of Appeal it is binding on us. Whether it went too far or not, I say nothing at all about. The appeal must be allowed.

LOPES, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The real question, and in fact the only question which we have to consider, is whether this affidavit is sufficient. The case of Taylor v. Batten appears to be clear on that point. All that is required is that the documents in question should be sufficiently identified to enable the court to make an order for their production. The terms of the affidavit here are quite sufficient to enable the court to make such an order.

It is impossible, however, to disguise from one's mind that the real question sought to be raised—and which ultimately would have to be raised—in this case is whether or not the documents in question are sufficiently protected from production. It is not necessary for me to express any opinion of my own on this subject; there is the case of Bewicke v. Graham, and it seems to me that that case is directly in point, and it is a case by which we are bound. I am unable to distinguish it from the present case.

LINDLEY, L.J.—I may add that Bewicke v. Graham appears to us both to be quite inconsistent with the decision of the Divisional Court in McLean v. Jones.

MIDGLEY v. MIDGLEY. (a.)

Executor—Statute of Limitations—Statute-barred debt—Administration summons by creditor dismissed—Subsequent payment of the debt by one executor against wish of his co-executor—Res judicata—Devastavit.

An executor who pays a statute-barred debt after a judicial decision that the debt is not recoverable out of the testator's estate by reason of its being statute-barred, commits a devastavit; and the creditor who receives payment of such debt, with knowledge of the circumstances, is also liable to the testator's estate for its repayment.

Appeal from Romer, J.

J. Midgley, who died in 1891, appointed his wife Isabella Midgley and his nephew Stephen Midgley executors of his will, and Isabella Midgley was also the residuary legatee.

On the 9th of April, 1892, an originating summons, for the administration of the testator's estate, was taken out in the Palatine Court of Lancaster on behalf of Elizabeth and Jane Sager by a Mr. C. H. Plant, their solicitor, in which the applicants claimed payment of a sum of £135, representing principal and interest, which they alleged to be due to them from the testator's estate in respect of a loan of £150 made by them to the testator in 1880, which by a payment made by the testator in 1885 had been reduced to £100, since which date no payment or acknowledgment of the debt had been made. One of the executors—viz., Stephen Midgley—admitted the claim of the Misses Sager, but the executrix, Isabella Midgley, objected to it. She suggested that there had been an arrangement come to between the testator and the Misses Sager that the latter were not to claim payment of the money, and she set up the Statute of Limitations as a bar to the claim.

On the 29th of April, 1892, the judge of the Palatine Court dismissed the originating summons of the Misses Sager on the ground that the debt was statute barred. Stephen Midgley nevertheless in May, 1892, at the instigation of Plant, who was the solicitor of the Misses Sager, handed Plant a cheque for £135, signed by himself alone, and payable to the Misses Sager or bearer; the cheque was drawn on a bank in which certain moneys, forming part of the testator's estate, had been lodged by the executors. Plant obtained payment of the cheque and lodged the £135 to the credit of an account kept at his own bank as agent for the Misses Sager, but over which Plant had the control.

The present action was thereupon instituted by Isabella Midgley as plaintiff, against Stephen Midgley, Plant, and the Misses Sager as defendants, claiming to have the £135 repaid to the testator's estate by Plant and the Misses Sager, and a declaration that the defendant Stephen Midgley was also liable to repay the £135 with interest thereon. Shortly after the issue of the writ in the action the defendant Plant paid over the moneys over which he had the control, to the Misses Sager.

Romer, J., at the trial of the action made an order that the defendants, the Misses Sager and Plant, "do forthwith repay £135 to the credit" of the executors of the testator, and that the defendant Stephen Midgley was also liable to repay the £135 with interest.

Each of the defendants appealed.

(a.) Reported by M. J. BLAKE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Neville, Q.C., and Maidlow, for appellant Stephen Midgley.—It is an old established rule that either executor has a right to pay out of the testator's assets a statute-barred debt, notwithstanding the fact that the residuary legatee objects, provided there has been no decree for administration pronounced: Shewen v. Vanderhorst, 1 Russ. & Myl. 347; In re Rownson, Field v. White, 33 W. R. 604, 29 Ch. D. 358, at pp. 362, 363. In re Wenham, Hunt v. Wenham, 40 W. R. 636, [1892] 3 Ch. 59, is distinguishable, because there, although no decree for administration had actually been pronounced, the court had assumed the duty of, and was acting in, the administration of the estate; but in the present case the court did not assume the duty of administering the estate, the creditors' administration summons having been dismissed. [A. L. SMITH, L.J.—Would not your client have been bound to plead res judicata if any action by the Misses Sager to recover the £135 had been brought after the dismissal of the originating summons?] The decision on the originating summons was only a decision that the debt was statute barred; it decided nothing as to the existence of the debt itself. To support a plea of res judicata it is necessary to show that the question raised in the second suit had been adjudicated upon in the first: Moss v. Anglo-Egyptian Navigation Co., 14 W. R. 150, L. R. 1 Ch. App. 108, at p. 114; Bullen & Leake's Precedents, 3rd ed., p. 575; Houston v. Marquis of Sligo, 29 Ch. D. 448, 33 W. R. Dig. 83.

Swinfen Eady, for the appellants the Misses Sager.—The learned judge below has found that the originating summons taken out on behalf of the Misses Sager was dismissed because the debt was statute barred. As to the plea of res judicata, the court would be bound to see what the point directly in issue in the first action was, because it is only to that extent that the judgment is an estoppel; the replication to a plea of res judicata would be nul tiel record, and then the record in the first action should be looked into and the exact course which the first action took would have to be shown. [A. L. SMITH, L.J.—On the record you would not find the nature of the pleas pleaded at all.] The dismissal of the originating summons left the executors at large as to the administration of the estate. It is going too far to say that because the originating summons was dismissed, that, therefore, the Misses Sager were not creditors at all; the summons might have been dismissed as a matter of discretion, for the judge has a judicial discretion to grant or to refuse administration of an estate.

Hopkinson, Q.C., and O. L. Clare, for the appellant C. H. Plant.—Plant ought not to have been made a party to this action, and no decree ought to have been made against him. The money in question is not in his hands. A solicitor is not to be held responsible as a constructive trustee unless the trust property is in his hands: Barnes v. Addy, 22 W. R. 505, L. R. 9 Ch. App. 244; In re Spencer, 30 W. R. 296, 51 L. J. Ch. 271.

Channell, Q.C., and Upjohn, for the respondent, Isabella Midgley.—The origin of the doctrine that an executor paying a statute-barred debt does not commit a devastavit is that the debt is justly due. But in the present case the respondent alleged that there had been an arrangement between the dead man and the Misses Sager that they were not to receive judgment; but there was a difficulty about proving this arrangement, and therefore the Statute of Limitations was set up honestly, and not as a means of disputing what was acknowledged to be justly due. The judgment on the originating summons was something more than a decision that the debt was statute barred; it settled conclusively not only all matters actually in issue, but which might have been in issue in that proceeding. Stephen Midgley after that, had a plea of res judicata, and by paying the debt he abandoned the benefit of that plea, and that he had no right to do. The plea of res judicata goes further than mere estoppel, because whereas the latter depends on the particular issue actually raised in the first suit, the plea of res judicata applies to what might have been raised in the first suit: Newington v. Levy, 19 W. R. 473, L. R. 6 C. P. 180; Greathead v. Bromley, 7 T. R. 455; Thomas v. Griffith, 9 W. R. 293, 2 De G. F. & J. 555; Baldwin v. Church, 1 Stra. 20. On the question as to making the Misses Sager and Plant parties to the action, Plant was not acting as solicitor for Stephen Midgley, the executor, but was acting as solicitor for the Misses Sager, who were mere strangers who appropriated this part of the testator's estate. The case of Attorney-General v. Earl Chesterfield, 2 W. R. 499, 18 Beav. 596, is therefore distinguishable. At the time this action was brought, Plant was the person who had sole control of the account into which the £135 had been paid. He was therefore a necessary party: Lee v. Sankey, 21 W. R. 286, L. R. 15 Eq. 204, at p. 211. The Misses Sager are liable because they have now got the £135 in their hands.

Maidlow, in reply for S. Midgley, cited In re Radcliffe, European Assurance Society v. Radcliffe, 26 W. R. 417, 7 Ch. D. 733.

Hopkinson, Q.C., in reply for Plant, cited Stahlschmidt v. Lett, 1 Sm. & Giff. 415, and Coombs v. Coombs, 15 W. R. 286, L. R. 1 P. & D. 288, as to the power of one executor to pay a statute-barred debt; and as to estoppel, General Steam Navigation Co. v. Gillow, 11 M. & W. 877.

Swinfen Eady replied for the Misses Sager.

LINDLEY, L.J.—In this case there are three appeals—an appeal by Stephen Midgley, another by the Misses Sager, and a third by Mr. Plant—from the order of Romer, J., which order was as follows: [The Lord Justice read the order, and proceeded:—] Why the appeals could not have been consolidated and dealt with in a less expensive way, I do not know. The short point which arises is as follows: It appears that the plaintiff, Mrs. Isabella Midgley, and a Mr. Stephen Midgley were co-executors of Mrs. Midgley's husband. It appears that the Misses Sager claimed to be creditors against the testator's estate; it appears that the executors took different views of what ought to be done about paying the Misses Sager; it appears that Stephen Midgley was of opinion that they ought to be paid, but that Mrs. Midgley was of opinion that they ought not to be paid. She was not satisfied that her husband owed the money. Besides which their debt was, she contended, barred, assuming it to have been a just one, by the Statute of Limitations. I will assume, without deciding it, that it was perfectly competent for Mr. Stephen Midgley in that state of things to have paid the Misses Sager. I will assume too, notwithstanding he knew of the dispute about the debt bonâ fide raised by his co-executrix and her objection to pay it, he nevertheless could have paid it. I am disposed to think that may be the law, although I do not think there is any case which goes quite to that length. Certainly, in 1826, no less a judge than the late Baron Bayley said it was not the law. In a passage in the case of M'Culloch v. Dawes, 9 Dow. & Ryl., at p. 43, decided by Abbott, C.J., Bayley, J., (as he then was) and Holroyd, J.; Bayley, J., said this: "They are bound," speaking of executors,

"if possible to resist such a claim"—that is, a claim barred by the statute—"they have no right to waive any legal defence to such an action, and if they did and were to pay a debt, against the recovery of which there was any legal bar, they would render themselves liable over to those who were interested in the testator's property." I do not say that that is the state of the law now. I do not think it is, because that passage was called pointedly to the attention of Wood, V.C., in Hill v. Walker, 4 K. & J. 166, in 1858, and he dissented from it. The Vice-Chancellor said: "It certainly cannot be considered to be law at the present day that executors, paying a debt against the recovery of which the Statute of Limitations might be pleaded as a legal bar, render themselves liable over to those who are interested in the testator's property. Instances of such payments must very frequently have occurred, and yet I am not aware of any case in which an executor paying such a debt has been held to incur any liability." Speaking now with a very considerable and long experience in these matters, I have no doubt whatever that the view stated by Wood, V.C., in 1858 has always been accepted as good law ever since, and that the passage I read from the judgment of Bayley, J., has not been followed for the last thirty years at least. But how far the doctrine that an executor can pay a statute-barred debt has gone, is another matter. I take it as a general proposition that an executor can pay a statute-barred debt and not be guilty of devastavit.

The position of affairs being what I have mentioned, Mr. Stephen Midgley did not think fit to claim the benefit of the statute. His co-executor did, and the consequence was that the Misses Sager brought an action by way of originating summons, in Chancery, for administration of the estate—that is to say, an action for payment of their debt in due course of administration. That was the scope and object of their summons. Their summons was issued in the Palatine Court, and it was met in this way. Stephen Midgley admitted the debt, and said he thought it ought to be paid. His co-executor, the widow, denied the debt, disputed it, and pleaded the statute. What was to be done? Was the learned judge before whom the case came to take the admission of the executor who admitted the debt and give the plaintiff a decree of administration, or was he to attend to the plea of the widow that the statute barred it? Upon that point it appears to me that he did that which, as I understand, is in perfect accordance with the law, as it is laid down in "Williams on Executors" (Vol. II., Part V., Book III., c. 1, at p. 1,953, 8th ed.): "If there are several executors, they may plead different pleas, and that which is most to the testator's advantage shall be received. Therefore, in an action of assumpsit against four executors upon a promise made by the testator, if one executor acknowledges the action and the other three plead non-assumpsit, their plea shall be received." Acting upon that principle the learned judge, having before him the view of each executor, felt himself bound by law to attend to the plea of the statute. The question whether the debt was barred by the statute was accordingly gone into, and it was decided that the debt was barred, that is to say, there was by the judge at that time and under that state of circumstances an adjudication that that particular debt which was being sued for was not recoverable out of the estate. I do not say he decided it was not due, but there was an adjudication that it was not recoverable. If it had been recoverable, as a matter of course or in his discretion in the matter, he would have granted the usual decree for administration of the estate. That is the position of affairs.

Now what was done after that? We will consider the effect of what was done presently; but what was done was this. Mr. Stephen Midgley, under the advice of his solicitor—and it really was by the contrivance of Mr. Plant—goes and, notwithstanding that adjudication, pays that debt out of the assets, and now seeks to justify that payment. Can that be? Is it in accordance with principle that that can be right? It seems to me upon principle that it is clearly and manifestly wrong. What is the principle? The principle, as a general principle, is that it is the executors' duty to protect the estate against demands which by law cannot be enforced against it. That is his duty. That general principle is a wholesome principle not to be cut away or narrowed, and it was discussed and recognized and enforced in this court in In re Rownson, Field v. White, where the point was whether the executor could pay a debt to which the Statute of Frauds was pleaded. The court said no. On general principle I take it to be clear and plain that it was distinctly wrong for the executor to pay a debt which had been judicially decided not to be recoverable out of the estate which it is his duty to protect.

But then, it is said, there is an exception as regards the Statute of Limitations. No doubt that is an exception. The question is—what is the extent of the exception? The exception itself I say no more about. I have read the passage as to that, from the decision of Wood, V.C., in Hill v. Walker, and I do not wish to diminish it to any extent. How far has it gone? Has it ever been decided that an executor can justify the payment out of assets of a debt which has been judicially held to be irrecoverable? There is no such case. No such authority can be found; and we are asked, therefore, to extend this anomalous principle, and cut into a sounder and more general principle. What is the right course to pursue? Are we to extend this anomalous principle, or are we to maintain a wholesome and general principle? My answer is that an anomalous principle is not to be extended, but is to be confined within the limits of its own anomaly. That principle was distinctly enunciated and acted upon in In re Rownson, Field v. White; and unless there is authority which drives me to say that an executor can pay a debt which has been judicially determined not to be recoverable, I will not be the first to say he can. It seems to me it would be wrong. Technically, I take it, it is manifestly wrong. Technically the executor is in a position, in the circumstances to which I have alluded, to plead to a fresh action, not only the statute, but res judicata. On what principle is he to throw over the protection he has got by the judgment of the court? On the contrary, he falls immediately within the general principle to which I have alluded, and he is outside the anomalous principle to which I have also alluded. That was the short ground on which Romer, J., decided this case. He said—I agree an executor can pay a statute-barred debt, but an executor has no business to throw over the protection which the decision of the court has given him. I entirely agree with Romer, J., and on general principle, I repeat the conclusion I have arrived at—that when there has been a judicial decision that the debt is not recoverable, the right of the executor to pay that debt is gone. It is a new point, but I have no doubt about it; and I therefore hold that Stephen Midgley, when he did pay that debt, did that which, in point of law, he had no right to do. It follows, of course, that Stephen Midgley's appeal must be dismissed.

Then, as regards the case against the Misses Sager and Mr. Plant, their position is somewhat different. As to them, the circumstances are peculiar. At the time the writ in this action was issued, the money which had been improperly got out of a fund out of which it ought not to have been taken was under the control of Plant, and standing to the credit of the two Misses Sager. How was that money to be got back except by some proceeding to which both were parties? It was necessary they should both be parties, and as the Misses Sager had the money, it was right to compel them to restore it. They got it from a fund out of which it ought never to have been paid, and with knowledge of the circumstances. Therefore I am of opinion the appeal of the Misses Sager fails also.

Now, as to Plant; if this was like the case of Barnes v. Addy, I should think the action ought to be dismissed against Plant, and dismissed with costs. There used to be a notion, a hazy notion, in chancery that you could file a bill against a solicitor or other agent to get costs out of him, even if you could not get relief against him. I never understood it, nor anybody else that I ever heard of. But those cases were reviewed and discussed and examined by Lord Selborne in the case of Barnes v. Addy. The question, therefore, whether Mr. Plant ought to be saddled with costs depends, in my judgment, on whether there were circumstances which justified the court in giving relief against him. It appears to me there are such circumstances which amply justify it. In the first place, he had the money at the time when the writ in this action was issued. In the next place, that money was got by him by a deliberate scheme to get it paid out of the fund out of which I have already held it was not legally recoverable. He was the fons et origo of the whole of this mischief. I do not allude to matters which it is unnecessary to allude to, but we know the facts. We know how the money was got. We know it was his doing; and he having been the instigator and schemer of the whole thing, in my opinion Romer, J., was justified in making a decree against him. His appeal also ought to be dismissed with costs.

LOPES, L.J.—Unless this had been a somewhat novel and interesting point, I should have reposed under the very elaborate and excellent judgment which has been delivered by my learned brother; but, as it is a somewhat novel and important point, I will shortly state what I think about it.

I think the law is clear to this extent, that an executor is not bound to set up the Statute of Limitations to a claim, and that though the debt may be barred he may nevertheless pay it. But this is before decree in an administration suit. After decree in an administration suit, I think it is competent for any person interested in the fund to take advantage of the Statute of Limitations, notwithstanding the refusal of the executor to set it up. I think, so far, the law is perfectly clear. Whether before decree an executor can pay a statute-barred debt against the protest of persons interested in the assets of the testator and against the wishes of his co-executor, as far as I know (and I believe I am correct), has never yet been decided, and I do not propose in this case to express any opinion on the subject. It is unnecessary to decide such a point, and it is a matter which no doubt will arise, and will have to be decided in the future.

Now, I will deal with this case. An originating summons was taken out by the Misses Sager against the two executors under this testator's will—namely, Stephen Midgley and Isabella Midgley; Isabella Midgley being the plaintiff in the present action. This originating summons being taken out, it appears that Stephen Midgley was willing, nay, anxious, to pay the alleged debt, though it was statute-barred. Isabella Midgley, on the other hand, who, it may be observed, was a residuary legatee, was not anxious that the debt should be paid, and for reasons which are obvious; and she set up the Statute of Limitations. The court, having these two executors before it, and these two different courses being taken by the executors, had to determine the matter, and the court determined it in this way: It upheld the plea of the statute as set up by Isabella Midgley, holding that the claim of the Misses Sager was not an enforceable debt. In point of fact, the court adopted the view of the law enunciated in Williams on Executors, and referred to in the case of Chaffe v. Kelland, 1 Roll. Abr. 929, that that view was to be taken, in a matter such as this, which was most to the advantage of the testator's estate. The court accordingly upheld the plea set up by Isabella Midgley, and solemnly decided that this debt was not an enforceable debt. Stephen Midgley, it will be recollected, was a defendant and a party to this originating summons, and knew well all that transpired. Mr. Plant also knew all that transpired on the dismissal of this originating summons, because he was the solicitor who was acting for the Misses Sager. Therefore, we have both the Misses Sager and Plant knowing what course the originating summons had taken, and what had been decided by the court in that case. Now, what happens afterwards? Stephen Midgley, notwithstanding what had taken place, notwithstanding this solemn decision of the court to the effect that this debt was not an enforceable debt, pays the debt out of the assets of the testator—I need hardly say without consulting Isabella Midgley—and of his own motion.

That being so, the question which arises in this case is this, and this is the first and governing question—was Stephen Midgley justified in doing as he did? I am clearly of opinion he was not. Whatever the position of a disputed debt may be before it has been adjudicated upon and determined to be a debt not enforceable, I have no hesitation in holding that a co-executor, knowing what has taken place in proceedings such as this originating summons, who, after an adjudication upon it, pays the debt, commits a devastavit, and is liable to refund the money. It appears to me that to hold otherwise would be an unjustifiable disregard of the decision of the court that had adjudicated upon the debt. To hold otherwise would be against the principle which is admitted to be a good and sound principle—namely, that it is the duty of an executor to protect his testator's assets; and it would be even worse—it would be an extending of this doctrine with regard to the payment of statute-barred debts and so on, which is admitted to be anomalous, and about which it has over and over again been said that it is a doctrine which ought not to be extended. If the Misses Sager had brought an action for this debt they would have been conclusively answered by the plea of res judicata. Can it be said, notwithstanding that the plea of res judicata would be a conclusive answer, that the other executor may, of his own motion, pay this debt which the court has said is not to be recoverable? Speaking for myself, I decline to adopt such a view. After an adjudication that the debt is irrecoverable, I am clearly of opinion that no executor would be justified in making payment of it. So much for Stephen Midgley.

With regard to the other defendants—the Misses Sager and Plant—I have little to say. It seems to me clear that the Misses Sager must be held liable. They have obtained the benefit of this payment by Stephen Midgley, and they still hold the money. It may be said that they knew very little with regard to what Plant was doing. I think that is very likely. At the same time Plant was their solicitor; and although he says he acted on his own responsibility, and I believe he did, yet, as their solicitor, they must be taken to have known what he was doing. The money was obtained for them, they got the benefit of it, and it is still under their control.

With regard to Plant, I have no hesitation in saying that he is liable. He seems to me to have been the instigator of the matter from beginning to end. Nobody admires more than I do to see a solicitor active for his client, but I think Mr. Plant passed the bounds of legitimate zeal which are becoming and proper in a solicitor who has his client's interests at heart. He seems to me to have been a deal more active in the matter than he was called on to be. I am of opinion that the learned judge below was right, and that Mr. Plant ought to be held liable to pay the costs in this case.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—This point, which involves a very small amount of money—viz., £135—has been argued at great length and at enormous cost, wholly disproportionate to the money at stake. That has arisen, in part, by reason of the fact that the Misses Sager have been represented by eminent counsel; the solicitor, Mr. Plant, has been represented by eminent counsel; and Stephen Midgley has been represented by eminent counsel; and for two whole days points have been discussed, of importance, no doubt, but many of which it is not necessary to determine so as to adjudicate safely on the point in issue.

The sole point is, whether or not Stephen Midgley, who is a co-executor with the widow of John Midgley, the testator, was entitled on the 26th of May, 1892, to pay over the sum of £135, which he got out of the assets of the testator, to the Misses Sager. I will go at once to the material parts of the case. The law applicable to what is a devastavit or not is clear; and nobody has disputed that. If an executor pays what he ought not to pay he is guilty of a devastavit, except in one particular case, and that is this, that if he has the plea of the Statute of Limitations in his pocket he need not plead it. But, with that exception, if the executor pays what he ought not to pay, he is guilty of a devastavit. What happened here? On the 9th of April, 1892, Mr. Plant, for the Misses Sager, took out an originating summons for the purpose of administering the estate of the deceased man, Mr. John Midgley, and of obtaining for the Misses Sager this sum of £135. Whether that was a debt justly due at that time or not I do not pause to inquire. As to that, statements have been made at the bar on the one side and the other. Mr. Channell says it was not, that there had been accord and satisfaction, and so on. The other side says, no, there was no accord and satisfaction, and it was justly due. We have not now to decide whether the debt was at that time a good debt or a bad one, or could be proved to have been paid at that time. But when this originating summons was taken out, one of the executors, the executrix, the widow, pleads the Statute of Limitations, and says, "Your debt of £135 accrued six years before the summons was taken out." Mr. Stephen Midgley, apparently through the instrumentality of Mr. Plant, did all he could to defeat that plea which the widow determined to set up; because, as I understand, Stephen Midgley swore an affidavit in which he said the debt was justly due, and that he wanted to pay it out of the assets of his testator. I do not pause to inquire why he wanted to do that. Reasons can be suggested which I can see; but the judge of the Palatine Court who heard the summons came to a conclusion the debt was a debt which could not be recovered in a court of law, and that the statute was a bar to the whole of the proceedings, and therefore gave judgment for the defendant, the executrix, at any rate, if not for both executors, on that summons. Mr. Plant knew this; the Misses Sager knew this, that is, if Mr. Plant ever told them; and Stephen Midgley I expect knew this, because he had sworn an affidavit in the matter. What did they do? Having been defeated on this originating summons, they then found out that there were some moneys standing to the credit of the dead man's estate, which I understand were the proceeds of a policy, and Mr. Plant, together with Stephen Midgley, who had been defeated and told by a court of competent jurisdiction that this debt could not be recovered in any court of law, set to work and got this sum of £135 out of the proceeds of these policy-moneys, and transferred it into the account of Mr. Plant to the credit of his clients, the Misses Sager. Ought Stephen Midgley to have done that? It is said that at the time this was done Stephen Midgley was an executor who had only the defence of the Statute of Limitations, and that, inasmuch as he was not bound to set up the statute, he was entitled to make this payment out of the assets of his testator, which I have already mentioned. Here comes the real point of the case. Was Stephen Midgley at this time in the position of an executor who only had the Statute of Limitations to rely on? It seems to me he clearly was not; and that he was in a far better position than an executor who only had the statute to rely on. Because what had he? He had, first of all, an adjudication by a judge of a court of competent jurisdiction that the debt had accrued more than six years before summons. He had an adjudication of a court that there had been no acknowledgment to take the debt out of the statute; he had the adjudication of the court that there was no payment to take it out of the statute; and he had an adjudication of the court that six years had run and that the defendants had not been beyond the seas; or, in other words, he had an adjudication that the statute was a bar to any action that the Misses Sager could bring. I think it is manifest that this could be pleaded as res judicata; and if I wanted to refer to any authority for that I should refer to the case of Newington v. Levy, and the judgments of Martin, B., Bramwell, B., and Blackburn, J., in that case, all of whom say this, that not only what you do set up in an action, but what you could have set up in an action before judgment, is concluded by the judgment, and cannot be reopened afterwards in litigation between the same parties. So I say here, this executor, Stephen Midgley, had, beyond all doubt, more than the plea of the Statute of Limitations; he had an adjudication which he could set up against any claim which was made by these two ladies, the Misses Sager, for this £135. That being so, if I am right in that, it seems to me that the case of In re Rownson, Field v. White in the Court of Appeal has concluded the matter, because in that case the court—to use the words of Fry, L.J., in delivering judgment—said that this exception of the Statute of Limitations which an executor need not set up is an anomaly. In that case the question was whether the executor was bound to set up the Statute of Frauds, and the court held that he was. If a man had at his command a plea which would be a plea in bar, as I hold Stephen Midgley had, I cannot distinguish this case from that of Field v. White. I fully agree with the judgments which fell from the Lords Justices in that case—namely, that the doctrine that the executor was not bound to set up the plea of the Statute of Limitations is an anomaly, and is not to be extended. That is firm ground. That was the view of Romer, J., and I agree with him. That brings me to the point whether Stephen Midgley was guilty of a devastavit when he paid the money under the circumstances which I have narrated. My answer is, yes. So much for Stephen Midgley.

Then comes the question about the Misses Sager and Mr. Plant. On that I have nothing to add to what has fallen from the Lords Justices who have preceded me. It seems to me that Mr. Plant was the originator of all this, that he had the money under his control, although it was held for the benefit of the Misses Sager, and that, therefore, they were necessary parties. I will only add that all that Lindley, L.J., has said has my full acquiescence.

HOWITT v. EARL OF HARRINGTON. (a.)

Quit rent payable in respect of copyhold tenement—Non-payment—Statutes of Limitation (3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27, ss. 2, 3, and 37 & 38 Vict. c. 57, s. 1).

A quit rent payable in respect of a copyhold tenement is liable to be barred under the Statutes of Limitation.

Point of law.

This action was, in September, 1892, brought by a copyholder and her tenant against the lord of the manor of Sawley, in Derbyshire, of whom the copyhold tenement was held, for a declaration that a quit rent payable in respect of the copyhold tenement, and which had not been paid for fifteen years, was barred by the Real Property Limitation Acts (3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27, and 37 & 38 Vict. c. 57), and for an injunction to restrain the defendant from a threatened distress for the arrears of the quit rent.

The point of law as to whether the copyhold quit rent had been extinguished under the above-mentioned Acts was by consent set down in the action under ord. 25, r. 2, of the Rules of the Supreme Court, 1883, and was now heard and determined.

The statute 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27, enacts, in section 1: That the words and expressions hereafter mentioned, which in their ordinary signification have a more confined or a different meaning, shall in this Act, except where the nature of the provision or the context of the Act shall exclude such construction, be interpreted as follows; and then it says: "The word 'rent' shall extend to all heriots and to all services and suits for which a distress may be made, and to all annuities and periodical sums of money charged upon or payable out of any land (except moduses or compositions belonging to a spiritual or eleemosynary corporation sole)." Section 2 provides "that after the 31st day of December, 1833, no person shall make an entry or distress or bring an action to recover any land or rent but within twenty years next after the time at which the the right to make such entry or distress or to bring such action shall have first accrued to some person through whom he claims; or, if such right shall not have accrued to any person through whom he claims, then within twenty years next after the time at which the right to make such entry or distress or to bring such action shall have first accrued to the person making or bringing the same." Section 3 contains enactments as to the time when the right is to be deemed to have first accrued: "that is to say, when the person claiming such land or rent, or some person through he claims, shall in respect of the 'estate or interest' claimed have been in possession or in receipt of the profits of such land or in receipt of such rents, and shall while entitled thereto have been dispossessed or have discontinued such possession or receipt, then such right shall be deemed to have first accrued at the time of such dispossession or discontinuance of possession, or at the last time at which any such profits or rent were or was so received." Then there are certain instances given. The period of twenty years mentioned in section 2 was reduced to twelve years by section 1 of the Real Property Limitation Act, 1874.

Beale, Q.C., and L. Jenkins, for the plaintiffs.—The defendant's right is barred by the Acts. Quit rents are rents of assize, and are chief rents payable in respect either of freeholds or copyholds. These rents were within the statute 32 Hen. 8, c. 2: Eldridge v. Knott, 1 Cowp. 214. The Acts apply to freehold quit rents: Owen v. De Beauvoir, 16 M. & W. 547, 5 Ex. 166; Earl of Chichester v. Hall, 17 L. T. O. S. 121. Copyhold quit rents are also within the Acts. The text-books, both old and modern, have never drawn any distinction between the two kinds of quit rents in this respect: Scriven on Copyholds, 2nd ed., vol. 1, p. 419, 6th ed., p. 209; Cruise's Digest, 4th ed., tit. 31, c. 2, pl. 45; Blackstone's Commentaries, pl. 3, p. 189, note 3; Bacon's Abridgment, Copyhold, M. 238; Elton on Copyholds, 6th ed., pp. 211-214. The report of the commissioners on which the real property statutes passed in 1832-3 were founded shows that the commissioners intended to include copyhold quit rents in the Real Property Limitation Act, for they distinguished between ancient and conventional rents (such as rents under leases or agreements), and recommended that the Act should apply to such ancient rents. Copyhold quit rent is within the very wording of 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27, s. 2, for it is rent payable out of land, which, by section 1, includes copyholds. Conventional rents are not within the statute: Grant v. Ellis, 9 M. & W. 113; neither are heriots: Lord Zouche v. Dalbiac, 23 W. R. 564, L. R. 10 Ex. 172. Perpetual rents, however, are within the statute: Irish Land Commission v. Grant, 33 W. R. 357, 10 App. Cas. 14, 27. It is not necessary that there should be disseisin for the Act to apply, and if Grant v. Ellis has decided that it was necessary, the reasoning in that case does not support that decision. Mere denial, which is not disseisin (Coke upon Littleton, 160 b), is sufficient: Owen v. De Beauvoir; Adnam v. The Earl of Sandwich, 2 Q. B. D. 485, 25 W. R. Dig. 148. There is no analogy between copyhold quit rents and leaseholds, but freehold and copyhold quit rents are alike in many respects. The lord has the same remedies in both cases: Booth on Real Actions, 2nd ed., p. 263; Watkin's Copyholds, 4th ed., vol. 2, p. 140; North v. Earl of Strafford, 3 P. W. 148. They have the same origin; the lord has an estate at common law in both kinds of quit rents; Gilbert on Tenures, 5th ed., p. 402; Watkins on Copyhold, 4th ed., vol. 2, p. 139. A copyholder may prescribe in fee against his lord: Viner's Abridgment, 2nd ed., Copyhold, p. 224; In re Lidiard's Contract, 37 W. R. 793, 42 Ch. D. 254.

able in respect of ancient freeholds, which are separate tenements, although they pass with the manor: Elton, p. 11. They are incident to the lord's reversion, and are therefore similar to leasehold rents: Gilbert on Tenures, p. 308; Laughter v. Humphrey, Cro. Eliz. 524; Bennet's case, 2 Strange, 786. Rolfe, B., in Grant v. Ellis considered that the word "rent" in section 2 of the Act of 1833 was to be confined to rents existing as an inheritance distinct from the land, and the question is, therefore, whether the lord has an interest in the rent as distinguished from the land out of which it issues. Although a copyholder may possibly prescribe against his lord as regards matter adverse to his tenure, he cannot do so with reference to the incidents of his tenure. The point was not decided in In re Lidiard's Contract. The old Act of Limitation (32 Hen. 8, c. 2) applied to copyholds: Tarrant v. Hellier, 3 T. R. 162, 172-3, but it could only apply to suits in the lord's court: Gilbert on Tenures, p. 309; and did not apply to services: 1 Scriven on Copyholds, 4th ed., p. 481, 2nd ed., p. 419. It is doubtful whether copyholds came within 32 Hen. 8, c. 37, which enabled executors to distrain for arrears of rent: 2 Watkins on Copyholds, pp. 182, 195; Appleton v. Doily, Yelverton, 135; Lane v. Alexander, Brownlow, 140; 6 Vin. Abr., p. 168, plac. 2; Gilbert on Tenures, p. 298. There is no case which has decided that a copyholder can acquire the freehold merely by adverse possession: Turner v. Guardians of West Bromwich Union, 9 W. R. 155. These rents are analogous to tithe payments, which were held not to be affected by the 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27, as between the titheowner and the tithepayer, because that Act only applied as between adverse titheowners: Dean of Ely v. Cash, 15 M. & W. 617; Dean of Ely v. Bliss, 2 De G. M. & G. 459. Although in Irish Land Commission v. Grant Lord Selborne seems to have doubted the correctness of those decisions, we submit that they are correct: Payne v. Esdaile, 37 W. R. 273, 13 App. Cas. 613. The lord's right to the rent is not barred as long as the relation of landlord and tenant exists: Archbold v. Scully, 9 H. L. Cas. 360, 10 W. R. H. L. Dig. 5; for the lord's estate is in the property, and not in the rent which issues out of it: Prescott v. Boucher, 3 B. & Ad. 849; North v. Earl of Strafford; Shuttleworth v. Garnett, Carth. 90. Eldridge v. Knott is not an authority that a copyhold rent is liable to be barred, because there the tenement was a freehold tenement.

Beale, Q.C., was not called upon to reply.

STIRLING, J.—This action raises a short question of law, namely, whether where a quit rent payable in respect of a copyhold tenement has not been paid for the last fifteen years—that is roughly the period—the right to it is barred by the Statute of Limitations, 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27, as amended by the Real Property Limitation Act, 1874. The earlier Act is an Act "for the limitation of actions and suits relating to real property, and for simplifying the remedies for trying the rights thereto." [His lordship then referred to sections 1, 2, and 3 of the Act, and continued:—] Shortly after the passing of that Act questions arose as to what sort of rents the statute applied to. The statute having been passed in 1833, the question arose in the case of Paget v. Foley, 2 Bing. N. C. 679, although it was not decided, as to whether rents reserved on leases fell within the statute. Tindal, C.J., says this: "If we were bound to decide whether or not the cases fell within 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27, I should say there are strong reasons for thinking that it does not include the present case. That statute is entitled, 'An Act for the limitation of actions and suits relating to property and for simplifying the remedies for trying the rights thereto'; which seems more pertinent to rents that are a charge on the land than to mere conventional rents." Then he refers to other considerations that go to that effect. In the case of The Dean of Ely v. Bliss Lord St. Leonards says, 2 De G. M. & G. 472: 'I think it clear, from repeated consideration of it, that 'rent' in the sense in which it is spoken of in the 2nd section means rent of inheritance, and that it does not mean rent reserved by a lease, for example, a rent in the common and ordinary form, or a render of rent for property." And the decisions have gone to this. In the case of James v. Salter, 3 Bing. N. C. 544, it was held that an annuity accruing by will fell within the 2nd section of the statute, and that although the 3rd section did not contain any provision as to rent accruing by will. That section says: "And when the person claiming such land or rent shall claim in respect of an estate or interest in possession granted, appointed, or otherwise assured by any instrument (other than a will) to him." Then there is a certain provision as to the time at which the right is to be deemed to have accrued. Upon that it was argued that the operation of the 2nd section was limited to the cases which were enumerated in the 3rd section. Tindal, C.J., says this:—"When this case was originally before the court upon a motion for a new trial after the rule had been made absolute upon a ground perfectly distinct from that which is now before us, an opinion was expressed by the judge then in court that the present case was excluded from the operation of the 2nd section by reason of its not being comprehended within the 3rd; which 3rd section appeared to us, upon a more hasty view, to contain an enumeration of instances to which only the 2nd section could be held to be applicable. For myself, however, I am ready to admit, and I am authorized at the same time to say the same for my three brethren who were then in court, that the further argument which we have heard on this point, when brought directly before us for judgment upon the record, and the further opportunity for consideration which has been afforded us, has induced us to alter the opinion we then formed, and that we think (in which my brother Vaughan entirely concurs with us) that this case is governed by the 2nd section of the statute, which, under the facts found in the special verdict, affords a bar to all claim and title to the annuity. That the case must have been governed by the 2nd section, if that section had stood alone, cannot be doubted; and upon a more close examination of the 3rd section the object and intent of it seem to us to be no more than this: to explain and give a construction to the enactment contained in the 2nd clause as to 'the time at which the right to make a distress for any rent shall be deemed to have first accrued,' in those cases only in which doubt or difficulty might occur; leaving every case which plainly falls within the general words of the 2nd section but is not included amongst the instances given by the 3rd to be governed by the operation of the 2nd."

Then in the case of Owen v. De Beauvoir it was held that a quit rent payable in respect of a freehold tenement was liable to be barred by the operation of section 2 of this statute. Now there is no decision precisely in point as regards a quit rent payable in respect of a copyhold tenement; but if, as was decided in Owen v. De Beauvoir, a quit rent payable in respect of a freehold tenement falls under section 2 of the Statute of Limitations, to which I have referred, and is liable to be barred by non-payment, it is extremely difficult to see why a quit rent payable in respect of a copyhold tenement should not be equally barred; and the burden appears to me to lie upon those who assert that it is not. Now the ground really on which it is said that this rent payable in respect of a copy-

hold tenement is not barred by the statute is based on some language used by the Court of Exchequer in Grant v. Ellis, which decided that the statute did not apply to rent reserved on a lease. In dealing with the case and in arriving at the same conclusion as suggested by Tindal, C.J., in the first case I mentioned of Paget v. Foley, 2 Bing. N. C. 679, the court dealt first of all with the 2nd section, and they said: "In order to come to a just conclusion as to the meaning of the word 'rent' as used in the two sections to which we have referred, it is important first to consider what is the meaning of the word 'recover' as used in the 2nd section. The enactment is that no person shall make an entry or distress, or bring an action to 'recover' any land or rent, but within twenty years, &c. Now so far as relates to land the word 'recover' in this passage clearly means the same thing as 'obtain possession or seisin of.' The clause assumes one party to be in wrongful seisin or possession of land to which another has the right, and then limits the time within which the right must be asserted. If such be the meaning of the word 'recover' when used with reference to one of its objects, 'land,' it is very reasonable to suppose that the Legislature intended it to have the same meaning in respect of the other object, 'rent.' It is true, indeed, that with respect to an incorporeal hereditament like rent there cannot be strictly any wrongful adverse seisin or possession by another. If A. claims and receives the rent due to B., B. has still the same right against the terre-tenant as if no payment had been made to A. The receipt of rent by A. is not inconsistent with possession of the same land by B. But still, before the passing of this Act a party seised of rents, whether rents service, rent-charges, or rents seck, might, in case the rent was paid to another or withheld from him, consider himself, if he thought fit, as being disseised of such rent. And a party electing to consider himself so disseised might have the same remedy by an assize to recover seisin of his rent as a party disseised of land might have to recover seisin of his land. The judgment in each case was the same, 'quod recuperet seisinam'; and in each case the party was entitled to a writ of habere facias seisinam," and so on. Then the court goes on:—"Now we are of opinion that it is to this sort of recovery only that the 2nd section of the statute has reference, for such is clearly the meaning of the word 'recover' when used with reference to land; and the plain grammatical construction requires us to give it the same meaning when applied to rent, unless, which is not the case here, some manifest absurdity or inconvenience should result from our so doing. It follows from hence as a matter of course that the word 'rent' in the 2nd section must necessarily be confined to rent, which might in its nature have been the object of such a recovery, and this certainly does not include the rent reserved on common leases for years. According to our view of this case, therefore, even if the 2nd section stood alone, we should have been of opinion that the pleas in bar afforded no answer to the defendant's cognizance, and consequently that he was entitled to judgment in his favour." I stop there to remark that that passage has been commented upon by Lord Selborne in the House of Lords in the case of the Irish Land Commission v. Grant, 10 App. Cas. 14. His lordship, at p. 26, says this:—"The points decided in Grant v. Ellis was that the word 'rent' in the statute did not mean a conventional rent reserved by a lease, which is undoubted law. Among other reasons for that conclusion one was founded upon the use of the word 'recover' in the 2nd section, which the court considered to refer to 'that sort of recovery which, before the passing of the Act, was open to a party seised of rents, whether rents service, rent-charges, or rents seck,' who might 'in case the rent was paid to another or withheld from him, consider himself, if he thought fit, as being disseised of such rent,' and who 'electing to consider himself so disseised might have the same remedy by an assize to recover seisin of his rent as a party disseised of land might have to recover seisin of his land; the judgment in each case being the same, quod recuperet seisinam.' I am far from understanding this (as Smith, M.R., appears to have understood it: see 10 Ir. Eq. Rep. 418) as meant to imply that the application of the statute, in cases of rent, as between the owner of the rent and the person 'withholding' it 'from him' could after the abolition of real and mixed actions by section 36 of the same statute, depend in any way upon the form of proceeding for the assertion or recovery of the right." Therefore, having regard to that, I think the passage from Grant v. Ellis that I have just read is not to be treated as indicating that in order to bring the case within the statute you must have the same mode of proceeding for the assertion or recovery of the right as existed prior to the passing of the statute; but the rents to which such forms of procedure were applicable give a general indication of the nature or sort of rents in respect of which the statute is to apply. Then Lord Selborne continues:—"If it had been said in Grant v. Ellis as to rents of inheritance generally that the 2nd section of the statute did not apply to any case of mere non-payment of rent or to any action by the owner of a rent against the person liable to pay it, it would be necessary to determine whether this or the contrary law laid down in the prior case of James v. Salter and the subsequent case of Owen v. De Beauvoir was correct. There can be no doubt, I think, of the correctness of the decisions in James v. Salter and Owen v. De Beauvoir" (so that the correctness of those decisions is recognized in the House of Lords), "which determined that the right to distrain or bring an action for a quit rent or other perpetual rent is within the 2nd and 3rd sections of the statute, and may be barred by non-payment for twenty years before distress or action. Rolfe, B., who delivered the judgment in Grant v. Ellis, concurred in the decision of Owen v. De Beauvoir, which was affirmed in the Exchequer Chamber. The mere use of the word 'distress' (as well as 'entry' and 'action') in the 2nd section would have appeared to me to show that this must have been the intention of the Legislature."

Now, then, let us consider for one moment whether the quit rent payable in respect of a copyhold tenement is more analogous to a quit rent payable in respect of a freehold tenement, or to a rent reserved on a demise. To propound such a question seems to be almost to answer it. A quit rent payable in respect of a copyhold is perpetual; it is not limited for a period of time such as is the rent reserved by a lease for a term of years. It is a rent (as is put in the cases of Paget v. Foley and Dean of Ely v. Bliss) of inheritance. The origin of a quit rent in respect of freeholds and in respect of copyholds is exactly similar. If authority be wanted for that it is enough to mention the passage from Gilbert on Tenures, which has been referred to in the course of the argument: "A lord of a manor may avow for the rent or service of his copyholder in any court at Westminster; for he has an estate at common law in the rent, and not a customary estate; and it is due to him upon the same grounds and reasons in law as the rent of freehold lands is." Lastly—and this is not immaterial—it is not a rent which, as between the person to whom it is due and the person by whom it is payable, can be made the subject of agreement like the rent in a lease. In that respect it is similar to a quit rent payable in respect of freehold land. The Statute of Quia Emptores has prevented the owners of freehold lands from granting out their lands in consideration of perpetual rents, or rather from reserving to themselves perpetual rents because they may be granted in respect of a rent-charge, which is a different thing. The Statute of Quia Emptores does not apply to copyholds; and it is true that when copyhold land comes back to the hands of the lord he may grant it out afresh, but he is bound to do so in the same way as it had been granted before. I will read a few words on that point from Mr. Elton's Law of Copyholds and Customary Tenures of Land. He says (2nd ed., at p. 211): "When the copyhold comes into the hands of the lord it has been shown that he may regrant it as copyhold, provided that he has created no common law interest in the land higher than a tenancy at will. Upon a grant of this kind he may alienate the tenement by parcels, and apportion the rent and services, but he must not alter them in any other way, as he is 'custom's instrument,' and is not permitted to create what would in effect be a new copyhold. He can neither add to nor diminish the ancient rent, nor make the minutest variation in other respects." Now it seems to me that these are most material matters in considering whether the quit rent payable in respect of copyholds is more analogous to a quit rent payable in respect of freeholds than to rent reserved upon a demise for a term of years of land. There is no doubt one difference between quit rents payable in respect of freeholds and quit rents payable in respect of copyholds. The freehold in the case of copyholds remains in the lord, the immediate freeholder, just as in the case of demises for years it remains in the grantor. Great stress has been laid upon that, and I have been referred to a subsequent passage in the judgment in Grant v. Ellis as justifying the distinction between quit rents payable in respect of copyholds and those payable in respect of freeholds. It is to be observed that that passage occurs when the court proceed to deal with the 3rd section, and not when they are dealing with the 2nd section.

I have already referred to Paget v. Foley as showing that the limitations which are introduced in the 3rd section, being introduced alio intuitu, are not to be treated as limiting the effect of section 2. But, further, Rolfe, B., proceeds to say, in Grant v. Ellis: "In the 3rd and some other sections the Act proceeds to define the time in most, though (as is noticed by Tindal, C.J., in the case of James v. Salter) not in all possible, cases, at which the right to make a distress for the purpose of recovering any rents, shall be deemed to have first accrued to the party making the same. The first case put is that of a party who has himself, in respect of the estate or interest claimed, been in possession of the rent, and who afterwards has been dispossessed, or has discontinued the receipt of the rent. The estate or interest claimed must, according to the context, mean the estate or interest claimed in the rent, and not in the lands out of which the rent issues. Now a person entitled to the rent reserved on a common lease for years has no estate in the rent at all: Prescott v. Boucher; he is entitled to the rent when it from time to time becomes due, as being an incident to his reversion, and not because he has any estate in the rent itself. He is himself the freeholder of the land, and can, therefore, have no estate in rent issuing out of the land." This is the passage relied on largely by the learned counsel for the defendant in this case, but one must not omit to read the passage that follows:—"The word 'interest,' indeed," (for the words in the statute are 'estate' or 'interest,' and not 'estate' only) "is of so large and comprehensive a nature as perhaps to embrace the right which the reversioner has in the rent as incident to his reversion; still that interest can in no fair sense be described as the interest claimed. What is claimed by a landlord distraining for rent on a common lease for years is the amount of the arrears, wholly irrespective of the extent of his estate or interest in the reversion, as an incident to which the right to those arrears has accrued; what he 'recovers' by his distress is the amount due for arrears of rent, and will be the same whether he is tenant in fee simple, tenant for life, or tenant for years. The statute in this branch of section 3 clearly looks to the party recovering the same estate or interest of which he was previously possessed and of which he had been dispossessed, and this is altogether inapplicable to a distress for rent incident to a reversion expectant on a common lease for years."

Now, it is said that here the rent is incident to what is termed the reversion or the legal freehold, which is vested in the lord. The question is, Is that so? Has the lord got an estate in his rent? On that Gilbert, C.B., in the passage I have already cited, distinctly says he has an estate at common law in the rent. That, it would seem to me, is enough for me to act upon and to justify me in holding that the first of the two passages I have read from Grant v. Ellis does not apply, but, at all events, it appears to me it does show this—that the lord has such an "interest" if he has not an estate in the rent as brings him within the words "estate or interest." If it be not an estate it is so near it that one of the most learned judges, a distinguished writer on English law, has failed to observe the distinction between them. It seems to me that, in this case, what is here claimed is the interest or rent which the defendants had before the plaintiff or his predecessor in title ceased to pay, and that the words in section 3, "estate or interest," are applicable to a distress for such a rent, although they are "altogether inapplicable to a distress for rent incident to a reversion expectant on a common lease for years."

I think, under these circumstances, the interpretation of the statute, which is a modern statute, has been fixed for me with reasonable clearness; and I therefore hold that these quit rents are much more analogous in their nature and properties to a quit rent payable in respect of freehold land than to a rent reserved on a demise, which is the only exception that is to prevail from the operation of section 2 of the statute. In my judgment, therefore, the plaintiffs are right, and the point of law must be decided in their favour.

Held, that the charge created by the judgment, though enforceable against the estate tail of H. W. A., was not so enforceable in exoneration of the testator's personal estate.

Adjourned summons.

On the 16th of December, 1884, judgment was recovered against the testator, John Hollis Anthony, for £1,550 and costs. On the 22nd of January, 1885, a writ of elegit was duly issued, by virtue of which the sheriff delivered to the judgment creditors certain lands in Essex belonging to the testator.

By his will, dated the 7th of February, 1886, the testator specifically devised these lands to William Hollis Anthony.

The testator died on the 13th of February, 1890. William Hollis Anthony survived the testator and died intestate, leaving Henry William Anthony his heir-at-law.

On a former summons in the action (reported 40 W. R. 316, [1892] 1 Ch. 450) his lordship held that the case came within Locke King's Acts, and that the devisee was not entitled to have the judgment satisfied out of the testator's personal estate. Subsequently to the decision of the above summons it was discovered that the testator was not entitled in fee to the lands devised to William Hollis Anthony, but was tenant in tail of them under a settlement. It also appeared that on the testator's death the lands devolved, under the limitations of the settlement, upon William Hollis Anthony during his life, and on his death upon Henry William Anthony as his issue in tail.

The judgment creditors having been paid out of the personal estate of the testator, the plaintiff, the executor, and one of the residuary legatees sought to succeed to their rights against the land, and took out this summons asking for an order upon Henry William Anthony to execute a disentailing assurance of the lands.

Vernon Smith, for the plaintiff.—The writ of elegit is binding against these lands by virtue of section 13 of 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, and the decision on the former summons remains good: Jenkinson v. Harcourt, 2 W. R. 688, Kay, 688. Henry William Anthony should execute a disentailing assurance: Lewis v. Duncombe, 20 Beav. 398, 4 W. R. Ch. Dig. 42.

C. E. E. Jenkins, for another residuary legatee.

Warrington, for Henry William Anthony.—Locke King's Acts do not apply to the present facts at all. The former decision cannot stand.

Cur. adv. vult.

KEKEWICH, J.—The discovery since this case was last before me that, as regards part of the property, Henry William Anthony succeeded thereto, not as heir of his father, but as tenant in tail under an old settlement, does not effect my decision, but renders it inoperative as regards this particular item. Even as regards that, the decision stands to this extent, that the judgment debt is charged thereon. The language of the statute (1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, s. 13) expressly extends to land of which the judgment debtor is tenant in tail, and the charge is enforceable against successors in title not claiming through him but under a prior settlement. There is no longer any room for the application of Locke King's Acts, which operate only between the persons taking through the debtor his real and personal estate, but the question arises whether, apart from these Acts, the charge is enforceable as against the estate tail to the exoneration of the testator's personalty. The argument in support of the claim that it is so enforceable was based on Jenkinson v. Harcourt, it being contended that as, according to the words of the statute, the judgment debtor must be taken to have agreed to charge this property with the judgment debt, the inference is that he intended to do so in exoneration of his personal estate. It must, so the argument runs, have been to his benefit to make the charge on that which would pass from him on his death rather than on that which would remain subject to his testamentary dispositions, and the court must give effect to his presumed intention to do that which was best for his own estate. It would, I think, be straining the doctrine of Jenkinson v. Harcourt too far to extend it to a charge effected, not by any act of the debtor postulating an exercise of his will, but by a statutory provision attributing to the intervention of a stranger an agreement by the debtor, into which he never in fact entered. The summons asks that the tenant in tail may be directed to execute a proper disentailing assurance of the property in question. There is authority, Lewis v. Duncombe, for this being done, and had the applicant's case been established I should, of course, have followed that authority, notwithstanding a doubt (on which I will not enlarge) whether a disentailing assurance is necessary. For the reasons above given it ought not, in my opinion, to be directed here. On the hearing of the summons some further points were partially argued, but I upheld Mr. Warrington in saying that they were not properly before me, and could not conveniently be disposed of on the available materials. The summons is refused with costs.

Cur. adv. vult.

June 17.—The judgment of the COURT (CHARLES and VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, JJ.) was read by

CHARLES, J.—In this case the Assessment Committee of the St. George's Union sought to prohibit the County of London Sessions from further proceedings in the matter of an appeal by the London County Council against the valuation list of the parish of St. George, Hanover-square, made and deposited in accordance with the Metropolis Valuation Act, 1869, by the overseers of that parish on or about the 31st of May, 1890, and finally settled by the assessment committee on or about the 29th of October, 1890. The respondents in the appeal were the assessment committee and the surveyor of taxes of the district comprising the parish, but he did not appear. Notice of appeal was given by the London County Council on the 14th of January, 1891, against the valuation list, on the ground that the totals of the rateable and gross values in the parish were too low. Cases were lodged by the county council and the assessment committee in accordance with the practice of the quarter sessions on or before the 1st of February, 1891, but the appeal, owing to the pressure of business in the court, did not come on to be heard before the 31st of March, 1891. The main contention of the applicants was that on that day the jurisdiction of the court to hear appeals came to an end by effluxion of time, and whether this contention be well founded or not depends entirely on the construction which ought to be placed on the Valuation of Property (Metropolis) Act, 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 67). The jurisdiction formerly exercised under that statute by the assessment sessions has, it is true, been transferred by the Local Government Act, 1888, to the County of London Sessions; but they exercise it under the same conditions as those under which it was formerly exercised by the Assessment Sessions.

By section 32 of the Act of 1869 an appeal against the valuation lists of the various parishes is given to a court of general assessment sessions to (amongst other persons) any ratepayer in the metropolis and any body of persons authorized by law to levy rates or require contributions payable out of rates if they or he feel aggrieved, by reason (1) of the total of the gross value of any parish being too high or too low; (2) of the total of the rateable value of any parish being too high or too low; or (3) of there being no approved valuation list for some parish. Section 24 enacts that the court shall consist of three justices for Middlesex and two each for Surrey, Kent, and the City of London, and that "the said justices shall be appointed in the month of October in every year or at such other time as may be from time to time fixed by the appointing body. They shall hold office for twelve months beginning on the 1st of November, and any casual vacancy may be filled up by the appointing body." By section 26 the court is given power to adjourn from time to time as may be necessary for the performance of their duties under the Act, and it is provided that they should conduct their proceedings, be convened, and be in the same position as near as might be as if they were a court of quarter sessions. The justices in assessment sessions had by section 35 power to appoint a person to make a valuation list where none has been made by the parish authorities and approved. By section 36 they could on an appeal direct a valuation to be made of any particular hereditament, and by section 37 it was enacted that "where the court appoint a person to make a valuation list or a valuation they may fix some subsequent day either before or after the day before which all appeals are required by this Act to be heard for receiving such valuation list or valuation, and may adjourn the hearing to that day." By section 40 an appeal on questions of law is given to the superior court. Section 42 enacts: "With respect to the times within which proceedings under this Act and the Acts incorporated herewith are to be done the following provisions shall have effect—that is to say, (13) the justices may hold the assessment sessions at any time after the 1st of February, which will enable them to determine all appeals (except where a valuation list or valuation is ordered) before the ensuing 31st of March." Other sub-sections appoint dates for the making and deposit of the valuation list, for its transmission to the assessment committee, and final approval by them. These last-mentioned provisions were held in Reg. v. Ingall, 25 W. R. 57, 2 Q. B. D. 199, to be directory only, but there is nothing in the judgment delivered by Mellor and Lush, JJ., to indicate that they considered all the other sub-sections directory also. On the contrary, we gather from the language used, especially by Lush, J., that the court was of opinion that whilst the particular dates mentioned in the Act for the deposit, transmission, and final approval of the list need not be absolutely adhered to, the whole of the year's appeals must be disposed of before the 31st of March in each year. There is certainly nothing in this decision to compel us to hold that sub-section (13) is directory as well as sub-sections (1), (2), and (8), with which the court was there dealing; and, although we find in the introductory words of the section a general statement applicable to all the sections to the effect that the proceedings "are to be done" within the times prescribed, it appears to us by no means to follow that in each sub-section the words used must necessarily be construed in the same manner.

We must inquire whether in each particular case the words are directory or imperative, and in order to determine the question must have regard to the general scheme and other sections of the statute. Now the scheme of the statute seems to us clearly to point to the valuation list being finally fixed before the commencement of each financial year (i.e., before the 6th of April), except in the two cases where a new valuation is ordered or where a case has been stated for the opinion of the superior court. Section 43 enacts that "the valuation list as approved by the assessment committee, and if altered on any appeal under this Act to any sessions or a superior court as so altered, shall come into force at the beginning of the year (commencing on the 6th of April) succeeding that in which it is made, and shall last for five years, subject to any alterations that may be made by any supplemental or provisional list as hereinafter mentioned." A supplemental list is to be made in each of the first four years of the quinquennial period, the first of such periods beginning on the 6th of April, 1871, showing the alterations which have taken place in the previous twelve months, and in each of the last four years the valuation list is to be the original list, together with the new supplemental list (section 46). A provisional list is provided for by section 47 to meet the cases of hereditaments reduced or increased in value during the course of any year, and when made is to be deemed to form part of the valuation list then in force. By section 45 the valuation list is made conclusive evidence of the gross and rateable value of the hereditaments included therein for a large number of rates besides the poor rate, and also for taxes levied under the House Tax and Income Tax Acts. It would be highly inconvenient, in our opinion, having regard to these enactments, to read sub-section 13 of section 42 otherwise than as imperative. Unless the 31st of March in each year is regarded as an absolute limit, an appeal such as that now in question might be heard at any time during the quinquennial period, and even after its expiration, with the possible result of inflicting grave injustice by imposing on the general body of ratepayers of one year the burden of another, a result in direct contravention to the general principle of rating law, that the burdens of each year should be borne by the ratepayers in that year, a principle which forbids a retrospective rate unless specially provided for. And the hearing might, in such a case, for example, as the present, be almost indefinitely protracted; for the county council, in support of their contention that the parish total is too low, have challenged upwards of 3,000 individual assessments, all of which the parish propose to defend. The duration of such an inquiry it is impossible to predict, but it is certain that it would be of great length, and the valuation list of the parish would thus remain for months, if not years, in an indeterminate condition. Other sections of the Act, as well as the terms of sub-section 13 of section 42 itself, lead to the same conclusion. Thus the power to adjourn the hearing of an appeal given by section 34 is expressly limited "to any day not later than the day before which all appeals to them are required by this Act to be heard." The same phrase is used in section 37 above referred to, whereby the court is set free from the time restriction with regard to receiving a specially prepared valuation list. Section 44, indeed, contemplates the possibility of an appeal being pending at the commencement of a financial year, and provides that, notwithstanding the pendency of such an appeal, the valuation list shall come into force unaltered. But though the words are general, they are satisfied by reference to the cases mentioned in sections 37 and 40, where there has been a revaluation ordered, or where an appeal has been made to a superior court. We may add that the exception introduced into sub-section 13 of section 42 is meaningless unless the other words of the sub-section are held to be imperative. It was strongly urged upon us that to adopt this construction will deprive the parties aggrieved of the right of appeal given to them by the Act, and it cannot be denied that our decision will lead to that result. But we must consider the balance of convenience, and weigh against the detriment which may or must arise to individuals the serious inconvenience and injustice to the ratepayers which a contrary holding would entail.

The question whether the Legislature intends a provision to be imperative or directory must depend in each case on the scope and object of the enactment, and, having regard to the general scheme of the statute and to its express provisions, we have no doubt the Legislature intended, and has sufficiently expressed its intention, that no appeal (with the specified exceptions) should be heard after the 31st of March in each year. Many decisions on other Acts were referred to, but they furnish us with little, if any, assistance, and do not affect the conclusion at which we have arrived. Two other points were raised by the applicants. They contended that the county council, in their capacity of a "body of persons authorized by law to levy rates or require contributions payable out of rates in the metropolis," had sustained no appealable grievance by reason of the total of the gross and rateable value of a particular parish being too high or too low. In any case their precept for contribution would be satisfied. On the other hand, it was argued that the grievance might be appealable though not pecuniary, and that undue inequality of assessment was in itself a statutory grievance of which the county council could complain. Further, it was contended by the applicants that on an appeal against totals the individual assessment cannot be challenged, but that matters of principle only can be raised, such, for example, as a deduction from gross value in excess of the maximum allowed by the Act. (See section 52 and schedule 3.) To this it was replied that there is nothing in section 32 to limit the appeal, and that the most effective way of challenging a total is to challenge the constituents of which it is composed. Both these matters are of wide importance, but in the view we take of the question of time it is unnecessary to pronounce any opinion upon them.

For the reasons we have given we think that the jurisdiction of the court to hear this appeal came to an end on the 31st of March, 1891, and therefore make this rule absolute, with costs.

Avory objected that the court had no power to give costs when the rule was made absolute.

The question of costs was then reserved for further argument.

June 20.—CHARLES, J..—We have carefully considered the question of costs, and we consider, on the authority of Wallace v. Allen, 23 W. R. 708, L. R. 10 C. P. 607, that we have power to give costs, and we give costs accordingly.

The point as to the costs was not then further argued, as it was understood that the whole question would come before the Court of Appeal.

Rule absolute, with costs.

LONDON AND WESTMINSTER LOAN CO. v. LONDON AND NORTH-WESTERN RAILWAY CO. (a.)

Landlord and tenant—Rent payable in advance if required—Reasonable notice of demand.

The effect of the words "rent payable quarterly, always, if required, a quarter in advance," in an agreement of tenancy is to make the rent payable a quarter in advance throughout, and the landlord is entitled to payment, or, in default, to distrain for the rent of the current quarter at any time during the currency of the quarter on giving reasonable notice of his demand. The question of the reasonableness of the notice is one of and must depend upon the particular circumstances of the case.

This was an appeal by the defendants from a decision of Judge Bacon at the Bloomsbury County Court.

The plaintiffs were the holders of a bill of sale over certain furniture belonging to a tenant of the defendants, and being in the house which they had let to him in Euston-square. By the agreement of tenancy between the defendants and their tenant, dated July 24, 1891, rent was reserved at the rate of £90 a year for the first year, and afterwards at the rate of £85 a year, payable quarterly on certain specified days, and "always, if required, a quarter in advance." The agreement also contained a provision for re-entry in the event of any one quarter's rent, or any part thereof, being in arrear and unpaid for one week after it should have become due and payable by virtue of the agreement without the necessity for any previous demand.

On the 8th of December one quarter's rent was already in arrear and another was nearly due, and on that day the furniture was about to be sold by an auctioneer on behalf of the plaintiffs when the defendants demanded their rent up to the end of the current quarter, threatening a distress. The amount was paid by the plaintiffs under protest that the sale might proceed, and the present action was brought in the county court to recover back the sum so paid.

The county court judge decided in favour of the plaintiffs, and the present appeal was brought.

Leigh Clare, for the appellants.—This rent being due in advance the defendants were entitled to demand it, or, in default, to distrain for it: Witty v. Williams, 12 W. R. 755; Williams v. Holmes, 1 W. R. 391.

Ernest Pollock, for the respondents.—Witty v. Williams and Williams v. Holmes were decided upon words very different from those used in the present case. Under any circumstances a reasonable notice of the demand ought to have been given.

He also cited Mallam v. Arden and Others, 10 Bing. 99; Brighty v. Norton, 11 W. R. 167, 3 B. & S. 305; Toms v. Wilson, 11 W. R. 117, 4 B. & S. 455; Ex parte Trevor, In re Burghardt, 24 W. R. 301, 1 Ch. D. 297.

Leigh Clare, in reply.—From the first this rent was reserved a quarter in advance. The reasonableness of the notice must have reference to the circumstances of the case, and a notice must not be required which would enable the tenant to remove his property and defeat the object of the provision.

GRANTHAM, J.—I am of opinion that the county court judge was wrong in his view of the law. Where the terms are as clear as they are in this case the rent is throughout payable a quarter in advance, all that is necessary is to give notice to the tenant. Here the rent for the current quarter was due on September 29 instead of December 25, in accordance with a clause which is often put into agreements of this kind, though it is not often enforced. But the landlord must give notice that he requires the payment in advance. What notice? It must be a reasonable notice. What is a reasonable notice? That must depend on the particular facts of each case, and on the evidence here I think the notice was reasonable in view of the fact that the goods were being, or about to be, removed, and were actually in the hands of someone who was authorized to take them away.

WRIGHTMAN WILLIAMS, J.—This is a matter between landlord and tenant which will probably arise again, and there should be no doubt as to the basis of our decision. Mr. Clare must succeed in showing that the rent was throughout due in advance; if he had to say that the landlord had a right to alter the day, so as to make rent due in advance which was originally due at the end of the quarter, he would be in a great difficulty; but it seems to me that we ought to hold that these words do mean that the rent was reserved due a quarter in advance. But it is only to become payable on notice, which it is plain must be a reasonable notice. The reasonableness is a question of fact which I should not have decided at all but that I suppose we have the power to take upon ourselves the function of jurymen that we may put an end to this case.

"THE GLENLIVET." (a.)

Insurance—Marine insurance—Meaning of "burnt" in memorandum of policy.

Where a ship has sustained damage by reason of fire, she is not "burnt" within the meaning of the memorandum in a marine insurance policy unless the injury resulting from the fire is sufficient to cause some interruption of the voyage so that the ship is thereby temporarily unnavigable, that is, for the time incapable of being properly used for the purposes of her voyage.

This was an action on a marine insurance policy on the steamship Glenlivet, instituted on behalf of the Glenlivet Steamship Co. (Limited) against John Henry Titcombe, to recover amounts of particular average admittedly caused by the perils insured against, but by reason of the operation of the memorandum in the policy not chargeable against the defendant unless the ship had been "burnt or stranded" within the meaning of the terms of such memorandum.

The action now came on for hearing on the point of law whether, on the admitted facts, the warranty in the memorandum precluded the plaintiffs from recovering judgment in the action.

It was admitted that the warranty in the memorandum debarred the plaintiff from recovering unless the court should be of opinion that The Glenlivet had been "burnt" within the meaning of such memorandum by reason of the following facts: that on one of the voyages on which she was insured under the policy sued on, certain coals on board her had taken fire, and the fire had been extinguished without any damage to The Glenlivet; and that on two occasions on other of the voyages on which she had been so insured, a fire had occurred on board her, which had done some damage to the structure of the ship, but the voyage of the ship had not been interrupted, and the amount of the damage done by fire had been within the percentage referred to in the memorandum.

BARNES, J.—This is the second case in which the procedure adopted, first in the case of The Alps, [1893] P. 109, recently decided by me, has been followed. I need add nothing to what I said in that case as to the advantages of this procedure, except to point out that the present case has been heard within a fortnight of its commencement, and that the materials placed before me from which the facts are gathered consist only of a memorandum as to the points raised, and the policies, log-books, and surveys of The Glenlivet—in fact, such documents as an average stater would require for the purposes of an average adjustment.

The case raises a difficult question of construction of the memorandum commonly used in a Lloyd's policy. The question is as to the meaning of the term "burnt" in the memorandum. The claim on the first voyage is for a small average loss, under three per cent., from perils other than fire, and on the second and fourth voyages for small average losses to the vessel herself, under three per cent., partly from fire and partly from other perils insured against. First, I have, therefore, to determine whether the "ship" was "burnt" on any of the said voyages within the meaning of that term in the memorandum. Secondly, it is agreed that if the ship was burnt on any of the voyages the plaintiffs are entitled to recover for the loss occurring on the voyage or voyages on which the burning occurred, and that if she was not burnt they are not so entitled. As the memorandum originally stood when it was introduced into policies, about the year 1749, it did not contain the words "sunk or burnt." I am informed that they have been in use for over thirty years, and I find them in the policy in the case of the Great India and Peninsular Railway Co. v. Saunders, 1 B. & S. 41, 9 W. R. C. L. Dig. 43, decided in 1861. The memorandum was framed to protect the underwriters from frivolous demands in respect for small losses which are most likely to have arisen from natural deterioration or wear and tear, and the original exception of stranding tends to show that this was the scope of the memorandum. The framers had probably in view a casualty of so serious a nature as to be akin to wreck—that is, such a loss that makes it probable that the damage, though under the given percentage, might reasonably be attributed thereto, and not to the perishable nature of the subject-matter of the insurance. Several cases were decided upon the memorandum after its introduction, and for a time there was a difference of opinion upon its true construction; Lord Mansfield and Buller, J., holding that the words "unless general or the ship be stranded" constituted one exception, and that the claim should be read "free from average, except general average, and average occasioned by the ship having been stranded"; Ryder, C.J., and Lord Kenyon holding, on the other hand, that the words "or the ship be stranded" constituted a condition, so that if the ship be stranded in the course of the voyage the underwriters are liable for an average loss by perils insured against, though no part of the loss arise from the stranding. And so it was finally held, after full argument, in Burnett v. Kensington, 7 T. R. 210. If, therefore, the ship be stranded, the warranty against average or against average under five or three per cent. is destroyed, and in order to recover for damage, which but for the stranding would not have been recoverable, it is then not necessary to prove that the damage was occasioned by the stranding. The inquiry is to be, What condition of the ship constitutes a stranding? So also the inquiry in cases where it is said that the ship was "sunk or burnt" is, What condition of the ship satisfies the term "sunk" or "burnt"? There have been a large number of decisions upon the word "stranding," and in these, various definitions of the word may be found, but in my opinion there runs through them all, in a greater or less degree, the idea which was probably present to the minds of the framers of the memorandum, of a serious casualty to the ship affecting her safety and navigation, even though, as a matter of fact, the amount of damage sustained is unimportant. This idea is tersely expressed by Lord Ellenborough in the case of M'Dougle v. Royal Exchange Assurance Co., 4 M. & S. 503, there he says: "I take it that stranding, in its fair legal sense, implies a settling of the ship, some resting, or interruption of the voyage, so that the ship may pro tempore be considered as wrecked; from which misfortune a vast deal of damage does frequently arise." That is to say, the vessel becomes for a time in a condition in which she cannot be properly used for the purposes of her voyage, or is unnavigable. From the collocation of the words "sunk or burnt" with the word "stranded," and from the primary expression produced by reading these words "sunk or burnt," it is natural and reasonable to construe them upon the principle applied and with the idea prevailing in arriving at the proper meaning of the word "stranded."

The contention of the plaintiffs is that the ship is burnt within the true meaning of the clause if any injury whatever is done by fire to any part of the vessel or any part of her fittings or stores; in other words, if anything included in the term "ship" is on fire, for however short a time, or damaged by fire, however slightly. Mr. Aspinall illustrated his argument by quoting the saying, "A burnt child dreads the fire"; and argued that the meaning of the word in the policy was similar in effect to that, in that saying. Mr. Walton, not to be outdone on illustration, quoted the lines—

"This air of France, methinks, becomes us well; Let's burn our boats, for here we mean to dwell."

He did not, however, contend that the word "burnt" was to be construed in its primary meaning as given in dictionaries—viz., consumed by fire—so as to require a total consumption of the vessel by fire—but that the word would not be satisfied unless the burning was such as to render the vessel temporarily useless or unnavigable. There have been no cases on the word "sunk" except Bryant & May v. The London Assurance Corporation, 2 Times L. R. 591, the report in which only refers to certain observations by Grove, J., as to "stranding"; but my impression, from having been engaged in the case, is that the plaintiffs contended that the vessel had become so deep in the water that she could sink no more, and should be considered to have sunk. If I recollect aright, the vessel never for a moment ceased to be navigable, nor was the voyage interrupted; and I think that the suggestion that she was "sunk" was not, therefore, accepted. There are no decisions upon the word "burnt" in the memorandum in the policy, and it is a remarkable fact if, as Mr. Aspinall contended, the momentary setting fire to any part of a vessel—such, for instance, as cabin curtains or fittings—is enough to cause the vessel to be a "burnt" ship, and thereby to destroy the warranty, that the present contention has never been brought before the courts since the introduction of the words "sunk or burnt," though one would think that slight damage by fire was not infrequent on vessels, especially on large passenger vessels. Cases on the word "burning" in the Statute of frauds, 29 Car. 2, c. 3, s. 6, were cited to me in support of the plaintiffs' contention. They are not of much assistance in construing a mercantile document, but I may notice that Coleridge, J., in the case of Doe d. Reed v. Harris, 6 A. & E. 209, says, at p. 217, "the question is put whether the ship must be destroyed wholly, or to what extent? It is hardly necessary to say; but there must be such a injury with intent to revoke as destroys the entirety of the will, because it may then be said that the instrument no longer exists as it was"; and Lord Denman in the same case observed that doubt might be entertained whether the proof given in the case of Bibb dem Mole v. Thomas, 2 Wm. Bl. 1,043, where the will was slightly torn and slightly burnt, would now be deemed sufficient to establish the burning of the will.

It was argued for the plaintiffs that the defendants' construction of the word "burnt" in a policy on ship would make the memorandum practically useless, because a fire which reduced the vessel to such a state that she could not be properly used would always exceed three per cent., and the damage caused by such a fire would be recoverable whether the memorandum was inserted or not. But this argument omits the consideration that if the ship be "burnt" all damage under three per cent. would be recoverable, and also that these words, "sunk or burnt," being commonly found now, as I understand, in policies on all kinds of goods, if the ship is burnt average losses on goods which might otherwise be excluded would be recoverable under the policy. Again, this argument would permit of the recovery of all losses by fire under a policy on a ship, although there is a warranty against losses under three per cent., and would thus place the peril of fire in a different position from any of the other perils assured against. I cannot bring myself to think that it would be a reasonable or business-like construction of the word "burnt" to hold that the ship is burnt, if any part of her or her stores or fittings is slightly injured by fire, whether that fire is one which exhausts itself without danger to the vessel, or, as also was suggested, is one which unless promptly extinguished would cause danger to the vessel. In my opinion the more reasonable and business-like construction is that the ship is "burnt" whenever the injury by fire is sufficient to cause some interruption of the voyage, so that the vessel is pro tempore incapable of being properly used for the purposes of her voyage. This may be expressed by the term "temporarily unnavigable."

In the present case, on the first voyage the coals heated slightly, and water being poured on them, whatever fire existed was extinguished. Even assuming that coals are to be treated as included in the word "ship," which the plaintiffs alleged and the defendants did not deny, there was no interruption of the voyage, nor any interference in any way with the safety or navigation of the vessel. On the second and fourth voyages the heating of the coal caused some damage to the structure of the vessel, but again, there was no interruption of the voyage or any interference with the vessel's safety or navigation. I am of opinion that in none of the voyages was the ship burnt within the meaning of the policy, and that the defendant is entitled to judgment, with costs.

DUKE v. DAVIS. (a.)

Practice—Change of parties—Death of one of several defendants—Action remitted to county court—Application by administrator of deceased defendant to High Court—Summons to proceed or dismiss—Jurisdiction of High Court — Validity of order of remitter—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 17, r. 8—County Courts Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 43), s. 65.

An action was brought in the High Court against several defendants, whom it was sought to make severally liable on a contract. One of the defendants having died, the plaintiffs obtained an order remitting the action to the county court under section 65 of the County Courts Act, 1888. The action was tried in the county court against the other defendants, and judgment was given in their favour. The administrator of the deceased defendant applied to the High Court, under ord. 17, r. 8, for an order that the plaintiffs might be compelled to proceed with the action against him, or that, in default, the action might be dismissed against him.

Held (affirming the decision of the Divisional Court), that, the action having been remitted to the county court, the High Court had no jurisdiction to make an order.

The order remitting the action was not void; semble, it was not irregular.

Appeal from a judgment of a divisional court.

The action was commenced in the High Court against five defendants, who were alleged to be severally liable on a contract. On the 21st of July, 1891, one of the defendants, named Lowry, delivered his defence, and on the 24th of July he died intestate. On the 15th of January, 1892, the plaintiffs obtained an order under section 65 of the County Courts Act, 1888, remitting the action to the county court. The action was tried in the county court as against the other defendants, and judgment was given in their favour. On the 23rd of August, 1892, letters of administration to the estate of Lowry were granted to one Nicholson, who, on the 3rd of May, 1893, applied to the High Court for an order that the plaintiffs might be directed to proceed with the action as against him, or that in default the action might be dismissed as against him. It appeared that at the time when the action was remitted the solicitors for the plaintiffs had written a letter to the solicitors who had acted for Lowry, in which they said: "This action is remitted to the county court as against all the defendants except your client." Wills, J., before whom the application came at chambers, referred the matter to the court. The Divisional Court (Grantham and Bruce, JJ.) dismissed the application, on the ground that, the action having been remitted to the county court, the High Court had no jurisdiction to make any order.

The administrator of the deceased defendant appealed.

Cababé, for the administrator.—Ord. 17, r. 8, says: "When the plaintiff or defendant in a cause or matter dies, and the cause of action survives, but the person entitled to proceed fails to proceed, the defendant (or the person against whom the cause or matter may be continued) may apply by summons to compel the plaintiff (or the person entitled to proceed) to proceed within such time as may be ordered; and in default of such proceeding judgment may be entered for the defendant, or, as the case may be, for the person against whom the cause or matter might have been continued." The administrator rightly applied under this rule. The marginal note to the rule given in the Annual Practice, "Death of sole plaintiff or defendant," is not part of the rule, and it is incorrect. The administrator could only apply to the High Court. As far as he was concerned the action still remained in the High Court. The order remitting the action to the county court was, as regards him, null and void. On the death of the deceased defendant the action as against him was abated or suspended, and no step could rightly be taken in the action until his legal personal representative had been made a party to the action: Eldridge v. Burgess, 26 W. R. 435, 7 Ch. D. 411. Any order made in the action after the death of the deceased, and in the absence of any person to represent his estate, was ineffectual: In re Shephard, Atkins v. Shephard, 38 W. R. 133, 43 Ch. D. 131; see also Lloyd v. Dimmack, 26 W. R. 458, 7 Ch. D. 398. If the order remitting the action was good as against the other defendants, it could not affect the deceased or his estate. The letter of the plaintiffs' solicitors shows that it was not intended to do so.

He also cited Reg. v. Holroyd, 32 W. R. 370.

F. J. Lowe, for the plaintiffs.

BOWEN, L.J.—I am of opinion in this case that the judgment ought to be affirmed. The action was brought against several defendants on a contract on which they were alleged to be jointly and severally liable. One of the defendants died intestate a few days after he had delivered his defence. The action thereupon as against him ceased to have any existence until proper steps should be taken to bring in his personal representative as a party to the action. Without any such step having been taken, an order was made on the application of the plaintiffs remitting the action to the county court. The action then was an action against the other defendants solely, and it was tried in the county court as against those defendants, and judgment was given in their favour. The present appellant, who was subsequently appointed administrator of the deceased defendant, was unwilling to let the matter remain where it was, and he decided to do this—he treated the order of remitter as being void against himself, and applied to the High Court for an order that the action might be dismissed as against him, or else that the plaintiff might be compelled to take some further steps in the action. The plaintiff objected that the High Court had no jurisdiction to make any such order, the action having been remitted to the county court.

The argument presented to the Divisional Court on behalf of the administrator was that, inasmuch as the order remitting the action had been made after the death of the intestate and while his estate was unrepresented, such order should be treated as null and void as against him, and the court ought, on his, the administrator's, appearance, to treat the action for his benefit as if it were still in the High Court. The Divisional Court refused the application, and the administrator has appealed to this court. Is it true to say that he is entitled to treat what took place when the intestate was unrepresented as null and void? Assuming that on the death of the deceased defendant the action continued solely against the other defendants, and that, though his representative had a right to become a party to the action, until that was done the others alone were parties to the action, it seems to follow that the administrator is not in a position to take any objection to the making of the order; and that I take to be the true state of the case. But even if it were not so, it seems to me that the most the administrator could say now would be that as against him the order was irregular; he cannot say that it is void. It was open to him when he appeared, to be content with the order of remitter which had been made. If he was dissatisfied with it, the utmost he could have done was to ask to have it set aside, but he cannot ask the court to treat it as void. The argument which has been used rests on a picturesque illusion, that when a defendant dies the action is something more than an action against his co-defendants, that it continues to have an unsubstantial shadowy existence against the deceased man or with regard to his rights. The truth is that the action is abated as against him, and nothing remains except an action against the other defendants, though it may, on the application of his administrator, be revived against him. I think that in making the order remitting the action the court did what it had the power to do; but if the order was irregular, all the administrator could do would be to ask to have it set aside. I therefore think that the appeal must be dismissed.

KAY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The application is based on a misapprehension. When this defendant died, the action survived against the other defendants in respect of either the whole or part of the cause of action, but it was altogether dead as against the deceased. The only application which his personal representative could then make with regard to the action was such an application as the administrator is now making. As matters stood he was no party to the action; he was only entitled to apply that the plaintiff should make him a party. But he cannot now make such application in the High Court; for the action has been transferred to the county court, and every application in the action must be made in the county court. He treats the case as if there were a shadowy apparition of an action still existing in the High Court. But what was remitted was the whole action, and nothing of the action was left remaining in the High Court. If the order remitting the action was wrong, no doubt there must be some means of setting it right. But he does not say it was wrong, he says it was void. His argument must involve this, that, whenever a co-defendant in an action to enforce a joint and several liability dies, no order can be made in the action as regards the other co-defendants until the action has been revived against the personal representative of the deceased defendant. This appears to me to be untenable, and I am of opinion that if the administrator wished to have the action revived against him it was for him to make an application for that purpose, and he ought to have applied to the county court. Any step which the administrator could take in the action should have been taken by him in the county court. It has never been suggested that the action was not a fit one to be transferred to the county court; and it seems to me to be impossible to treat an action as divided—i.e., as being partly in the High Court and partly in the county court. I therefore agree that the appeal must be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

ZIERENBERG AND WIFE v. LABOUCHERE. (a.)

Defamation—Libel—Plea of justification—Particulars—Insufficiency of—Validity of plea.

A general plea of justification in an action of libel, where the libel complained of consists of a general charge against the plaintiff, is bad, unless the defendant, in his particulars, states specifically the facts upon which he relies in support of the charge.

Appeal from an order of the Queen's Bench Division directing the defendant to deliver further and better particulars.

The action was for libel. The alleged libel appeared in a newspaper called Truth, and referred to a Home for Female Inebriates kept by the plaintiffs, and stated, so far as material to this report, that the plaintiffs were "charity swindlers" and "impostors," and that the home was a "monstrous swindle." There were many other statements charged as libellous.

The defendant pleaded a general plea of justification to the whole. The defendant was ordered to give particulars of how and in what way the plaintiffs were "charity swindlers" and "impostors" and the home was a "monstrous swindle"; and in his particulars he stated that the plaintiffs, by the annual reports, prospectuses, and appeals issued by them, represented the home to be a Home for Female Inebriates, and invited subscriptions and donations on that representation, whereas in fact the home was conducted as a commercial undertaking for the benefit of the plaintiffs; and the facts and matters relied on were "that no proper system of books or accounts showing the receipts and expenditure of the home was kept, and that no proper vouchers were submitted to the auditors for the purpose of preparing the annual balance-sheets, and that the said balance-sheets do not show the real or entire receipts or expenditure of the home, and that the plaintiffs, by means of the home, were enabled to live free of expense to themselves, and that they appropriated for their own purposes moneys received for or earned by the home, and the time when the aforesaid facts and matters occurred was the whole time the home has been open since its institution in 1876." The master made an order that the defendant should deliver further and better particulars, setting out the receipt of moneys appropriated by the plaintiffs for their own purposes and not accounted for, and of the persons from whom and the dates when such moneys were received, and in what way the said expenditure of the home was not shown by the balance-sheets; and that unless the defendant delivered such particulars he should be precluded from giving any evidence in support of his justification of the statements in respect of which he did not supply the particulars ordered. The judge at chambers and the Divisional Court affirmed this order.

The defendant appealed.

Reid, Q.C., and J. E. Bankes, for the defendant, contended (1) that the particulars were sufficient; (2) that the defendant ought not to be ordered to give further particulars until after he had obtained discovery; and (3) that the particulars asked for would disclose the names of the defendant's witnesses.

They referred to I'Anson v. Stuart, 1 T. R. 748; Hickinbotham v. Leach, 10 M. & W. 361; Gourley v. Plimsoll, 21 W. R. 683, L. R. 8 C. P. 362; Leitch v. Abbott, 34 W. R. 506, 31 Ch. D. 374.

Sir Edward Clarke, Q.C., and C. C. Scott, for the plaintiffs.

Cur. adv. vult.

June 1.—Lord ESHER, M.R.—The plaintiffs brought an action of libel against the defendant, and they set out in their statement of claim the alleged libellous matter, which contained a great many separate statements. The defendant pleaded to the whole generally a justification. The plaintiffs thereupon took out a summons for particulars, and instead of asking for particulars generally, they adopted what seems to be a good practice—namely, asking in the summons for particulars of the special allegations in the libel of which they want particulars. The defendant thereupon gave certain particulars, and the plaintiffs are satisfied as to some, but as to others they complain that they are insufficient, being in reality no particulars at all. Now the defendant has pleaded justification to the whole. Strictly speaking, perhaps, he would be bound to prove justification of the whole, and if he failed to justify every part the plea would fail, and the plaintiffs would recover as if there were no plea of justification. That would, perhaps, in these days, be dealing with the matter too strictly, because the defendant is charged with several libellous statements, and he might separate those statements and plead a separate justification to each. If, therefore, we treat these separate statements as separate libels, and divide the plea of justification and apply it to each separate statement, we must then see the result of ordering the defendant to give further particulars.

That a general plea of justification without particulars is a bad plea has been settled law for many years. In I'Anson v. Stuart the headnote says that to print of any person that he is a swindler is a libel and actionable; and a justification of such a charge must state the particular instances of fraud by which the defendant means to support it. That is to say, if a person calls another a swindler, he cannot plead justification without setting out the particular instances of fraud, else the plea is demurrable. Ashurst, J., said: "When the defendant took upon himself to justify generally the charge of swindling, he must be prepared with the facts which constitute the charge in order to maintain his plea. Then he ought to state those facts specifically to give the plaintiff an opportunity of denying them, for the plaintiff cannot come to the court prepared to justify his whole life." That is a leading case upon the point. In those days it was necessary to insert the particulars in the plea. In later times the plea was left general, but before going to trial the defendant was bound to state in his particulars what had formerly been inserted in the plea—namely, the facts upon which he relied in support of his general statement. In Hickinbotham v. Leach Parke, B., said: "It is a perfectly well-established rule in cases of libel and slander that, where the charge is general in its nature, the defendant, in a plea of justification, must state some specific instances of the misconduct imputed to the plaintiff." Alderson, B., also said in the course of the argument that "the plea ought to state the charge with the same precision as in an indictment."

Now treating the statements complained of here as separable, we must see whether the order for further and better particulars is right. The defendant states that the plaintiffs are charity swindlers. He is asked for specific instances. Are his particulars sufficient? No doubt they state the mode in which the defendant is going to support his plea of justification, but they do not give specific instances, the occasions upon which the things happened, nor the names of the persons who were swindled. They are not sufficient. Under the old system the plea would be bad for want of specific instances inserted in the plea. Under the present system the plea is bad for want of sufficient particulars. We therefore agree with the Divisional Court that the defendant must give further and better particulars as to that part of the alleged libel, and if he does not give sufficient particulars the plea of justification as to that part goes, and he cannot give evidence in support of his justification as regards that part of the libel. It was then said that the particulars asked for were too minute, and therefore embarrassing, as the result would be to disclose the names of the defendant's witnesses. But if it is right that the particulars should be given, it is no answer to say that they will disclose the names of the witnesses. We only say that better particulars must be given, and the defendant must give the best he can. If by affidavit he says that he cannot give the names as he does not know them, that may perhaps excuse him. What is required of him is not too minute so as to embarrass him.

Then comes the last contention—namely, that the defendant ought not to be ordered to give the particulars until after he has had discovery. This is not a case in which there is a relation between the plaintiffs and defendant, such as the relation of principal and agent, or of partners, or of trustee and cestui que trust. There is no relation at all between them. I do not think that the defendant is entitled to discovery before he has fixed the issues in the pleadings. The general rule is that no court, whether of common law or equity, would allow discovery merely to enable the person asking for discovery to find out whether he has a case or not. Interrogatorries of that kind have been called fishing interrogatories, and this discovery may also be called fishing. I have said that there is no relation here between the parties, nor are there any special circumstances, such as when one party is keeping back what the other party ought to know. A bad plea is no plea at all; and therefore the general rule come to this, that discovery will not be granted until a good plea is on the record, or if the application is made by the plaintiff until a good cause of action is on the record. Here the general plea of justification is bad, there being no sufficient particulars, and until a good plea is on the record the defendant cannot get discovery either by interrogatories or otherwise. There being no relation between the parties here, nor any special circumstances to take the case out of the general rule, the obligation to give particulars cannot be held back until discovery is given. The defendant has, indeed, candidly admitted that he wants discovery in order to enable him to place a good plea on the record.

The case of Leitch v. Abbott was relied upon by the defendant; but there the relation of principal and agent existed between the parties, and so that case comes within the exception to the general rule. The appeal must therefore be dismissed. I desire to add this as regards a general plea of justification, that the plaintiff must ask for particulars, otherwise the plea would stand, just as under the old law if the plea were not demurred to, it would be treated as good.

BOWEN, L.J.—I am of the same opinion.

KAY, L.J., read the following judgment: The argument in this case, in our view of it, seems to involve the question whether mere suspicion can justify a libel. It is urged that the so-called particulars, which are in terms as general as the libel complained of, ought not to be made more definite at present, because, until the defendant has obtained discovery from the plaintiffs, he may not be able to give particulars in any better form. The defendant in a libel action may plead a justification; but it is no justification to plead simply that his alleged libel is true. That, as has been pointedly said, is not justification, but is merely repeating the libel: I'Anson v. Stuart. Accordingly, the practice required that the plea should state facts which justified the defendant in publishing the language complained of. This is clear from the decision in Hickinbotham v. Leach, and the authorities referred to in that case, viz.: Jones v. Stevens, 11 Price, 235; Newman v. Bailey, 2 Chit. Rep. 665; I'Anson v. Stuart; Holmes v. Catesby, 1 Taunt. 543.

It is said that the modern practice is not to state the facts relied on as a justification in the pleading, but to add them in particulars. I presume this is done under ord. 19, rr. 6, 7. But then the particulars should be as explicit as the plea was required to be before. If the defendant says that he is unable to state any such facts without discovery, the answer is simple and conclusive. He ought not to have published the libel, and cannot plead any justification for having done so. The case of a charge of fraud against an agent, or of breach of trust against a trustee, by pleading only, where no libel has been published otherwise, is essentially different. There the fiduciary relation, and the circumstance that the facts are generally known only to the defendant, or at least that he has means of knowledge not in the first instance equally accessible to the plaintiff, may justify the court in requiring the defendant to make discovery before the plaintiff is called on to give particulars, because the fiduciary relation of the defendant to the plaintiff entitles the plaintiff to all the knowledge which the defendant may have; and it is not uncommon, when a conflict arises between the right of the plaintiff to discovery and the right of the defendant to particulars, in such cases to postpone the giving of particulars until the discovery has been made: Leitch v. Abbott; Sachs v. Spielman, 36 W. R. 498, 37 Ch. D. 295. But to apply this practice to the case of libel would be to sanction the publication of a libel when the libeller knew no facts justifying the libellous statement, because he believed he could, by the process of discovery, elicit such facts.

It is urged, then, if the facts are stated before discovery is given, that the discovery will be limited to the particular facts so alleged. I am not satisfied that this will necessarily be so. I can conceive a case in which a libel in general terms may be justified by certain facts stated in the particulars, and that there may be power to obtain discovery of other analogous facts which may support the justification. But even if it were so limited, that is no reason why the particulars should not be as definite or explicit as the defendant can make them. It seems to me a much less evil, if it be an evil, to confine the discovery to the particular facts adduced as a justification than to give the smallest sanction to a libel unsupported by facts which justify the publication.

There is another obvious reason for requiring precise particulars, namely, that the plaintiff may know the case he has to meet and what acts it is alleged have been committed which justify the general charge against him. But this is a consideration not peculiar to libel cases.

I am of opinion that the particulars complained of are too general; that they are not particulars at all, but a mere repetition of part of the libel, and that further and better particulars ought to be given.

There remains the question whether the penalty, if better particulars are not given, is not, as it now stands, too large. A libellous statement as to which no particulars are given ought not to be allowed to be justified at all. But where some facts are stated in the particulars by way of justification, which may or may not be sufficient, it is argued that the defendant should not be prevented from relying on them at the trial simply because he has added a general statement which in itself is not sufficient. However, I am not satisfied that this argument applies in the present case. I do not think that any facts are stated as a justification in this case in the particulars complained of, and therefore the penalty imposed is not too large.

Appeal dismissed.

Appeal from a decision of Kekewich, J.

The defendants were lessees of Crown property. In 1826 a lease of it was granted by the Crown for ninety-nine years from 1815, to expire, therefore, if not previously determined, in 1914. In 1891 this lease became vested in the defendants. On the 5th of September, 1892, they surrended it to the Crown, and the Crown agreed to grant them a new lease of the same land on certain terms; and the defendants agreed to erect a new building on the land. By this agreement the defendants were to be responsible and to make compensation for, all damage which might be done with respect to (inter alia) all rights of air and light which any person might have over the land. Under that agreement the defendants were erecting the building of which the plaintiff complained. The plaintiff was the owner in fee of land adjoining the defendants' land. The plaintiff acquired his title in July, 1852, and he then built a house which he now sought to protect. He and his tenants had enjoyed access of light to that house for more than forty years—i.e., since 1852—without interruption. The light so enjoyed would be interfered with by the defendants' new building. The plaintiff issued his writ in this action in March, 1893—i.e., more than forty years after the commencement of his enjoyment, but within three years after the termination of the Crown lease of 1826 by the surrender above mentioned—for an injunction to restrain the defendants from erecting any building so as to obstruct his ancient lights. Kekewich, J., held that the plaintiff had not acquired an easement in fee against the Crown, but that he had acquired an easement against the lessees of the Crown for the residue of the term of ninety-nine years granted by the lease of 1826, and that the easement so acquired must be treated as subsisting as against the defendants until the year 1914, when the lease would have expired by effluxion of time if the defendants had not surrendered it. From that judgment the defendants appealed.

Section 2 of the Prescription Act provides: "No claim which may be lawfully made at the common law, by custom, prescription, or grant, to any way or other easement, or to any watercourse, or the use of any water, to be enjoyed or derived upon, over, or from any land or water of our said lord the king, his heirs or successors . . . when such way or other matter as herein last before mentioned shall have been actually enjoyed by any person claiming right thereto without interruption for the full period of twenty years, shall be defeated or destroyed by showing only that such way or other matter was first enjoyed at any time prior to such period of twenty years, but nevertheless such claim may be defeated in any other way by which the same is now liable to be defeated; and where such way or other matter as herein last before mentioned shall have been so enjoyed as aforesaid for the full period of forty years, the right thereto shall be deemed absolute and indefeasible, unless it shall appear that the same was enjoyed by some consent or agreement expressly given or made for that purpose by deed or writing."

Section 3 provides: "When the access and use of light to and for any dwelling-house, workshop, or other building shall have been actually enjoyed therewith for the full period of twenty years without interruption the right thereto shall be deemed absolute and indefeasible, any local usage or custom to the contrary notwithstanding, unless it shall appear that the same was enjoyed by some consent or agreement expressly made or given for that purpose by deed or writing."

Marten, Q.C., and Boome, were for the respondent.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 3.—LINDLEY, L.J.—The question raised by this appeal is whether the plaintiff is entitled to an easement of light over the land of the defendants. [His lordship stated the material facts set forth above and proceeded:—] The plaintiff's contention is (1) that section 3 of the Prescription Act applies to the Crown; (2) that, if not, it applies to the Crown's lessees, who have allowed access of light to be enjoyed over their property for twenty years without interruption; (3) that, if the plaintiff has not acquired a title by section 3, he has acquired such title by forty years' enjoyment under section 2 of the Act; (4) that at all events a lost grant ought to be presumed in his favour or immemorial enjoyment ought to be inferred.

Before considering the effect of the statute 2 & 3 Will. 4, c. 71 it is desirable to dispose of the points relied on by the plaintiff apart from that Act. A grant from the Crown as distinguished from its tenant cannot be presumed, for there has been no enjoyment against the Crown itself; and without it there is no foundation for such a presumption. A title by immemorial prescription is excluded by the known history of the plaintiff's house, which was built in 1852, during the pendency of the Crown lease. The Crown lessee might no doubt have granted to the plaintiff, his executors, administrators, and assigns, an easement over the land held under the Crown for the residue of the term created in 1826; such an easement, if so created, would bind the lessee, his executors, administrators, and assigns, for the residue of the term thereby created; nor could the lessee, or any one claiming under him, defeat the easement so created by surrendering the term. The lessee could only surrender such interest as he had at the time of the surrender, and the surrenderee could only acquire the same interest. See Doe v. Pyke, 5 M. & S. 146; Piggott v. Stratton. Moreover, in this respect the Crown would be in no better position than any other surrenderee. If, therefore, the plaintiff had acquired by a grant from the Crown's lessee an easement for the residue of the term granted by the lease of 1826 the surrender of that lease would not have destroyed such easement; and, notwithstanding the surrender, the easement would have continued, even as against the Crown, until 1914, when the lease would have expired by effluxion of time. But in this case there is no evidence of any grant of any easement by any lessee of the Crown; nor can I infer as a fact such a grant by any of the Crown's lessees.

But then it is contended that such a grant ought to be presumed as a matter of law. But this is not so. No such grant is required to account for the state of things which exists, nor is any fiction or presumption necessary to render legal, conduct of the plaintiff which would have been illegal without it. The plaintiff has simply been enjoying his own property, as he was perfectly entitled to do; and no presumption of any grant entitling him to that enjoyment in the past, or to similar enjoyment in future, can properly be made. It is true that it has been said that, after an uninterrupted enjoyment of light for twenty years, a covenant not to interrupt will be presumed (see Cross v. Lewis, 2 B. & C. 689, and Moore v. Rawson, 3 B. & C. 340). But I am not aware of any authority for presuming as a matter of law a lost grant by a lessee for years in the case of ordinary easements, or a lost covenant by such a person not to interrupt in the case of light, and I am certainly not prepared to introduce another fiction to support a claim to a novel prescriptive right. The whole theory of prescription at common law is against presuming any grant or covenant not to interrupt by or with anyone, except an owner in fee. A right claimed by prescription must be claimed as appendant or appurtenant to land, and not as annexed to it for a term of years. Although, therefore, a grant by a lessee of the Crown, commensurate with his lease, might be inferred as a fact, if there was evidence to justify the inference, there is no legal presumption, as distinguished from an inference in fact, in favour of such a grant. This view of the common law is in entire accordance with Bright v. Walker, where this doctrine of presumption is carefully examined.

The plaintiff's right to the easement claimed is thus reduced to the statute 2 & 3 Will. 4, c. 71. The section specially applicable to light is section 3, which excludes all fictions and presumptions of law and is a clear and simple enactment. Two questions arise upon this section in the present case, viz.:—(1) Does it bind the Crown? (2) Does it confer a temporary right against a lessee of the Crown, although not as against the Crown itself as reversioner? In Perry v. Eames it was decided that, although parts of the statute—viz., sections 1 and 2—bind the Crown, yet section 3 does not; the reason being that the Crown is expressly mentioned in sections 1 and 2, and is not mentioned in section 3. Upon reflection I am of opinion that this decision is correct. Considering the difference between enjoying light in one's own property and enjoying other easements in other people's property, and considering the great alteration made by section 3 in the law applicable to light, I cannot regard section 3 as a mere addition or proviso to or qualification of section 2. It is what it purports to be—viz., a fresh and independent enactment relating to a different kind of easement. The Legislature may well have thought right to bind the Crown when persons had been for many years actively asserting rights over its property, and may yet have purposely omitted to impose upon the Crown the obligation of not interfering with persons who never, in fact, interfered with it. The Crown is never bound by a statutory enactment, unless the intention of the Legislature to bind the Crown is clear and unmistakable, and this is by no means the case in dealing with the question of lights.

I come now to the last question—viz., whether section 3 has conferred an easement as against the Crown's lessee. So far as mere language is concerned, and apart from the nature of the subject-matter with which the section is dealing, I should see no difficulty in applying section 3 to all English subjects, whether lessees of the Crown or other people; I should see no difficulty in reading "absolute and indefeasible" as meaning absolute and indefeasible as against all persons to whom the section is applicable. But, if the section is so read, the consequence will necessarily be to create, by mere occupation and enjoyment, a class of easements which at common law could never have been acquired by prescription, but only by express agreement or grant. An easement for a term of years may, of course, be created by grant, but such an easement cannot be gained by prescription, and, not being capable of being so acquired, it does not fall within the scope of the statute 2 & 3 Will. 4, c. 71. The expression "absolute and indefeasible," as applied to easements of all kinds, coupled with the declared object of the Act, which is to shorten the time for prescription, shows that the easements dealt with were easements appendant or appurtenant to land, and which, when acquired, imposed a burden for ever on the servient tenement. This view of the statute was clearly expressed soon after it passed in Bright v. Walker, and, although some passages in the judgment of Parke, B., in that case have been criticized, and even dissented from, the broad view which underlies the judgment has never been disapproved. That view, as I understand it, is that the Act has not created a class of easements which could not be gained by prescription at common law, or, in other words, has not created an easement for a limited time only, or available only against particular owners or occupiers of the servient tenement. Such easements can only be created since the Act as before the Act—viz., by grant or by an agreement enforceable in equity, which for most purposes is as efficacious as a deed under seal. Such a grant or agreement must, moreover, be proved as a fact, and not be purely fictitious. It was contended that Bright v. Walker is inconsistent with Frewen v. Philipps, but this is a mistake attributable to the wording of the head-note. In that case the plaintiff had acquired the easement he claimed, not only against the defendant, the adjoining tenant, but also against his lessor, although the plaintiff and the defendant both held under the same landlord. Similar observations apply to Mitchell v. Cantrill and to Robson v. Edwards.

Although the expression "other easement" occurs in section 2, I concur in the view generally hitherto adopted, and judicially held to be correct, in Perry v. Eames—viz., that light is not included in section 2, but is governed entirely by section 3 and the subsequent sections which have to be read with it. I may, however, observe that if section 2 were applicable to this case section 8 would be also applicable, and that, as the three years there mentioned had not expired before the writ was issued, the plaintiff's right would not have been absolute and indefeasible even under section 2.

It only remains to add that there are no circumstances in this case giving the plaintiff any equitable, as distinguished from legal, rights against the defendants. For the reasons I have given I am of opinion that the plaintiff has acquired no right to light under the statute or otherwise, and that the appeal must be allowed and judgment be entered for the defendants, with costs here and below.

LOPES, L.J.—The plaintiff contends that independently of the Prescription Act he can maintain his case on the ground that a lost grant ought to be presumed, and if not, at any rate, that enjoyment from time immemorial ought to be inferred. Both these contentions can be easily disposed of. For convenience sake the fiction of a lost grant is very often pressed into the service, but to presume a lost grant made by the Crown, or the lessees of the Crown, since 1852, and lost, would be overtaxing the credulity of the most credulous, and would be making a demand too extravagant even for the elasticity of this patient and accommodating fiction. As for enjoyment from time immemorial, how can that be presumed when it is an admitted fact that the house now claiming the right, only came into existence in 1852? The head of the prescription is cut off, and this contention of the plaintiff fails.

I will now deal with the Prescription Act, 2 & 3 Will. 4, c. 71. The plaintiff says he has acquired an absolute and indefeasible right by his enjoyment as of right without interruption for forty years of the access of light to his house. It is to be observed that the Crown is mentioned in the second section, and would be bound. If the plaintiff can bring his case within it he will succeed. But there are two answers to his contention, 1st, that section 2 does not apply to an easement of light; and, 2nd, if it did, the plaintiff would be met by the 8th section of the Prescription Act, which gives the reversioner three years next after the end of the term within which to resist the claim. Three years had not elapsed after the determination of the lease by surrender previously to the issue of the writ. Is the easement of light within section 2? It is true the expression "other easement" occurs in section 2. But it was held by Chitty, J., in Perry v. Eames, in his lucid judgment delivered in that case, that the words "other easement" did not apply to an easement of light which is governed exclusively by section 3, and subsequent ancillary sections. I entirely concur with that judgment and with the reasons for holding the easement of light not within the terms of section 2, but exclusively regulated by section 3 and subsequent sections. This disposes of the plaintiff's case so far as section 2 is concerned.

The plaintiff further contends that he has obtained an absolute and indefeasible right by forty years' actual enjoyment without interruption, under section 3. If the Crown was named in this section it would be bound, and the plaintiff's case would be established, but the Crown is not named, and is not bound. "Absolute and indefeasible" means absolute and indefeasible against the whole world. Unless the enjoyment gives a title against all persons having any interest in the locus in quo it gives no title at all. See Bright v. Walker. Frewen v. Philipps in no way conflicts with Bright v. Walker, for the title there acquired was absolute and indefeasible, being good against the reversioner and every person having any interest in the locus in quo. In the present case, however, the Crown, not being named in section 3, is not bound, and no absolute and indefeasible title is acquired good as it must be against every person interested: Perry v. Eames.

But the plaintiff says, if the Crown is not bound, at any rate the lessees of the Crown are bound, against whom the plaintiff had enjoyed access of light to his house for more than forty years. Undoubtedly this would be so if, as in Frewen v. Philipps, there was a reversioner who could be bound. But the easement suggested is a qualified and terminable easement. Such an easement could not have been claimed by immemorial prescription, and was not contemplated by the Prescription Act. An easement contemplated by the Act must be such as absolutely binds the fee in the land. The statute nowhere contains any intimation that there may be different classes of rights, qualified and absolute, valid as to some persons, invalid as to others. I cannot, therefore, agree with Kekewich, J., who has held that though the plaintiff has not acquired a title against the Crown, he has acquired a title against the lessees of the Crown for the residue of the term created by the lease of 1826, which easement would have existed until the expiration of the term by effluxion of time if there had been no surrender. Such an easement might have been created by a grant from the lessee of the Crown to the plaintiff. Such a grant would have bound the defendants and their successors in title for the residue of the term. If such a grant had been made before surrender it would not have been defeated by surrender, but would have stood good even against the Crown until 1914. The surrenderee, whether the Crown or a subject, would have taken subject to existing rights. It is not, and cannot be, pretended that any such grant was in fact made.

I am clearly of opinion that no title at all is conferred on the plaintiff. The appeal must be allowed and judgment entered for the defendants with costs here and below.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—Kekewich, J., held upon the facts that the plaintiff could not maintain any action founded either upon prescription at common law or upon an assumed lost grant, in both of which findings I agree, for, as said by Bramwell, L.J., in Duke of Norfolk v. Arbuthnot, 5 C. P. D. 392, 29 W. R. Dig. 76, as regards the prescription at common law, we know the whole truth, and prescription at common law is consequently not maintainable; and I also decline, as Kekewich, J., has done, in the circumstances of this case, to presume a lost grant either from the Crown or its lessee, for there are no facts from which I should infer a covenant not to obstruct the plaintiff's lights to have been granted by anyone. Lindley, L.J., has so fully dealt with this point that I have nothing to add.

The plaintiff can therefore only maintain his cause of action under section 3 of Lord Tenterden's Act of 1832 (2 & 3 Will. 4, c. 71), and it becomes necessary to ascertain what is the true construction of that section. That and the two preceding sections have been the subject of many decisions, and it appears to me to have been settled, firstly, that the words "or other easement" in section 2 do not include the claim to the use of light specially provided for by section 3. The suggestion that Lord Selborne thought otherwise in Dalton v. Angus, 30 W. R. 208, 6 App Cas. 798, is ill-founded. What he there stated was: "The expressed policy of the Act is large and general; it is to prevent claims of prescription from being defeated by showing a commencement within legal memory. Why should not this extend to other easements besides ways and water rights and lights, which (by section 3) are specially provided for and exceptionally favoured?" This is by no means a statement that section 2 embraced lights, but, on the contrary, that such are specially provided for and exceptionally favoured in section 3. Coleridge, J., in Truscott v. Merchant Taylors' Co., 4 W. R. 295, 11 Ex. 863, has stated that section 3 seemed to him to almost new found the mode of acquiring the right to access to light; and Lord Westbury, in Tapling v. Jones, 13 W. R. 617, at p. 618, 11 H. L. Cas. 290, at p. 304, said: "The right to what is called an ancient light now depends upon positive enactment"—i.e., section 3. Moreover, it has for many years been thought in the profession that section 3 was the section, and the only one, which dealt with lights. The point now argued, that section 3 is to be read as a proviso upon section 2, is in my judgment wholly untenable, as Chitty, J., has held to be the case in Perry v. Eames, in which I agree. It has been held, to use the words of Parke, B., "that section 3 converts into a right such an enjoyment only of access of light over contiguous land as has been had for the whole period of twenty years in the character of an easement distinct from the enjoyment of the land itself, and that the statute puts this species of negative easement, as it has been termed, on the same footing in this respect as those positive easements provided for by the other sections, all of which, after long enjoyment as easements, are invested with the quality of rights," Harbidge v. Warwick, 3 Ex. 552, at p. 556. In my judgment it is too late now to argue either of the above-mentioned propositions, and, what is more, I think that they have been rightly decided.

The question which arises, therefore, is, Has the plaintiff for the whole period of twenty years enjoyed in the character of an easement the access of light without interruption over land contiguous to his dwelling-house so as to have acquired a right within section 3.

If this contiguous land had belonged to a subject the answer would have been yes, but the contiguous land is the land of the Crown and not the land of a subject, and that raises what, to my mind, is the real point in this case—viz., Does section 3 apply at all to a case where the land over which the enjoyment has taken place is the land of the Crown, even though it has been for years in the occupation of a subject who is lessee of the Crown. As I have before said, section 3 in this Act has to stand alone; it is not to be read, as suggested by Mr. Marten for the plaintiff, as a proviso upon section 2, in which section the Crown is named; and, applying the well-known rule, the Crown not being named in section 3, neither it nor its lands are bound thereby. Chitty, J., in the case of Perry v. Eames had to decide whether the Crown was bound by section 3. I have fully considered the judgment. He came to the conclusion that the Crown was not bound, and with his reasons and conclusions I entirely agree. If, then, the enjoyment of the access and use of light over land contiguous to the plaintiff's dwelling-house for a period of twenty years is only converted into a right which the plaintiff can enforce by reason of the provisions of section 3, and that section does not apply to an enjoyment in the nature of an easement over lands of the Crown, how can it be said that the section gives any right to the plaintiff, for it is only over Crown lands that he is now seeking to enforce such right?

It is argued that though this may be so as regards the Crown if the lease had run out and the Crown was obstructing the plaintiff's light, yet it is said that the section applies to and binds the lessee of the Crown so long as the lease remains, because he and his predecessors as lessees have permitted the uninterrupted enjoyment of the access and use of the light to the plaintiff's dwelling-house, and he is the person who is now raising the obstruction to the lights. This position Kekewich, J., has held to be well founded, and decided that the defendant, the lessee, was bound by the section so long as the lease existed. I own that at first sight this appears plausible, but when examined it seems to me to be unsound and to be concluded by authority. I have pointed out that to constitute the right claimed by the plaintiff under the section the access and use of the light must have been enjoyed in the character of an easement. The case of Bright v. Walker over fifty ago decided that the section nowhere contains any intimation that there might be different classes of rights qualified, and absolute, valid as to some persons and invalid as to others, and held that when the enjoyment is of the character of an easement, and it cannot give a valid title against all persons having estates in the locus in quo, the statute gives no right at all even against a lessee during the continuance of the term. Parke, B., in delivering the judgment of the court distinctly lays this down; he says, at pp. 220, 221: "The important question is whether this enjoyment, as it cannot give a title against all persons having estates in the locus in quo, gives a title as against the lessee and the defendants claiming under him or not at all"; and he answers this question by saying, "No title at all is gained by a user which does not give a valid title against all" and permanently affect the fee—which in this case would be in the Crown. In other words, a person cannot obtain an absolute and indefeasible right within the meaning of the statute unless by the user he can get a right against all. If he does not, he gets no absolute and indefeasible rights within the section. The present case falls directly within this decision, which, as regards this point of the statute, has never been impugned. The case of Frewen v. Philipps and the two Irish cases cited by Mr. Marten in no way affect the construction of the statute as regards this point, and, inasmuch as the plaintiff cannot make out a title against all, he cannot make out a title against any, and consequently he cannot avail himself of the section; and in my judgment this action fails against the defendant, who is lessee of the Crown. The appeal must be allowed.

Appeal allowed.

Section 164 of the Companies Act, 1862, which enacts that that shall be a fraudulent preference in the case of a company which would be a fraudulent preference in the case of an individual trader, cannot be construed as having imported into it section 38 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, so as to prevent, by allowing mutual credits, any transaction from being a fraudulent preference which would otherwise be so.

Decision of Vaughan Williams, J. (that no fraudulent preference was established), reversed.

The following statement of facts is taken from the judgment of Lindley, L.J.

This is an appeal by the liquidator of this company against an order of Vaughan Williams, J., dismissing an application made by the liquidator against Colonel Underwood and Mr. M'Keand, two of the directors of the company. The application was for an order to compel them to repay to the company two sums of £70 each. These sums were paid by the two gentlemen in question to the company in respect of the amounts unpaid on the shares held by them, and were immediately repaid by the company to them in respect of arrears of fees due to them as directors. The repayments are alleged by the liquidator to have been invalid under section 164 of the Companies Act, 1862, which relates to fraudulent preferences. Vaughan Williams, J., held that no fraudulent preference was established. Hence the appeal. The appeal raises some questions of fact, and also an important question of law. The questions of fact are —(1) whether the directors paid themselves their fees at a time when the company was unable to pay its debts as they became due; and (2) whether they paid themselves with a view to give themselves a preference over other creditors of the company (section 48 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883). The question of law is whether the mutual credit clause, section 38, in the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, is to be applied to cross claims between a limited company and its members in respect of calls, so as to render valid a payment by the company, which, but for that clause, would be a fraudulent preference. The facts are as follows. The company was formed in June, 1889, to buy and work some mines in South Africa. Its nominal capital was £100,000, divided into 100,000 shares of £1 each. Of these 65,000 were offered to the public, and, according to the prospectus, the shares taken by the public ought to have been paid for by instalments, the last of which became payable on the 31st of March, 1890. I will assume that in July, 1891, Colonel Underwood and Mr. M'Keand owed the company £70 each in respect of their shares, though no calls were ever, in fact, made pursuant to the articles of association. The vendors of the mines were paid partly in shares of the company and partly by three bills of £1,000 each. Two of these bills were due before the 21st of July, 1891, and were then unpaid. The other bill fell due on the 4th of September, 1891, and was then dishonoured. As collateral security for those bills, the vendors held sixty debentures of the company for £50 each, bearing interest at 5 per cent. from the 1st of March, 1890, but no interest was ever paid in respect of them. Whether the debentures were themselves due and payable on the 21st of July, 1891, I do not know. The interest in arrear certainly was. Part of the capital had been underwritten by various persons; but as early as March, 1890, it became apparent that they would pay nothing unless compelled, and in April, 1890, writs were issued against them. A test case to determine their liability was proposed, but nothing was got, or in truth could be got, from them before the winding up commenced. Out of about 20,800 shares allotted to the public only about £1,220 was ever received by the company. The company never did any business in the way of mining. The Government royalties were not kept down, and on July 21, 1891, £1,820 was due in respect of them. The cash standing to the credit of the company at its bankers from June, 1890, to September, 1891, was ludicrously small; in June, 1890, it was as low as £2 1s. 5d., and there was not enough to pay the most pressing demands made against the company, small as some of them were. Messrs. Lord & Co., the auditors, could not get their fees, amounting to £15 15s; Caldicott & Bell, the company's agents in South Africa, could not get paid a sum of £18 15s. 7d. due to them; Barnett, a creditor for about £90, pressed in vain for payment of the amount due to him; and Farmer, the company's solicitor, could get nothing in respect of costs due to him and which he wanted to be paid. Petitions to wind up were threatened in the autumn of 1890, and on October 31, 1890, notices were issued convening a meeting to consider the expediency of winding up and reconstructing the company. The sum standing to the credit of the company at its bankers was then reported to be £2 1s. 5d. The reconstruction scheme came to nothing. In June, 1891, Barnett presented a petition to wind up the company; the directors, however, put the company in funds to pay him off, and he was got rid of; they had previously found the money to pay off Lord & Co. On the 21st of July, 1891, the balance at the company's credit was reported to be £2 0s. 11d. At that time Farmer had resigned his appointment as solicitor; his bill amounted to £215; he offered to take £100 in satisfaction of his claim, and the secretary informed him on the 22nd of July that the company was not in a position to make any payment at present. The company's own money, in fact, consisted of what it could get from its shareholders and those who had underwritten its capital; and they would not pay. One of them, however, a Mr. Counsel, afterwards paid £900 into court in the winding up of the company, and this may be regarded as a good asset, though not available in July, 1891. It is true that the vendors and some of the other creditors were not pressing for payment, but Farmer was, and the Government claims for royalties required immediate attention, as the mines were in danger of being forfeited. Such being the financial position of the company, Mr. M'Keand, one of the directors, on the 21st of July, 1891, paid £70 to the company, being the amount due on his shares, and on the same day the company paid him a cheque for £70 on account of his fees. At or about the same time similar payments were made by and to Colonel Underwood, another director These payments by the company were made by cheques signed by Colonel Underwood and Mr. M'Keand. On the 5th of September a petition to wind up the company was presented by Counsel, a shareholder, and the company is being wound up under an order made on this petition.

Buckley, Q.C., and Kenyon Parker, for the appellant.

Farwell, Q.C., and J. G. Wood, for Colonel Underwood.—This payment to the directors by the company would not be a fraudulent preference in the case of an individual trader, for there might be set-off under section 38 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, and that section is, in effect, incorporated in section 164 of the Companies Act, 1862, and the benefit of it applies as well to a company in a winding up as to an individual trader in a bankruptcy.

F. Dodd, for Mr. M'Keand, used similar arguments.

Kenyon Parker, in reply.—Every case which would be a fraudulent preference within section 48 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, without taking into account the mutual credit section (38), and as if that section did not exist, is a fraudulent preference within section 164 of the Companies Act. [He referred to Kent's case, 36 W. R. 818, 39 Ch. D. 259.] [LINDLEY, L.J.—The substance of what Cotton, L.J., says on the point is that section 164 of the Companies Act incorporates section 48, but not section 38, of the Bankruptcy Act.]

Cur. adv. vult.

June 12.—LINDLEY, L.J. [after stating the facts as above set forth; and holding that the proof that the company at the time of the transactions complained of was unable to pay its debts as they became due out of its own money was overwhelming; that it had no means whatever of paying Colonel Underwood and Mr. M'Keand their fees unless they first furnished the funds by paying up their shares; that each of the transactions which were impeached was an attempt by these directors to pay up their shares without really parting with any money, and that the circumstances compelled the conclusion that the payments by the company to them were made deliberately to give them a preference over the other creditors; proceeded:—] Now comes the question of law. If the company were an ordinary bankrupt trader to whom the mutual credit clause (section 38) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, was applicable, the preferential payments to Mr. M'Keand and Colonel Underwood could not be avoided by the trustee in bankruptcy, because they would have injured no one. The two debts could have been set one against the other after the bankruptcy just as effectually as before, and whether the debts were both paid or were set off against each other before the bankruptcy or after would be perfectly immaterial. This being unquestionably true of ordinary traders, it is contended that section 164 of the Companies Act, 1862, is so worded as to involve the same consequence on the winding up of a company, which must for this purpose be treated as a bankrupt trader. This argument is certainly ingenious, but to give effect to it would be to defeat those sections of the Companies Act, 1862, which prevent all set-off against calls on the winding up of a limited company so long as any of its creditors are unpaid. See section 38 (7) and section 101; Grissell's case, 14 W. R. 1015, L. R. 1 Ch. App. 528. Section 164 is a general section applicable to all the creditors of all companies governed by the Act, whether they are limited or not, and whether the creditors are members or not; its language is, therefore, wide enough to include all creditors of all companies governed by the Act. But, in applying the section to limited companies, and to the members of such companies, the special legislation applicable to them must be regarded and must not be defeated. The first part of section 164 must be construed as referring to the class of acts described in section 48 of the present Bankruptcy Act, 1883; and the words "any trader" in section 164 must be held to include traders to whom the mutual credit clause in the Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (section 38), is inapplicable, as well as to include those traders to which the clause is applicable. This construction does no violence to the language used, and is obviously required by those sections of the Act which expressly prevent a member of a limited company in arrear for calls from obtaining payment in full of debts due to him in preference to other creditors. The disallowance of a set-off against calls between a limited company and its members on a winding up is to prevent any such preference, and its prohibition removes the only reason why a preferential payment in bankruptcy, where a set-off is allowable, is not fraudulent and void. The maxim Cessante ratione cessat lex is properly applicable in such a case. This construction of section 164 is not new; it was seen to be right and was distinctly adopted by Cotton, L.J., in Kent's case, and it is the only construction which does not defeat the obvious intention of the Legislature. It must be borne in mind that it has been already decided that section 10 of the Judicature Act, 1875, has not repealed or affected the enactments in the Companies Act, 1862, prohibiting set-off against calls in the winding up of limited companies: See Gill's case, 27 W. R. 934, 12 Ch. D. 755.

In considering this case I have assumed that the sums paid by Mr. M'Keand and Colonel Underwood were really due and payable by them to the company, although no calls had been made as contemplated by the articles of association. I am by no means sure that this is not taking too favourable a view of the position of these gentlemen. If the moneys were not due the case is much stronger against them: See Sykes's case, L. R. 13 Eq. 255, 20 W. R. Ch. Dig. 49.

For these reasons I am compelled to differ from the view taken by the learned judge who decided the case. The appeal must be allowed, with costs, both here and below. The void payments having been made by cheques signed by both the directors, they are jointly and severally liable to repay both and sought to be recovered by the liquidator, with interest at 4 per cent. [LINDLEY, L.J., added that Bowen L.J., had read his judgment, and concurred in it.]

KAY, L.J.—The first question is as to the meaning and effect of the 164th section of the Companies Act, 1862. It is argued that this section only means that a fraudulent preference, which would be so if the company were an individual who had since become bankrupt; and that in the case of such an individual any of his debtors who had a counter-claim against him which might be set off in an action, may be relieved of such debt by a voluntary set-off by the bankrupt before bankruptcy. If this be so it is by reason of the mutual credit clause, section 38, of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883. The effect of that clause is to give the debtor after the bankruptcy the advantage of set-off, and therefore to set off the debt before the bankruptcy cannot be in any sense fraudulent. But after a winding up there is no such right as set-off, and therefore to allow a set-off before winding up does not confer on the debtor an advan tage which may be deemed fraudulent under section 164. I am unable to read the section as this argument requires us to do. Its object is to prevent a fraudulent preference. If it has the meaning suggested the case of voluntary set-off must be an unintentional omission in the statute. But I do not think there is any such omission. [His lordship then dealt with the questions of fact, and having arrived at the conclusion that the transactions complained of were in contemplation of a possible or even probable winding up, and with the intention of giving a preference over other creditors, and at a time when the company was unable to pay the debts which it then owed, continued:—] I think that all the directors who concurred in making these payments were guilty of a misfeasance, and that the order should direct them jointly and severally to repay the amounts, and also the costs of this application here and below.

Decision of Kekewich, J., reversed.

Appeal from Kekewich, J.

The testator, Ebenezer White, by his will gave his residuary estate to trustees on trust for sale, and subject to successive life interests to his widow and a niece he made the following bequest of such residue: "I do give and bequeath the whole of my property to the following religious societies—viz. () to be divided in equal shares among them." The will was written on one half side of a sheet of note paper, and on the blank sheet opposite the above clause the testator after the execution of the will had written the following words:—"() viz., the Tract Society, the Home Missionary Society, the London Missionary Society, the Colonial Missionary Society." On the death of the testator probate of these latter words was refused, and these latter accordingly did not appear in the probate granted.

Kekewich, J., held that there was no general intention which the court could execute or recognize shown by the testator to devote the residue to charity; and, accordingly, that there was an intestacy, and that the next of kin took the residue, subject to the life interest therein of the widow and the niece.

The Crown appealed.

Sir John Rigby, S.G., and Ingle Joyce, for the appellant.—A society which exists for "religious purposes" is primâ facie a charity: Baker v. Sutton, 1 Keen, 224; Townsend v. Carus, 3 Ha. 257; Thornton v. Howe, 10 W. R. 642, 31 Beav. 14; Wilkinson v. Lindgren, 18 W. R. 961, L. R. 5 Ch. App. 570; a general charitable intention is therefore shown: Pieschel v. Paris, 2 Sim. & St. 384. In the case of Cocks v. Manners, 19 W. R. 1055, L. R. 12 Eq. 574, the ratio decidendi was that the gift was one to private individuals.

Warmington, Q.C., and Edward Ford, for the next of kin.—A general charitable intention must be indicated. The words in the gift in this will are incomplete, and it is idle to look for a general intent in an incomplete gift. It would be going beyond any of the decided cases to hold that a gift "to the following religious societies"—none being named—is a gift to charities generally for the purposes of charity. The will says nothing as to purposes for which the gift is made.

Sir J. Rigby, S.G., in reply.—Attorney-General v. Syderfin, reported 1 Mer. 59, 1 Vern. 224, and also in a note to the report in 7 Ves., p. 43, of Moggridge v. Thackwell, was approved of by Lord Eldon in Moggridge v. Thackwell. In Fisk v. Attorney-General, 15 W. R. 1200, L. R. 4 Eq. 521, Wood, V.C., followed Clark v. Taylor, 1 W. R. 476, 1 Drew. 642, and Russell v. Kellett, 3 Sm. & Giff. 264, 4 W. R. Dig. 131, both of which were only decisions of courts of first instance; and if the two latter cases decided what they have been assumed to decide, they cannot be supported: see In re Slevin, 39 W. R. 578, [1891] 2 Ch. 236. There is a long series of authorities which show that if you do not need to look outside the gift itself for the purpose of getting at a general charitable intent, then, though the particular charity fail, the gift will be applied cy-près: Isaac v. De Friez, 17 Ves. 373n; Attorney-General v. Ironmongers' Co., 2 My. & K. 576; Loscombe v. Wintringham, 13 Beav. 87; Mills v. Farmer. [BOWEN, L.J., referred to Clephane v. Provost of Edinburgh, L. R. 1 H. L. Sc. 417, 17 W. R. H. L. Dig. 3.] The gift in the present case is to "religious societies." It is not a reasonable interpretation of that to say that the testator meant a mere personal benefit amongst any number of religious people; the reasonable interpretation is that the gift was for religious purposes. A gift to "religious societies" is primâ facie, at all events, a charitable gift: Wilkinson v. Lindgren. He also referred to Liley v. Hey, 1 Ha. 580. [Ingle-Joyce mentioned that he had found in Lincoln's-inn Library a manuscript report by Serjeant Hill of the case of Jones v. Attorney-General, which was mentioned by Lord Eldon in his judgment in Mills v. Farmer, 1 Mer. 101, as "not now to be found."]

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 8.—The judgment of the COURT (LINDLEY, BOWEN, and A. L. SMITH, L.JJ.) was delivered by

LINDLEY, L.J.—[His lordship stated the facts, and continued:—] Under these circumstances Kekewich, J., held that there was an intestacy. From this decision the Attorney-General, on behalf of the Crown, has appealed, upon the ground that the testator has bequeathed his property for charitable purposes, and that a scheme for its application ought to be directed.

---

If the bequest in question amounts to, and ought to be construed as, a dedication by the testator of his property to charitable purposes, then there can be no doubt the Attorney-General is right. But the will says nothing in terms about charity, nor about the purposes for which the property is bequeathed. And it was urged by counsel for the next of kin that it was not possible to discover those purposes except by guessing.

A "religious" society may or may not be a "charitable" society, in the sense in which that expression is used. A society for the promotion of private prayer and devotion by its own members, and which has no wider scope, no public element, no purposes of general utility, would be a "religious" society, but not a "charitable" one: see Cocks v. Manners. In that case it was held that a gift by will to a Dominican convent was not a charitable gift. Wickens, V.C., said: "A voluntary association of women for the purpose of working out their own salvation by religious exercises and self-denial seems to me to have none of the requisites of a charitable institution, whether the word 'charitable' is used in its popular sense or in its legal sense."

In the present case the words of the testator's will are insufficient to show what kind of religious societies he meant. They may or may not have been "charitable" as well as "religious"; and as all religious societies are not charitable, we should, in the absence of authority, be unable to come to the conclusion that "charity" was intended, and we should, therefore, be of opinion that the result was an intestacy.

It is, however, impossible, we think, seriously to deny that the testator intended his property to be given to some religious societies for religious purposes. His property was to be divided amongst certain societies; but what for? The only rational answer to this question must, we think, be "for the purposes of those societies"; and, the societies being themselves described as "religious societies," the purposes for which the testator gave his property must be treated as religious purposes. It is true that these are not necessarily "charitable" purposes, and in a particular case a "religious" society may be shown not to be a "charitable" society. This was the case in Cocks v. Manners. But the authorities show that a bequest to a religious institution, or for a religious purpose, is primâ facie a bequest for a "charitable" purpose, and that the law applicable to "charitable" bequests, as distinguished from the law applicable to ordinary bequests, ought to be applied to a bequest to a religious institution or for a religious purpose. The leading cases on this head are as follows:—Baker v. Sutton (1836), where the bequest was to such religious and charitable institutions and purposes as in the opinion of the trustees might be fit and proper. Lord Langdale, M.R., in that case said: "All the cases, with one exception, go to support the proposition that a religious purpose is a charitable purpose." Townsend v. Carus (1843) is to the same effect. Wigram, V.C., there said: "If this is a bequest for religious purposes I think I am bound to hold it a charity within the decided cases." The promotion of the spiritual welfare of mankind was the object of the testator in that case, and the Vice-Chancellor dealt with the argument that some modes of promoting such welfare might not be "charitable." Having come to the conclusion that the object of the testator was "charitable," because it was "religious," he says that no mode of carrying out his intention could be proper if that mode was not itself charitable. In Wilkinson v. Lindgren (1870), where the bequest was to certain charitable institutions previously named, "or any other religious institution or purposes," as the trustees might think proper, religious purposes were treated as clearly "charitable." We can find no authority which really conflicts with these, or which is opposed to the principle on which they proceed.

We come, therefore, to the conclusion, first, that the gift is for religious purposes; and, secondly, that, being for religious purposes, it must be treated as a gift for "charitable" purposes unless the contrary can be shown. If once this conclusion is arrived at, the rest is plain. A charitable bequest never fails for uncertainty. Mills v. Farmer settles that point. Lord Eldon was clearly of opinion that the nomination of particular objects is only the mode and not the substance of a gift to "charity." We may add that, having looked at the registrar's book for the bill in Attorney-General v. Syderfin, we find that it is correctly set out in the note in 7 Vesey 43.

The decision appealed from must therefore be reversed, and it must be declared that in the events which have happened the testator's personal estate is subject to a trust for "charitable" purposes, and a scheme must be directed as to such part of it as was pure personalty at the testator's death. But having regard to the blunder made by the testator and the real difficulty occasioned by him, the costs of all parties, both here and below, ought to come out of his estate, subject to the life interest of the tenants for life.

No conveyance ever executed to Wilson, and at the date of his th none of the estate had been disposed of. In 4 his moiety was sold to Settles under the proons of the Settled Land Act. The testator's ow was now dead, and one of his sons had died state in her lifetime. This was an originating mons by the brother and heir of the deceased son have it determined, inter alia, whether Wilson's sty of the estate was converted into personalty at time of his death.

RTH, J.—The question here is whether Andrew n's moiety of the Chobham Manor Estate is realty rsonalty as between his real and personal repreives. It was suggested that a conversion into lty was effected by his will, but that is clearly case. The question is, therefore, was it con- by anything else antecedent to his will and nothing except the agreement of 1867. It that Settles and Wilson were partners, and is, being partnership property, was therefore lty. I do not think the question of partnerdirectly in point. The question is, is there any contract by virtue of which conversion was . Whether or not they were partners is not case directly material, though no doubt if it own that they were partners we should get a ay, as their property would of course be perd not real in the absence of any circumstances it realty. But even supposing they were and land formed part of the partnership property, yet there might be a definite agreement that at the end of the partnership the land should be conveyed as land, when I take it it would be real estate; on the other hand, if they were not partners there might be an agreement that the property should be converted, and such an agreement might operate as a conversion; therefore the question of partnership is only material for the purpose of construing this agreement. I have the agreement before me, and the question of conversion turns solely on that document. His lordship then held on the construction of the agreement that no conversion had taken place and that Wilson's moiety of the estate was realty at his death.

In re SHEWARD.
SHEWARD v. BROWN. (a.)

Will—Life interest—Forfeiture clause—Assigning or attempting to assign.

Under a will the tenant for life's interest was to be forfeited if he assigned, charged, or incumbered his interest, or attempted to do so. The tenant for life borrowed money, and gave the lender a document which was in form an equitable assignment of part of his interest. No notice of the document was given to the trustees, and it was subsequently cancelled. Evidence was given to show that, as between the parties, the document was not intended as a charge or assignment, and that it would have been a fraud on the bargain to have so used it.

Held, that evidence to show the real meaning of the document could be received, and that there had been no forfeiture of the life interest.

Originating summons.

This was an application by the trustees of a will for the determination of the questions (1) whether a direction or authority dated the 6th of July, 1892, addressed to them and signed by Mr. and Mrs. Brown, to pay the income arising from the investments representing the sum of £30,000 to which Mr. Brown would be entitled in the months of January and July, 1893, was an assignment, or attempted assignment, by Mr. Brown of the said income, so as to determine the trusts declared by the will of the said income in favour of Mr. Brown, and to give rise to the discretionary trust vested in the trustees under the will to apply the said income; (2) whether the trusts in favour of Mr. Brown under the will expectant on the decease of E. E. Sheward of the sum of £20,000 were affected by the said direction or authority.

The testator by his will gave £30,000 to trustees in trust to invest and pay the income thereof to Mr. Brown for life or until he should be outlawed, or become a bankrupt, or enter into any composition with his creditors, or should assign, charge, or incumber, or attempt or affect to assign, charge, or incumber the same, or should do or suffer something whereby the same or some part thereof would, through his act or default, or by operation or process of law or otherwise, if belonging absolutely to him, become vested in or payable to some other person or persons, and after the failure or determination of the trust thereinbefore declared in the lifetime of Mr. Brown, to apply the same for the benefit of his wife and family. A further sum of £20,000 was to be held by his trustees in trust for the testator's wife for life, with remainder on similar trusts to those declared of the said sum of £30,000.

On the 6th of July, 1892, Mr. and Mrs. Brown signed a document addressed to the trustees requesting them to pay the income arising from the £30,000 to which Mr. Brown was entitled under the will of the testator due in January and July, 1893, to H. V. Long, whose receipt, together with that authority, should be the trustees' discharge for the same. The authority was not served on the trustees, but they became aware of its existence in March, 1893. Long subsequently cancelled it. It was never acted on, and had not been out of his possession. Evidence was given that it was never intended to operate as a charge or alienation of Brown's life interest, and that it would have been a fraud on the bargain between the parties to it so to use it.

Warmington, Q.C., replied.

KEKEWICH, J.—The document of the 6th of July, 1892, is certainly an assignment, or an attempt to assign, within the meaning of the will. An inquiry whether it may more properly be described as one or the other would be merely academical, and may be dismissed. Nor will I pause to examine or compare the language of Fry, J., in Hurst v. Hurst, and North, J., in In re Porter, Coulson v. Capper. Suffice it to refer to the passage in Lindley, L.J.'s judgment in Hurst v. Hurst, where he says: "A proviso prohibiting the charging a life estate means in fact to prohibit anything purporting to charge it." The document really operates as an equitable assignment. This is conformable to the doctrine of Wilkinson v. Wilkinson and of many other cases, for instance, Burn v. Carvalho, 4 My. & Cr. 690, before Lord Cottenham, and Rodick v. Gandell, 1 De G. M. & G. 763, before Lord Truro. The authority of Gorringe v. Irwell India Rubber and Gutta Percha Works was not required to establish that notice to the trustees of the will is not necessary to complete the assignment, and that point was not contested. But it is argued that an equitable assignment can only operate according to the intention of the parties, and that to give it any other effect would be to permit a fraud. The intention here pointed at is, of course, external to the instrument itself, an intention beyond, and possibly in contravention of, that deducible from the instrument properly construed, and such a position must, therefore, be approached with exceeding caution, especially as the question falling for decision is not capable here of being tried between the parties to the contract—that is, between him who gave the charge and him to whom it was given. No authority was cited in support of this position, nor am I aware of any so directly bearing on it as to be useful for reference. There is some objection to deciding the question on principle, because, as already remarked, it does not arise between the contracting parties, and, moreover, the method of proceeding—summons by the trustees of the will—is not well adapted to the purpose. On the other hand, the document has been cancelled by Mr. Long himself, so that if he were here he could not argue in maintenance of its validity, and no injustice can be done to him by pronouncing it invalid. All other parties concerned are before me, and I have had the advantage of that thorough argument on behalf of the infant without which decision would have been impossible. There is another observation to be made in this connection. The accident of the pending litigation in Brown v. Long has supplied all the evidence that could reasonably be expected to be forthcoming on the point now under consideration, and no advantage in the way of additional or more satisfactory evidence could be anticipated if it were thought right to insist on the point being raised and decided in other proceedings. It may, therefore, be properly decided now. What I have to consider is, not whether the document means what its language imports, but whether operation can in conscience be given to that meaning. In other words, if Mr. Brown had been plaintiff in an action to set aside the document, on the ground of mistake or fraud, could Mr. Long have successfully resisted judgment?

My conclusion from the evidence is that Mr. Brown did not intend to charge his life interest, and cannot be taken to have consented to sign a document of that purport—that is, that he cannot be taken to have given his deliberate assent thereto. He had been warned on the occasion of a first loan that he could not mortgage his interest under the will, and though possibly, and indeed probably, he did not attribute any definite legal meaning to the term "mortgage," and certainly had not fathomed the mysteries of equitable assignment, yet the warning given was present to his mind on the occasion of the second loan, as is obvious from the inquiry made respecting the nature and effect of this particular document when called upon to sign it. That he was imprudent, and under the pressure of the moment accepted an unsatisfactory explanation, is abundantly clear, but I cannot hold him to have intended to do what he had been told was, and he believed to be, impossible. The reasonable inference from the evidence is that he would have declined to sign this document if the true nature thereof had been explained to him. The Mr. Long did not intend the document to be what it is, is not so clear. He also knew that Mr. Brown could not mortgage his interest. He also must be credited with something short of full acquaintance with the equitable doctrines affecting the matter in hand, but he may have thought that the document, even equivalent to a mortgage, and from that point of view futile, would be useful for some purpose, not of course that avowed, which is obviously incorrect, but some other purpose not definitely present to his mind. But I cannot credit Mr. Long with such folly as would be implied in the intention that the document should operate as a charge which would cut off Mr. Brown's income, and with it his means of making a payment to Mr. Long. Here comes in an observation made by Mr. Warmington in reply which is entitled to considerable weight. He almost used the language of Lord Truro in Rodick v. Gandell, which is worth quoting in this connection. Lord Truro says (p. 78): "Although it is not necessary to the validity of an assignment of a debt, as between the assignor and assignee, that notice should be given to the person from whom the debt is due, yet it is most usual and very expedient for the safety of the assignee that it should be done, and the omission to give any such notice may operate as strong moral evidence of the intention and understanding of the parties." I have come to the conclusion that as between Mr. Brown and Mr. Long the document of the 6th of July, 1892, was not intended as a charge on Mr. Brown's interest under the will, that it would have been a fraud on the bargain so to have used it, and that any attempt by Mr. Long to use it in that manner would, on the evidence now before me, have been restrained by injunction. It seems to me legitimate thus to go behind the document, and to hold that the literal meaning is not according to truth and honesty, and must not be regarded as expressing any real contract between the parties. The result is that the first and second questions asked by the summons must be answered in the negative, and the costs must be paid by the trustees out of the income of the trust fund.

Practice—Shares in company—Order for sale—Rules of Supreme Court, 1883, ord. 50, r. 2.

The expression "goods" in the Rules of the Supreme Court, 1883, ord. 50, r. 2, includes shares in a limited company, and if, for "any just and sufficient reason," it is desirable to have them sold at once, they may be sold under the rule in a pending action.

Under an agreement between the plaintiff and the defendant the plaintiff agreed to sell and the defendant to purchase certain shares in a brewery company, the defendant paying a deposit and giving a bill for a further portion of the purchase-money, and the balance to be paid at a future date, whereupon the plaintiff was to execute a transfer of the shares. On the completion of the purchase the plaintiff was to pay the defendant a sum of money by way of commission, and in reduction of the balance of the purchase-money. The certificate was in the interval to remain in the custody of a third party as trustee for the plaintiff and defendant, and the plaintiff was to receive the interest. Until payment the shares were to stand charged with the payment to the plaintiff of the unpaid purchase-money. In default of completion the plaintiff was to be at liberty to sell the shares and retain thereout the unpaid balance of purchase-money. The deposit was paid, but the bill was dishonoured at maturity, whereupon the plaintiff sued upon it in the Queen's Bench Division.

The defendant alleged in his defence that the transaction was not a sale and purchase, but that he was merely the agent of the plaintiff for the sale of the shares on commission. The defendant advertised the shares for sale by auction, and thereupon the plaintiff issued a writ in the Chancery Division claiming a declaration of lien on the shares for the balance of the purchase-money and an order for sale, and then served the defendant with notice of motion to restrain the intended sale; the defendant gave a cross notice of motion for an order directing the sale by auction and payment of the proceeds into court, on the ground that the shares had risen in value, and would, if sold, realize more than sufficient to meet any claims the plaintiff might have.

D. Villiers Meager, for the defendant.—The defendant is agent for the plaintiff to find a purchaser, and asks for an immediate sale. Shares are goods within ord. 50, r. 2. Goods include bonds: Coddington v. Jacksonville Railway Co., 39 L. T. N. S. 12, 26 W. R. Dig. 180.

H. Terrell, for the plaintiff.—The rule does not give the court jurisdiction to order a sale in this case. If defendant was agent he has no right to deal with them. If he is purchaser the plaintiff is entitled to judgment.

KEKEWICH, J.—On the agreement of the 19th of November, 1891, the question arises whether the shares referred to were really purchased by the defendant, or whether the defendant was in reality constituted the agent of the plaintiff for the sale of the shares. The defendant says he was only the plaintiff's agent, and held the shares only for the plaintiff, but the plaintiff claims the purchase-money only. He sues for the money in the Queen's Bench Division, and in the meantime the plaintiff is entitled to protection against his property being made away with. The defendant has paid £300, and he is entitled to a lien on the shares in any event for what he has paid, and he is not bound to wait until the trial to have his lien enforced if the court has in the meantime power to do it for him. Has the court that power? Under ord. 50, r. 2, the court has power to sell, that is to direct a sale, of "any goods, wares, or merchandise which may be of a perishable nature or likely to injure from keeping, or which for any other just and sufficient reason it may be desirable to have sold at once. The object of that rule is to enable the court while an action is pending to sell the goods or merchandise in dispute, and to keep the proceeds in court to abide the result of the litigation. Upon that rule I have myself constantly acted. Are shares "goods" within the rule? In Bartholomew v. Freeman, 26 W. R. 743, 3 C. P. D. 316, "goods" included a horse, and in Reg. v. Slade, 37 W. R. 141, 21 Q. B. D. 433, under the same word in 2 & 3 Vict. c. 71, s. 40, it was held a dog was included. In Coddington v. Jacksonville Railway Co. the Court of Appeal held that certain foreign bonds came within the rule and an immediate sale was ordered. I have no hesitation in holding that the word "goods" does include shares. Then can the shares now in question properly be ordered to be sold in this case? In my opinion they come within the words "which for any other just and sufficient reason it may be desirable to have sold at once." It is common knowledge that shares in a limited company, however flourishing, are of a fluctuating character, and any person holding a number of such shares would sell them as soon as they had attained a good market price. Here they have risen in value, and will, if sold, realize sufficient to answer the plaintiff's claim. The defendant has, therefore, sufficient reason for saying that the shares should be sold at once supposing an opportunity arises. The defendant says they ought to be sold under an order of the court. I am of the same opinion. I therefore make an order on both motions for the sale of the shares under the direction of the court, and the court will decide who is entitled to the proceeds.

LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL, Appellants.
LAWRANCE & SONS, Respondents. (a.)

Building—Height—"Erected on the side of any new street"—Metropolis Local Management Amendment Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 102), s. 85.

Section 85 of the Metropolis Local Management Amendment Act, 1862, provides that no building shall be erected on the side of any new street which shall exceed the height specified in the section.

A building was erected at the corner of two streets, one being a new street within the Act, the other not such a street. The main entrance to the building was from the old street, but there was a small tradesmen's entrance from the area at the side of the building in the new street.

Held, that the building was erected on the side of the new street within the meaning of the section.

Case stated by a metropolitan police magistrate in which the following facts appeared:—

A summons was issued on behalf of the appellants, the London County Council, charging the respondents that they had unlawfully erected a building on the south side of Kensington-court, being a new street of a less width than fifty feet, exceeding in height the distance from the external wall or front of such building to the opposite side of such street without the written consent of the appellants, contrary to section 85 of the Metropolis Management Amendment Act, 1862.

On the hearing of the summons it was proved that the street Kensington-court was a new street within the meaning of the Metropolis Local Management Amendment Act, 1862, and was of a less width than fifty feet, and that the height of the building erected by the respondents as measured from the level of the centre of the said street immediately opposite the building to the parapet or eaves of the building was 74 feet 10 inches, and that the distance from the external wall of the building to the opposite side of the street Kensington-court was 45 feet.

The appellants had not consented in writing to the erection of the building. The entrance to the building was from Kensington-road, which was not a new street within the meaning of the Act. There was a small tradesmen's entrance from the area at the side of the building in Kensington-court, but with that exception there was no entrance to the building except from Kensington-road. The front of the building was in Kensington-road, which was of the width of 55 feet, and which abutted on the gardens of Kensington Palace.

It was contended for the respondents that the building was in fact situated in Kensington-road, and was not situated in the street called Kensington-court, and that it was not a building erected on the side of the street called Kensington-court, and did not constitute an offence against section 85 of the Metropolis Local Management Amendment Act, 1862.

The magistrate found as a fact that the building fronted on and was situate in Kensington-road, and he held that, although the side of the building abutted on Kensington-court, the building was not "erected on the side of Kensington-court," within the meaning of, and so as to be subject to, the provisions of the section, and he therefore dismissed the summons. The question for the opinion of the court was whether the magistrate was right in his decision.

Section 85 of the Metropolis Local Management Amendment Act is as follows:—No building except a church or chapel shall be erected on the side of any new street of a less width than fifty feet which shall exceed in height the distance from the external wall or front of such building to the opposite side of such street without the consent in writing of the Metropolitan Board of Works; nor shall the height of any building so erected be at any time subsequently increased so as to exceed such distance without such consent; and in determining the height of such building the measurement shall be taken from the level of the centre of the street immediately opposite the building up to the parapet or eaves of such building; and every person committing any offence under this enactment shall be liable to a penalty of £5, and in case of a continuing offence to a further penalty of 40s. for every day during which such offence shall continue after notice from the said board, to be recovered by summary proceeding.

(The case was originally argued before Day and Bruce, JJ., and was ordered to be reargued before a full divisional court.)

Avory (Finlay, Q.C., with him), for the appellants.—The magistrate has found that the external wall of this building abuts on Kensington-court; that is a finding that the building comes within the terms of the section, and the respondents have, therefore, rendered themselves liable to a penalty.

He relied on Barlow v. Kensington Vestry, 34 W. R. 521, 11 App. Cas, 257; Gilbart v. Wandsworth Local Board, 60 L. T. 149, 37 W. R. Dig. 120.

Dickens, Q.C. (T. Willes Chitty with him), for the respondents.—The words in section 85 are: "No building shall be erected on the side of any new street." We admit that it is possible for the same house to be erected on the sides of two streets, but whether it is so or not must be a question of fact for the magistrate in each case. In this case the magistrate has found as a fact that the building is not erected on the side of Kensington-court, although it abuts on that street. The court is bound by that finding of facts, and the appeal ought to be dismissed.

He referred to Attorney-General v. Edwardes, [1891] 1 Ch. 194, 39 W. R. Dig. 115; Warren v. Mustard, 61 L. J. M. C. 18, 40 W. R. Dig. 128.

MATHEW, J.—This building is a corner house fronting the Kensington-road, with an external wall in Kensington-court. The building has been erected beyond the height permitted by section 85 of the Metropolis Local Management Amendment Act, 1862, and this has been done without the consent of the London County Council. If the words of the section had been "situate in a new street" there might have been something in the respondent's contention that the building did not come within the terms of the section. But the words are "erected on the side of any new street," and it is quite clear that this building is erected on the side of a new street. The decision of the magistrate was wrong, and the case must be remitted for him to convict.

WRIGHT and COLLINS, JJ., concurred.

Appeal allowed.

ADMINISTRATION:—

1. Costs—Insolvent estate—Mortgage of realty—Valuation of security—Sale of realty—Proceeds less than valuation—Costs of sale.—In a creditor's suit for the administration of an insolvent estate mortgagees of realty, being required to do so, valued their security. An order was subsequently made for sale of the realty, the mortgagees not objecting, and the sale was carried out, the plaintiff having carriage. The amount realized was less than the sum at which the mortgagees had valued their security.

Held, that the plaintiff was not entitled to be paid his costs of the sale out of the amount realized. —Ross v. Ross, V.C. (Ir.)—29 L. R. Ir. 318.

1a. Lands of tenant in tail delivered in execution under writ of elegit—Devise—Exoneration—1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, s. 13.—Lands to which a testator was believed to be entitled in fee simple, but of which he was in fact tenant in tail under a settlement, were in his lifetime delivered in execution, under a writ of elegit, to judgment creditors. The testator devised these lands to W. H. A., who survived the testator and died intestate, leaving H. W. A. his heir-at-law. H. W. A. was tenant in tail in possession of these lands under the limitations of the settlement.

Held, that the charge created by the judgment, though enforceable against the estate tail of H. W. A., was not so enforceable in exoneration of the testator's personal estate.—In re Anthony, Anthony v. Anthony, CH.D. KEK., J. 667.

2. Marshalling assets—Pecuniary legacies—Real estate charged with debts.—A testatrix, after directing her debts and funeral and testamentary expenses to be paid by her executors as soon as conveniently might be, and making a certain specific bequest, gave a legacy of £500 to L. M. She then made other specific bequests, and devised and bequeathed the residue of her personal estate and all her real estate to her trustees upon trust for sale and conversion, and to hold the proceeds of sale upon trust for certain beneficiaries therein mentioned, and she appointed her trustees executors of her will. The personal estate not specifically bequeathed was insufficient to pay the legacies in full after satisfying the debts and funeral and testamentary expenses.

Held, that L. M. was entitled to have the assets marshalled so that her legacy of £500 might be considered a charge on the real estate to the extent to which the personal estate had been applied in the payment of the debts and funeral and testamentary expenses.

In re Bate, Bate v. Bate, 43 Ch. D. 600, 62 L. T. N. S. 559, discussed.—In re Stokes, Parsons v. Miller, CH.D. STI., J.—67 L. T. 223.

3. Receiver—Creditor's action—Mortgagee in possession—Right to back rents—Dividends in custodiâ legis.—Moneys in the hands of a receiver appointed by the court in a creditor's administration action are not necessarily in custodiâ legis in the same way as they would be in the hands of a sequestrator. The receiver, so far as the receipt of the assets is concerned, stands in the place of the executor, and the creditors cannot be in a worse position than if the assets had been received by the executor.

Delany v. Mansfield, 1 Hogan, 234, discussed and disapproved.—In re Hoare, Hoare v. Owen, CH.D. STI., J. 105—[1892] 3 Ch. 94; 61 L. J. Ch. 541; 67 L. T. 45.

ADMIRALTY:—

1. Practice—Costs—Taxation—Allowance to country solicitor attending hearing—Discretion.—It is a general rule, for the guidance of the Admiralty registrar in taxing costs between party and party, that, where a solicitor in the country retained for one of the parties employs a London agent, a charge for the attendance of the country solicitor at the hearing will not be allowed; but this rule is not inflexible, and will be relaxed if it appears that the attendance of the country solicitor at the hearing was necessary for the proper prosecution of the suit. —The Soto, P.D. & A.D. 479—[1893] P. 73; 62 L. J. P. D. & A. 17.

2. Practice—Costs—Collision—Amount recovered under £300—County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act, 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 71), s. 3, sub-section 3; s. 9.—In an action of damage by collision the hearing lasted five hours, and the decision mainly turned on the inability of the defendants to exonerate their steamship from the charge of not keeping out of the way of the plaintiffs' steamer, a large vessel in tow of tugs, and which the defendants' steamer was overtaking in the River Thames. In the result the defendants' vessel was held alone to blame, and the damages were referred in the usual way to the registrar and merchants.

The plaintiffs filed their particulars of claim amounting to £339 15s. 7d., but the reference was not proceeded with, as the parties agreed the damages at £226 5s.

On motion on behalf of the plaintiffs to condemn the defendants and their bail in that amount, with interest, and in the costs of the action, the defendants contended that the plaintiffs were not entitled to their costs, as the amount recovered was under the statutory county court limit of £300, and therefore the action ought to have been brought in a county court.

Held, that the plaintiffs were entitled to their costs, for the discretion of the court in allowing or refusing costs now depends upon whether, considering the facts and the circumstances of the particular case, the plaintiffs have acted properly and reasonably in bringing their action in the High Court; and, considering the size of the vessels, the nature of the collision, the length of time the hearing lasted, and the judgment pronounced, this case was a proper one to be tried in the High Court. —The Saltburn, P.D. & A.D.—[1892] P. 333.

3. Practice—Service of writ out of jurisdiction—Contract made by foreigners for salvage of foreign ship in English waters—Place of payment—Lien on ship and cargo—Ord. 11, r. 1 (e).—A foreign ship owned by the defendants, a German company, carrying on the business of shipowners in Germany, stranded on the English coast. Her master, a German, entered into a contract in the German language with the plaintiffs, a Swedish salvage company, and also with a German salvage company, by which the two salvage companies jointly undertook to do their best to salve the ship and her cargo, and convey them to an English port "against a salvage reward or compensation of fifty per cent." of the value of the property in the salved condition. In case of disagreement the value was to be determined by arbitration, and the salvage money was to be paid within ten days after the salvage had been effected, to the German salvage company, who were to have a lien on ship and cargo until payment, but no place of payment was specified.

The ship was floated and, together with a great part of her cargo, conveyed to the named English port. The parties disagreed as to the valuation of the ship, and the amount was determined by arbitration. The plaintiffs obtained leave, ex parte, to serve the defendants out of the jurisdiction with notice of a writ of summons claiming fifty per cent. of the value.

Held, affirming the decision of the President of the Admiralty Division, that the order must be discharged and the writ of summons set aside, as there was no obligation to pay the salvage money within the jurisdiction, and therefore no breach within the jurisdiction within the meaning of ord. 11, r. 1 (e).—The Eider, C.A.—[1893] P. 119.

4. Salvage—Action in rem—Appearance of owners of res—Award in excess of undertaking to put in bail—Personal liability of owners of res.—In an action in rem for salvage services the writ was directed in the usual form "to the owners and parties interested" in the res, and indorsed with a claim for £5,000.

As the owners of the salved ship, her cargo, and freight appeared as defendants, and through their solicitor gave an undertaking to put in bail for the above amount, the plaintiffs did not arrest the vessel or interfere with the discharge of the cargo.

The value of the salved ship, her cargo, and freight was £179,200, and at the hearing the court made an award of £7,500.

The plaintiffs subsequently obtained leave to amend the indorsement on the writ by altering the sum therein to £8,500: The Dictator, [1892] P. 64.

The amount of the award was affirmed on appeal, and the defendants paid the costs, but denied their liability in respect of the amount awarded beyond the amount of the undertaking to put in bail, viz., £5,000.

The plaintiffs thereupon moved for leave to proceed personally for the full amount awarded.

Held, that the remedy was not limited by the amount of the undertaking to put in bail, and that the plaintiffs were entitled in the present action to sue out writs of fieri facias in order to enforce payment from the defendants personally of the full amount of the decree.—The Dictator, P.D. & A.D.—[1892] P. 304; 61 L. J. P. D. & A. 73.

5. Wrongful arrest of ship—Crassa negligentia—

Mala fides—Damages.—Proof of actual damage is not necessary to sustain an action in a court of admiralty for wrongful arrest if the seizure of the vessel was the result of mala fides, or crassa negligentia implying malice.

Semble, an action lies at common law for malicious arrest of a ship by admiralty process.—The Walter D. Wallet, P.D. & A.D.—[1893] P. 202.

ADULTERATION :—

Sale of Food and Drugs Acts, 1875 and 1879 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 63, s. 6; 42 & 43 Vict. c. 30, s. 10)—Summons—Particulars of offence.—A summons under section 6 of the Food and Drugs Act, 1875, following the words of the section, charged a milkman with selling to the prejudice of the purchaser a pint of milk not of the nature, substance, and quality demanded, and gave no further particulars.

Held, that the summons was defective for want of particulars, the defendant being entitled under section 10 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act Amendment Act, 1879, to information as to the defect in the milk—e.g., whether he was accused of having added water or of having abstracted cream. —Barnes v. Ryder, Q.B.D.—62 L. APOTHECARY :—

Unqualified person—"Act or practise"—"Every such offence" whether more than one—Penalty—Apothecaries Act, 1815 (55 Geo. 3, c. 194), s. 20.—The words "act or practise" in the 20th section of the Apothecaries Act, 1815, which provides that, if any person "shall act or practise as an apothecary" without having obtained the certificate required by a previous section, "every person so offending shall for every such offence forfeit £20," contemplate an habitual course of conduct on the part of the defendant, and not an isolated act.

Where, therefore, a defendant had given advice and had prescribed and supplied medicine to three separate persons on different occasions on the same day, without a certificate, and was sued for three separate penalties,

Held (affirming the county court judge), that only one offence had been committed in law, and that only one penalty was therefore recoverable.—Apothecaries' Co. v. Jones, Q.B.D. 267—[1893] 1 Q. B. 89; 68 L. T. 677.

ARBITRATION :—

1. Arbitrator—Unfitness—Injunction to restrain proceeding with arbitration—Jurisdiction.—A contract by which the plaintiff undertook to construct a dock for the defendant company provided that any dispute should be referred to the company's engineer. A dispute arose whether the contract required the interior of an embankment to be made of stone, so that if the contractor, by direction of the engineer, used stone it would be an extra. A correspondence took place between the contractor and the engineer, in which the engineer stated his view to be that the contractor was bound to use stone, and that it was not an extra. The company then referred the dispute to the arbitration of the engineer. After this the engineer wrote to the contractor a letter in which he repeated his former view. The plaintiff brought this action to restrain the company from proceeding further with the arbitration.

Held, that considering the position of the engineer who must necessarily have expressed an opinion upon the point in dispute, his writing after the commencement of the arbitration a letter repeating the same opinion would not disqualify him from acting as arbitrator unless on the fair construction of the letter it appeared that he had made up his mind so as not to be open to change it on argument;

And held, by Lindley and Bowen, L.JJ. (A. L. Smith, L.J., dissenting), that the letter in question did not show that the engineer had precluded himself from keeping his mind open, and quære whether there was jurisdiction to grant an injunction.—Jackson v. Barry Railway Co., C.A.—[1893] 1 Ch. 238; 68 L. T. 472.

2. Compulsory reference—Question in dispute in part a matter of account—Reference of all issues in the cause to an official referee—Arbitration Act, 1889 (52 & 53 Vict. c. 49), s. 14.—The Arbitration Act, 1889, is an amending, not a consolidating, Act, and, under section 14, the court has jurisdiction to order a compulsory reference of a whole cause to an official referee if the main, but not the only, question in dispute between the parties is a matter of account.—Hurlbatt v. Barnett, C.A. 33—[1893] 1 Q. B. 77; 62 L. J. Q. B. 1; 67 L. T. 818.

3. Condition precedent—Fire policy—Arbiters not named—Contract depending upon the clause—Action excluded until arbitration.—A policy of fire insurance provided, inter alia, that "where the company did not claim to avoid its liability under the policy on the ground of fraud or non-fulfilment of any of the conditions therein set forth, but a difference at any time arose between the company and the insured as to the amount payable in respect of any alleged loss or damage by fire, every such difference when and as the same arose should be referred to the arbitration of persons chosen by the parties"; and it was expressly "declared to be a condition of the making of the policy," where the company did not deny liability on the ground of fraud or non-fulfilment, "that the insured should not be entitled to commence any action at law . . . till the amount should have been awarded as thereinbefore provided," and that the "obtaining such an award should be a condition precedent to the commencement of any action upon the policy." The arbiters were not named in the policy.

Held, reversing the decision of the Court of Session (18 Ct. Sess. Cas., 4th series (Rettie), 1219), first, that the condition to ascertain the damage by arbitration was incorporated with and formed an integral part of the contract of indemnity, and was a condition precedent to the bringing of any action upon the policy; secondly, that the contract, being one upon which no cause of action accrued until the amount of damage had been determined by arbitration, was excepted from the rule of Scotch law that a reference to arbiters not named cannot be enforced.

4. Costs — Taxation — Fees of arbitrators and umpire—Jurisdiction to tax—Arbitration Act, 1889 (52 & 53 Vict. c. 49), s. 2, and First Schedule, provision (i).—Where, in an arbitration, an umpire, after making his award, had fixed the amount of the fees due to himself and the arbitrators, but had not made them a part of his award, Held, that provision (i) in the Frst Schedule to the Arbitration Act, 1889, did not apply, and that the fees were subject to taxation in the High Court.—In re Prebble and Robinson, Q.B.D. 30—[1892] 2 Q. B. 602; 67 L. T. 267.

5. Inspection—Reference of action for trial—Order for inspection of premises—Jurisdiction of referee—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 36, r. 50—Arbitration Act, 1889 (52 & 53 Vict. c. 49), ss. 14, 15.—A referee or arbitrator to whom an action has been referred for trial under section 14 of the Arbitration Act, 1889, has jurisdiction under ord. 36, r. 50, to make an order for inspection of premises the subject-matter of the action.

Hayward v. Mutual Reserve Association, 39 W. R. 624, [1891] 2 Q. B. 236, approved.

The court or a judge has also jurisdiction to make an order for inspection, but, as a general rule, the most convenient course is to apply to the referee or arbitrator in the first instance.—Macalpine & Co. v. Calder & Co., C.A. 436—[1893] 1 Q. B. 545; 68 L. T. 426.

6. Remitting award—Discovery of new evidence—Jurisdiction to remit—Absence of request by arbitrator to remit—Arbitration Act, 1889 (52 & 53 Vict. c. 49), s. 10.—The court has power, under section 10 of the Arbitration Act, 1889, to remit an award to an arbitrator upon the ground that new evidence has been discovered since the award was made, though the arbitrator does not join in asking the court to remit the award.—In re an Arbitration between Keighley, Maxsted, & Co. v. Bryan, Durant, & Co., C.A. 437—[1893] 1 Q. B. 405; 62 L. J. Q. B. 105; 68 L. T. 61.

7. Revocation of submission—Possibility of bias—Jurisdiction of court.—Where litigation took place between one of the parties to the submission to arbitration and the arbitrator, the court revoked the submission, though the litigation commenced subsequent to the date of the submission and was in respect of a totally distinct matter.—In re Baring Brothers & Co. and Doulton & Co., Q.B.D.—61 L. J. Q. B. 704.

8. Staying proceedings—Enlargement of time by consent for delivering defence—"Step in the proceedings"—Arbitration Act, 1889, s. 4—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 64, r. 8.—In an action by the plaintiffs against their contractor under an agreement which provided that all disputes should be referred to arbitration, the defendant had delivered no pleadings, but when the original time for putting in a defence was about to expire, he wrote to the plaintiffs asking for fourteen days further time to put in his defence, which was granted, and subsequently wrote asking for ten days further time, which was also granted. On motion by the defendant to stay proceedings under the Arbitration Act, 1889, s. 4,

Held, that obtaining by consent an enlargement of time wherein to plead was not "taking a step in the proceedings" within the Arbitration Act, s. 4, and that there must be an order to stay proceedings.—Brighton Marine, &c., Co. v. Woodhouse, CH.D. NOR., J. 488—[1893] 2 Ch. 486; 68 L. T. 669.

9. Submission—Agreement in writing—Counsels' indorsements on briefs—Arbitration Act, 1889 (52 & 53 Vict. c. 49), ss. 5, 27.—At the trial of an action terms were agreed upon by both sides, inter alia, that the counter-claim be referred to arbitration, and counsel on both sides indorsed their briefs to that effect.

Held, that these indorsements constituted a submission to arbitration within the definition in section 27 of the Arbitration Act, 1889.—Aitken v. Bachelor, Q.B.D.—62 L. J. Q. B. 193; 68 L. T. 530.

ASSIGNMENT of DEBT:—

Equitable assignment—Notice of prior charge—Company—Debenture—Constructive notice—Clause restricting creation of prior charge—Priority.—The plaintiffs were applied to by the E. Corporation for a loan to be secured by a mortgage of certain insurance moneys due to the E. Corporation from a fire insurance office. The E. Corporation had issued a series of first mortgage debentures, whereby they charged their undertaking and all their property whatsoever and wheresoever, both present and future. The debentures were to be a first charge on the property thereby charged, and the charge thereby created was to be a floating security, but so that the corporation were not to be at liberty to create any mortgage or charge in priority thereto. During the negotiations for the loan the plaintiffs' solicitor, being informed that the corporation had issued debentures, asked the manager of the corporation whether the debentures were secured by any trust deeds which covered the insurance moneys proposed to be mortgaged. The manager replied in the negative. The loan was advanced and the mortgage executed, and the plaintiffs gave notice thereof to the insurance office. The E. Corporation having gone into liquidation, and claims being made on the insurance moneys by the plaintiffs, and also by the defendant representing the debenture-holders, interpleader proceedings were instituted by the insurance office. At the trial the plaintiffs' solicitor said that at the time of the negotiations he had never seen or heard of debentures which prohibited the creation of any charge in priority thereto.

Held (affirming the judgment of Charles, J.), that the plaintiffs ought not to be fixed with constructive notice of the contents of the debentures, and that, therefore, the plaintiffs' claim against the insurance moneys ought to take priority over the claim of the debenture-holders.—English and Scottish Investment Co. v. Brunton, C.A. 133—[1892] 2 Q. B. 700; 62 L. J. Q. B. 136; 67 L. T. 406.

BANKER:—

1. Customer—Stockbroker paying into credit of his own account—Money of client.—The appellants, who held as trustees fifty shares in the Commercial Bank of Scotland, instructed a stockbroker in Edinburgh to sell the shares and to deposit the proceeds in certain colonial banks in the names of the appellants. The shares were sold by the broker in the ordinary course of business, the dealing being between him and another member of the Stock Exchange, who knew him only in the transaction and accordingly gave in payment for the shares in the ordinary way a cheque payable to the broker or order. This cheque was paid by the broker to the credit of his account with the respondent bank. At the time when the cheque was paid in, the broker's account with the respondent bank was overdrawn to an amount exceeding the amount so paid. The broker having become insolvent, the appellants claimed to be entitled to have the amount of the cheque repaid to them by the respondent bank. After the date of the receipt of the cheque some small amounts were drawn upon his account by the broker, but the amount so drawn was much less than the sum paid in. The respondent bank were aware that the cheque was the proceeds of the sale of shares, but did not know, and had made no inquiry, whether the money paid in was in the broker's hands as agent or otherwise.

Held, affirming the decision of the Court of Session (18 Ct. Sess. Cas., 4th series (Rettie), 751), that the respondent bank was entitled to retain the money in discharge pro tanto of the debt due to them from the broker.—Thomson v. Clydesdale Bank, H.L. (Sc.)—[1893] A. C. 282.

2. Deposit of securities—Negotiable instrument—Broker—Bonâ fide holder for value.—S. was a customer of H., D., & Co., stockbrokers, and had left in the hands of D., one of the members of H., D., & Co., for custody, a number of bonds known as "Cedulas." On the 12th of October, 1887, D., desiring to raise money for purposes of his own, and without any authority from S., contracted to sell these bonds, and on the same day he made a further contract to repurchase similar bonds for the 28th of October. On the 28th of October D. delivered the bonds which he had contracted to sell in three separate lots, and on the same day he took delivery of the other similar bonds which he had contracted to buy. For the bonds so delivered to him he paid by a crossed cheque, and in order to put himself in funds to meet it he sent the bonds of which he had taken delivery, with other securities, to the appellant bank, on receipt of which the appellants placed £6,000 to his credit. Out of this sum the cheque was cashed. The bonds so deposited remained in the custody of the bank till D. absconded in June, 1888, when S. applied to the bank for the bonds, which, however, had been sold for a price which was admitted to have been fair. In an action against the bank by S. to recover the price of these bonds, Held (reversing the decision of the Court of Appeal, 39 W. R. 449, [1891] 1 Ch. 270), that, the Cedula bonds being negotiable instruments, the bank, taking them in good faith and for value, acquired a good title.

3. Deposit of securities — Customer's securities — Authority of broker to pledge—Contango—Duty of inquiry—Bonâ fide holder for value—Estoppel.—B., the plaintiff in this action, employed H., D., & Co. as brokers to purchase and sell shares for him on the Stock Exchange. The shares were bought for resale, not as investment. As a rule, H., D., & Co. found the money for the purchases and retained the shares purchased, together with other shares deposited by B. as cover, as security for the money so advanced. H., D., & Co. deposited the shares so held by them with the defendant bank to secure a current loan account. In June, 1888, H., D., & Co. stopped payment. There were then in the hands of the bank, among other securities deposited by H., D., & Co. to secure their current loan account, certain securities belonging to B., and held by H., D., & Co. as security in manner aforesaid. B. brought this action claiming to redeem these securities upon paying what was due from him to H., D., & Co. (about £13,000). The bank claimed to hold them as security for the sum due to them from H., D., & Co. (about £42,000), which was more than their value. The securities were of three classes: (1) foreign bonds payable to bearer; (2) stocks and shares requiring a registered transfer, which had been transferred to officers of the bank by instruments executed by B.; (3) similar stocks and shares so transferred by instruments executed by other persons.

Held, as to all three classes of securities, that the burden of proof that H., D., & Co. had exceeded their authority by pledging the securities to the bank for their full amount was on the plaintiff, and he had not proved it. If they had exceeded their authority, then as to (1) it was admitted that the case was covered by The London Joint-Stock Bank v. Simmons, 41 W. R. 106, [1892] A. C. 201, decided pending this action; as to (2) and (3) Held that there was nothing to put the bank on inquiry whether H., D., & Co. had authority to deal with the securities or not; and as to (2) that B. was estopped from saying that H., D., & Co. had no authority to pledge these securities.

Semble, the fact that by the general practice of the Stock Exchange most loans on the security of stock are effected by way of contango justified the bank in assuming that H., D., & Co. had absolute power to deal with the securities deposited.—Bentinck v. London Joint-Stock Bank, CH.D. NOR., J.—[1893] 2 Ch. 120; 62 L. J. Ch. 358; 68 L. T. 315.

4. Deposit of securities — Pledge — Fraudulent pledge of share certificates—Transfers executed in blank—Estoppel.—The plaintiffs, who were registered owners of certain shares in the Pennsylvania Railroad Co. transferable in the books of the company, entrusted the share certificates, with indorsed transfers executed by them, with blanks for the names of the transferees, to D., a stockbroker, as "margin" to cover a loan with which D. was to purchase shares in certain other companies for the plaintiffs. D. deposited the certificates, together with certain other securities, with the defendants as security for a loan. D. did not purchase any shares for the plaintiffs, but sent contract notes purporting to have done so. The plaintiffs did not learn of D.'s fraud until the 24th of December, 1890, when D. absconded. On the 24th of January, 1891, the plaintiffs gave notice to the defendants that they were the owners of the shares. In May, 1891, the defendants, having filled up the transfers, were duly registered in the books of the company. The defendants claimed to hold the shares as security for the amount advanced by them to D.

Held, that the plaintiffs, having delivered to D. share certificates with indorsed transfers signed by them, though in blank, were estopped from asserting their ownership against the defendants, who had taken them bonâ fide for value, without notice express or implied of the plaintiffs' title.—Waterhouse v. Bank of Ireland, V.C. (Ir.)—29 L. R. Ir. 384.

5. Deposit of securities—Negotiable instrument—Shares in company—Certificates—Pledge by stockbroker—Notice—Estoppel.—The plaintiff, who was the registered owner of shares in the St. Louis Breweries Co., which he had deposited with the Provincial Bank as security for an overdraft, instructed D., a stockbroker, to purchase for him certain shares in the Bristol Brewery Co., for which D. was to provide the purchase-money, and advance to the plaintiff sufficient to pay off the overdraft and release the St. Louis shares, which the plaintiff agreed to transfer to D. as security, together with the Bristol shares, when purchased, for the amount so advanced. The Bristol shares were not purchased by D. D. then obtained a loan from the defendants on the security of the St. Louis shares, and transferred them to the defendants. At the time of the transfer the share certificates were not produced, and the defendants accepted a certificate of D. that the certificates were with the company. The company declined when the transfers were forwarded to register them, not having the certificates, and the defendants having called on D. for an explanation, he stated that he had been misinformed by his client that the certificates were with the company. Subsequently D. obtained an order from the plaintiff directing another stockbroker, who held the certificates, to deliver them to him, and D. forwarded them to the company, who registered the transfers to the defendants. D. paid the defendants the amount of their loan, and having sold the shares tendered to the defendants transfers from the defendants to the purchasers, which were duly executed and registered in the books of the company. In an action to have the defendants declared trustees for the plaintiff of the shares, Held, that the defendants, having had the transfers perfected to them without any notice of fraud or illegal dealing on the part of D., were purchasers for value without notice of any defect in their title. —Collis v. Hibernian Bank, C.A. (Ir.)—31 L. R. Ir. 261.

BANKRUPTCY:—

ACT OF BANKRUPTCY—

1. Assignment of whole of property—Assignment to trustees for creditors generally—Exception of leaseholds —Declaration of trust of leaseholds—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 4, sub-section 1 (a).—Section 4, sub-section 1 (a), of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, provides that a debtor commits an act of bankruptcy "if, in England or elsewhere, he makes a conveyance or assignment of his property to a trustee or trustees for the benefit of his creditors generally."

A debtor executed a deed by which he conveyed and assigned all his property, with the exception of his leasehold property, to trustees for the benefit of his creditors generally. The deed contained a declaration that the debtor should stand possessed of all leaseholds and leasehold interests in trust for and to convey and assure the same as the trustees should from time to time direct. The value of the leaseholds was about one-quarter of the value of the whole property of the debtor.

Held, by Lindley and Lopes, L.JJ. (Lord Esher, M.R., dissenting) (affirming the decision of the Divisional Court), that the execution of the deed was an act of bankruptcy within section 4, sub-section 1 (a), of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883.

2. Bankruptcy notice—"Final judgment"—Decree for dissolution of marriage—Order for payment of costs—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 4, sub-section 1 (e) (g).—A decree nisi in a suit for dissolution of marriage on the ground of adultery contained an order that the co-respondent should pay the petitioner's costs. The decree was made absolute and the costs taxed, and an order was made that the co-respondent should pay the amount within a specified time. He did not comply with the order, upon which the petitioner issued a bankruptcy notice against him, with which he again did not comply. A bankruptcy petition was then presented against him.

Held (affirming an order dismissing the petition), that the order of the Divorce Court for payment of the costs was not a "final judgment" within sub-section 1 (g) of section 4 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, and that a bankruptcy notice could not, therefore, be issued in respect of it against the co-respondent; and that there was, therefore, no act of bankruptcy.—In re Binstead, Ex parte Dale, C.A. 452—[1893] 1 Q. 4. Notice of suspension of payment—Letter marked "without prejudice" — Admissibility — Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 4, sub-section 1 (h). —A bankruptcy petition presented against the debtor alleged as the act of bankruptcy that specified in section 4, sub-section 1 (h), of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883—namely, that the debtor had given notice to the creditor that he had suspended, or was about to suspend, payment of his debts. The notice was given by a letter written by the debtor to the creditor, such letter being marked "Private and Confidential. Without prejudice"; and, on the hearing of the petition, the question was raised whether the letter could be looked at by the court for the purpose of determining whether an act of bankruptcy had been committed.

Held, that the letter was admissible in evidence, and, the act of bankruptcy being thereby proved, a receiving order must be made against the debtor.—In re Daintrey, Ex parte Holt, Q.B.D., BKCY. 590—[1893] 2 Q. B. 116.

ASSETS—

5. Assignment of debts—Claim by trustee—Interpleader issue — Application by trustee to set aside assignment—Estoppel.—An assignee of book debts having sued one of the debtors for a debt of £27, the trustee in bankruptcy of the assignor claimed the money, and on the trial of an issue as to the ownership of the debt disputed the assignment on the ground that the assignee had at the time of the assignment notice of an act of bankruptcy committed by the assignor. The trustee, being unsuccessful, afterwards applied to set aside the assignment upon other grounds.

Held (dismissing the application), that, as the trustee might have raised these other grounds at the trial of the issue, and did not do so, he could not set them up upon the present application.—In re Hilton, Ex parte March, Q.B.D., BKCY.—67 L. T. 594.

6. Commission for effecting sale.—By section 44 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, property divisible amongst creditors includes (i.) "all such property as may belong to or be vested in the bankrupt at the commencement of the bankruptcy, or may be acquired by or devolve upon him before his discharge."

An agent employed to find a purchaser for certain property became bankrupt, but succeeded in effecting the sale of the property before obtaining his discharge. The final contract of sale was not completed nor the purchase-money paid until after the date of discharge.

Held, that, as all the service rendered by the agent was rendered before his discharge, and nothing was done by him subsequent thereto which was essential to the completion of the contract, the trustee in bankruptcy was entitled to the commission money, and not the agent himself.—In re Byrne, Ex parte Henry, Q.B.D., BKCY.—67 L. T. 230.

7. Partnership—Joint and separate estates—Rules as to consolidation—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 40.—By the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, s. 40, "In the case of partners the joint estate shall be applicable in the first instance in payment of their joint debts, and the separate estate of each partner shall be applicable in the first instance in payment of his separate debts. If there is a surplus of the separate estates it shall be dealt with as part of the joint estate; if there is a surplus of the joint estate it shall be dealt with as part of the respective separate estates in proportion to the right and interest of each partner in the joint estate."

On the bankruptcy of partners who had previously carried on business separately the joint liabilities were £1,200, and the assets £900. One of the partners having become entitled under a will to a sum of £988, the county court judge ordered the joint and separate estates of the partners to be consolidated, upon the authority of a suggested exception laid down in "Lindley on Partnership" to the above section, that where the two estates are so inextricably blended together as to make it impossible to separate them, the court will consider the two estates as one fund.

Held (assuming the exception still to exist), no order to consolidate ought to be made, as the principal asset, i.e., the money coming under the will, was separate and distinct, and was more than one-half of the total assets.—In re Kriegel, Waring, & Co., Ex parte Trotman, Q.B.D., BKCY.—68 L. T. 588.

8. Relation of trustee's title—Solicitor—Costs—Payment by debtor to solicitor for future services in preparing balance-sheet and calling meeting of creditors—Execution of deed of assignment by debtor—Services rendered after act of bankruptcy—Right of trustee in bankruptcy to repayment—Set-off—Mutual credit.—The debtor, who was then indebted to his solicitor in the sum of £40, consulted his solicitor as to his position, with the result that it was resolved that a balance-sheet should be prepared and a meeting of creditors called. The solicitor declined to act for the debtor on credit, and a sum of £15 was accordingly paid by the debtor to the solicitor to secure his services in the matter. After services to the amount of about £3 had been rendered the debtor committed an act of bankruptcy by executing a deed of assignment for the benefit of his creditors, and, on the application of the official receiver as trustee in the bankruptcy, the county court judge refused to allow the solicitor to retain the balance of £12 in respect of services rendered after such act of bankruptcy, and directed him to hand it over to the trustee.

Held (affirming the decision of the Divisional Court, 41 W. R. 89), that, the title of the trustee under the bankruptcy relating back to the act of bankruptcy, whereby the solicitor's authority to act for the debtor, and consequently the specific purpose for which the £15 was paid, was determined, the balance of that sum appropriated to costs incurred after the act of bankruptcy was repayable to the trustee; that there was no such necessity for the employment of the solicitor after the act of bankruptcy as brought the case within the principle of In re Sinclair, Ex parte Payne, 15 Q. B. D. 616, 34 W. R. Dig. 19, which must not be extended; and, further, that the solicitor was not entitled to set off the balance in respect of the outstanding debt of £40.—In re Pollitt, Ex parte Minor, C.A. 276—[1893] 1 Q. B. 455; 62 L. J. Q. B. 236; 68 L. T. 366.

EXAMINATION—

9. Witness—Examination before special examiner—Refusal to answer questions—Action pending against witness—Duties of official receiver.—A witness under examination refused to answer certain questions put to him by the official receiver upon the ground that his answers might be used against him, and so might prejudice his defence to an action brought against him and the bankrupts by the petitioning creditor. The questions were relevant to the issues in the action, and the solicitor who was employed by the official receiver was the solicitor appearing for the plaintiff in the action.

Held, that the examination would be allowed to proceed only on the petitioning creditor undertaking to enter a stay of proceedings in the action. —In re Desportes, Ex parte Official Receiver, Q.B.D., BKCY.—68 L. T. 233.

EXECUTION—

10. Costs of execution—Interpleader order—Receiving order—Possession money—Notice of receiving order—Bankruptcy Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 71), s. 11.—After seizure by the sheriff under a writ of fi. fa. the goods of the debtor were claimed under a bill of sale, and an interpleader order was made, but, a receiving order having been made against the debtor, notice was given to the sheriff requiring him to hand over the goods to the official receiver. The sheriff declined to hand over the goods pending the interpleader order, and in the bill of costs subsequently brought in by him under section 11 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1890, he claimed possession money down to the date when such order was discharged.

Held, that the sheriff was not entitled to claim under section 11 any costs of execution subsequent to the time when he received the notice mentioned in the section, and that the taxing officer was right in disallowing all possession money after that date. —In re Harrison, Ex parte Sheriff of Essex, Q.B.D., BKCY. 512—62 L. J. Q. B. 266; 68 L. T. 590.

11. Costs of execution—Possession retained without selling, at request of execution creditor and the debtor — Receiving order — Possession money — —Bankruptcy Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 71), s. 11, sub-section (1).—After seizure under a writ of fi. fa. the sheriff remained in possession of the debtor's goods without selling, at the request of the execution creditor and of the debtor. A receiving order was subsequently made against the debtor, and the sheriff handed over the goods to the official receiver, and brought in his bill of costs under section 11 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1890, in which he claimed possession money for the time he remained in possession. This claim was allowed on taxation by the county court registrar, but on a review at the instance of the Board of Trade the High Court taxing master allowed eight days' possession money only.

Held, that the possession money claimed by the sheriff was part of the costs of the execution within the meaning of section 11 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1890, and as such ought to be allowed.—In re Hurley, Q.B.D., BKCY. 653.

FRAUDULENT PREFERENCE—

12. Retransfer of bill of lading to vendor—Bankruptcy of purchaser — Stoppage in transitu.—The decision of the Divisional Court (66 L. T. N. S.

619) reversed, and the appeal allowed upon the ground that, upon the true view of the correspondence and facts, there had not been a concluded agreement between the vendors and the bankrupt to return the bill of lading, and that consequently there had not been a fraudulent preference.—In re O'Sullivan, Ex parte Ferd, Baller, & Co., C.A.—67 L. 13. Arrears owed by debtor for gas—Discontinuance of supply by company—Refusal to continue supply at request of official receiver unless arrears paid—"Owner" or "occupier" of premises—Gas Acts, 1860 and 1871—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), ss. 9, 70.—At the date of the receiving order the debtor was in arrear in respect of gas supplied to his premises during the previous quarter, and the company in consequence cut off the supply, and declined to reconnect it at the request of the official receiver until the arrears were paid. The official receiver paid the amount claimed under protest. On application by the trustee in the bankruptcy for repayment,

Held, that the official receiver could not be said to be owner or occupier of the premises within section 11 of the Gas Act, 1871, and was, therefore, not entitled to call on the company to supply him with gas, and that the application of the trustee must fail.—In re Smith, Ex parte Mason, Q.B.D., BKCY. 159—[1893] 1 Q. PROOF—

17. Loan to trader—Interest varying with profits—Allowance to be made on inability to pay agreed interest by reason of deficiency of profits—Agreement void for uncertainty—Partnership Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 39), ss. 2 (3) (d), 3—28 & 29 Vict. c. 86 (Bovill's Act), ss. 1, 5.—By an agreement between A. and B., which recited that a statement of account signed by A., showing the credits and liabilities of his business, was the basis of the proposal thereinafter made, and that B. had agreed to advance A. the sum of £4,500, it was provided that, in consideration of the said sum paid to A. by B., A. would punctually pay interest on the same by two regular half-yearly payments of £462 10s. for every half-year; and that, in case A. should be unable to pay any portion of the half-yearly payments upon any part of the said sum of £4,500 by reason of the deficiency of the profits of A., then and upon every such occasion a due allowance should be made by B. to A. in respect of the same in a fair and reasonable manner.

In pursuance of this agreement the sum of £4,500 was advanced by B. to A. Subsequently A. was adjudicated a bankrupt, and B. tendered a proof for the amount of his loan, which was rejected on the ground that it was an advance to a person in business on a contract that the lender should receive a rate of interest varying with the profits, and that, by 28 & 29 Vict. c. 86 (Bovill's Act), s. 5, B. was postponed to the other creditors.

Held, that there was nothing in the agreement to show how the allowance in respect of interest was to be calculated; that, as the agreement showed that some allowance was contemplated, and the intention was expressed in such vague terms that no allowance could have been enforced, the whole agreement was void for uncertainty; consequently, the loan was outside Bovill's Act altogether, and B. was entitled to prove for the amount with the other creditors.

RECEIVING ORDER—

20. Judgment debt—Power of court to go behind judgment—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 4, sub-section 1 (g); s. 7—Partnership—"Holding out" as partner—Liability of retiring partner for debts of firm contracted after dissolution of partnership.—Upon the hearing of a creditor's petition for a receiving order against a judgment debtor, the Court of Bankruptcy has power, at the instance of the debtor himself, to go behind the judgment and to inquire into the validity of the debt, even though the debtor has previously applied in the action to set aside the judgment, and his application has been refused, and the refusal affirmed by the Court of Appeal.

A partnership having been dissolved by mutual consent and proper notices of the dissolution given, the mere fact that the retiring partner allows the continuing partner to carry on business in the old firm name is not such a "holding out" of the former as a partner as will render him liable for a debt of the firm contracted after the dissolution with a person who had not dealt with the old firm, and who had no knowledge of the dissolution.—In re Fraser, Ex parte Central Bank of London, C.A.—[1892] 2 Q. B. 633; 67 L. T. 401.

21. Rescission—Consent of petitioning creditor.—

A receiving order having been made against a debtor, he paid the petitioning creditor's debt and applied to the registrar to rescind the receiving order. The only fact proved before the registrar was that the petitioning creditor consented to the rescission. The registrar rescinded the receiving order.

Held, that the registrar had not sufficient evidence before him on which he could rescind the receiving order.—Ex parte Official Receiver, In re Flatau, C.A. 529—[1893] 2 Q. B. 219; 68 L. T. 740.

SECURED CREDITOR—

22. Receiver—Judgment creditors—Appointment of receiver of equitable interest—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), ss. 9, 45, 168.—In July, 1891, judgment was obtained by the appellants in an action for £316, under which execution was issued against the debtor's goods with no effect. In January, 1892, the debtor became entitled, under the will of his mother, to a share in her residuary real and personal estate. In March, 1892, the appellants obtained on an ex parte application an order appointing a receiver in respect of such share. In May, 1892, the debtor was adjudged bankrupt. The appellants moved for a declaration that they were secured creditors in respect of the share to which the debtor was entitled in the residuary estate under his mother's will by virtue of the order appointing the receiver.

Held (affirming the decision of Vaughan Williams, J., 41 W. R. 255), that the order did not constitute them secured creditors.

Per Lindley and Bowen, L.JJ.—An order appointing a receiver ought not to be made on an ex parte application to the judge in chambers.—In re Potts, Ex parte Taylor & Sons, C.A. 337—[1893] 1 Q. B. 648; 62 L. J. Q. B. 392.

23. Valuation of security—Proof—Valuation in bulk—Dividends on securities.—The bankrupt, prior to his bankruptcy, by five similar agreements borrowed sums of money from G., depositing on each occasion certain shares as collateral security. The agreements provided that the securities should extend to any sums of money in which the bankrupt might be indebted to G. while the shares remained in his hands, and G. was authorized to use and employ all such securities at his own risk. At the date of the bankruptcy the amount due by the bankrupt to G. was £26,900. Some of the securities deposited were then comparatively worthless, some were valuable, but G. valued the whole in bulk at £19,000. Since the bankruptcy G. had received as dividends on the shares held by him £1,775, but did not give credit for this sum in his proof, claiming to set it off pro tanto against the interest due to him on the amount represented by the securities.

Held, that, under the circumstances, G. was entitled to retain the dividends so received, and that under the agreements he was not compellable to valuable separately the securities held by him.—In re Du Bedat, BKCY. (Ir.)—29 L. R. Ir. 324.

STAYING PROCEEDINGS—

24. Writ of sequestration—Power of court to restrain—Petition—Secured creditor—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), ss. 9, 10, 45.—By section 10 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, the court may at any time after the presentation of the bankruptcy petition stay any action, execution, or other legal process against the property or person of the debtor.

By section 9, on the making of a receiving order an official receiver shall be thereby constituted receiver of the property of the debtor, and . . . no creditor to whom the debtor is indebted . . . shall have any remedy against the property or person of the debtor in respect of the debt, or shall commence any action, &c. . . . but this section shall not affect the power of any secured creditor to realize or otherwise deal with his security.

The debtor, who was trustee of A. B.'s estate, was ordered to pay into court in a chancery action a certain sum of money, being part of such estate. On his failing to comply with the order, a writ of sequestration was issued under which his property was taken possession of. A receiving order was subsequently made against the debtor, and on the application of the official receiver and the petitioning creditors all further proceedings under the writ of sequestration were restrained. On appeal, Held, that the decision was correct, and that the plaintiff in the chancery action being a creditor and not a secured creditor, was properly restrained under section 10 from enforcing the writ of sequestration.

Semble, the order in chancery, even when followed by the writ of sequestration, did not make the plaintiff a secured creditor within the meaning of section 45.—In re Hastings, Ex parte Hammond-Brown, Q.B.D., BKCY.—61 L. J. Q. B. 654; 67 L. T. 234.

26. Purchaser—Pledge of settled property by donee to third parties before settlement declared void—Title of trustee in bankruptcy—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 47.—The operation of section 47 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, is confined to the person who claims under the voluntary settlement as donee, and does not extend to a purchaser for valuable consideration in good faith from such donee, at any rate where such purchaser had no notice of the settlement.—In re Vansittart, Ex parte Brown (No. 2), Q.B.D., BKCY. 286—[1893] 1 Q. The title of a purchaser for valuable consideration in good faith from the donee under a voluntary settlement prior to the avoidance of such settlement cannot afterwards, therefore, be defeated by the trustee in bankruptcy of the settlor.—In re Brall, Ex parte Norton, Q.B.D., BKCY. 623.

BANKRUPTCY (IRELAND):—

1. Composition—Instalments—Surety—Election of remedy—Claim to prove in administration action for original debt.—A debtor carried in an arrangement for a composition payable in three instalments, the last secured by the promissory note of the debtor and a surety. The last instalment not having been paid, a creditor sued the surety on the promissory note, and recovered judgment, but was unable to realize anything under it. The debtor having died, in an action to administer his estate, the creditor sought to prove for the amount of his original debt, after giving credit for the amount of the two first instalments.

Held, that the creditor had elected to enforce the composition, and that he could only prove for the amount of the unpaid promissory note.—Manton v. Magrath, M.R. (Ir.)—31 L. R. Ir. 106.

2. Debtor's summons—Judgment debt assigned in trust—Bankruptcy (Ireland) Act, 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. c. 58), s. 21, sub-section 6; s. 30.—The assignee of a judgment debt for sufficient amount, though a trustee of the moneys due thereon for other persons, is entitled to obtain in his own name a debtor's summons. — In re O'Brien, Ex parte Morris, BKCY. 4. Settlement—Trader—After-acquired property—Bankruptcy (Ireland) Amendment Act, 1872, s. 52.—In 1883 a trader, by a marriage settlement, assigned to trustees his leasehold premises in which he carried on business, and all property then belonging to him, or thereafter until the raising of the sum of £600, upon trust for the husband, or until he should be adjudicated bankrupt, and upon his death or bankruptcy, upon trusts over. It was thereby declared that all the future property of the husband thereby expressed to be assigned should be subject to the trusts of the settlement, although the same or any part thereof might not be capable of passing at law by the assignment. The husband was allowed by the trustees to remain in undisturbed possession of the property he had at the date of the settlement and all subsequently acquired property until he was adjudicated a bankrupt.

Held, that the settlement, in so far as it purported to charge after-acquired property not actually paid or transferred at the date of the adjudication, was void as against his assignees in bankruptcy under section 52 of the Bankruptcy (Ireland) Act, 1872.—In re M'Crohan, BKCY. Secus, with the expenses of an unnecessary protest.

The B. Bank claimed to prove against the E. Bank, in liquidation, for the expenses of protest for non-payment of bills drawn by B. in Brazil and accepted by E. in England, and also for the expenses of protest for better security in the case of bills that had been so protested, and for the amount of a commission paid by the B. Bank to their bankers in London for the acceptance of the bills for honour, and for providing the money required to meet that acceptance.

Held, that the B. Bank might prove for the expenses of protest for non-payment, but not for the expenses of protest for better security or the amount of the commission.

He had, previously to that date, deposited with his solicitor, Y., the bills in question to secure a debt, and in October, 1892, while the injunction was still in force, he, at the request of Y., indorsed one of the bills. On a motion to commit L. and Y. for contempt of court, on the ground that the bill had been negotiated contrary to the injunction,

Held, that, by the indorsement in October, 1892, Y., who up to that time had been merely the transferee of the bill, became the "holder" of it within the meaning of the Bills of Exchange Act, and the bill was for the first time "negotiated" within the meaning of section 31, sub-section 1, and that there had been a contempt of court.—Day v. Longhurst, CH.D. 3. Promissory note—Note payable to order—Transfer by delivery only—Liability of maker to transferee—Bills of Exchange Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 61), s. 31, sub-section 4.—A promissory note made payable to the payee or order was transferred by delivery without indorsement to the plaintiff as security for the repayment of an advance. The transferor did not intend to part with the whole of his rights in the note, nor to indorse it.

Held, that the plaintiff could not recover upon the note against the maker, section 31, sub-section 4, of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, not giving him any such right of action.—Good v. Walker, Q.B.D.—61 L. J. Q. B. 736.

4. Renewal—Guarantee—Variation—Discharge of surety.—This was a claim in an administration action. The following letter was sent to the claimant's firm by the testator, dated the 24th of December, 1866:—"In reply to your letter of the 22nd inst., I hereby guarantee the payment by F. of two bills you intend to renew for him, one for £1,048 10s. 5d., and the other for £462 6s. 6d., due respectively the 28th inst. and the 4th prox." Two bills were drawn by the claimant's firm on F. for three months, both dated the 22nd of December, 1866, one for £1,025 6s. 11d., and the other for £485 10s. These bills were not met.

North, J., held that a "renewed" bill meant a bill between the same parties for the same amount for the same period as and commencing from the date of expiration of the original bill; and that in this case there was such a variation of the liability guaranteed that the guarantor's estate was released.

Held, by the Court of Appeal, that the word "renew" was not used in its technical sense by the testator, but that he meant to guarantee the payment of the amount of the old bills, and that nothing had happened to discharge him from his guarantee.

Decision of North, J. (40 W. R. 618), reversed.—Barber v. Mackrell, C.A. 341—68 L. T. 29.

5. Validity—Bill payable to "—— order"—Bills of Exchange Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 61), ss. 3, 5, 7, 55.—An instrument was made payable to "—— order," and the blank was never filled in.

Held, that it was payable to "my order," that is the order of the drawer, and that it was a valid bill of exchange.—Chamberlain v. Young, C.A.—[1893] 2 Q. B. 206.

BILL of SALE:—

1. Building agreement—Assignment of building agreement, with plant and materials, as security for loan—Whether such assignment is, as regards plant and materials, a bill of sale—Bills of Sale Acts, 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 31), s. 4, and 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 43), s. 8.—A document assigning to a stranger, as security for a loan, a building agreement made between the assignor (a builder) and a landowner, together with all plant and materials then on the premises, or which might be brought on the premises, but giving no express power of seizure or sale in case of default of payment, though the mortgagee had power in certain events to take possession of plant and materials and complete, is a bill of sale as regards such plant and materials, and requires registration; otherwise such document, as regards the plant and materials, will be void.

2. Default in payment—Seizure of goods—Conditional tender of amount due—Removal of goods—Trespass—Redemption—Bills of Sale Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 43), s. 7.—The grantor of a bill of sale in the form prescribed by the Bills of Sale Act, 1882, having made default in payment of a sum of money thereby secured, the grantee seized the goods comprised in the bill of sale. More than five days afterwards, the goods not having been yet removed from the grantor's premises, the grantor tendered payment of the amount due under the bill of sale, subject to a condition as to the giving of a receipt. The grantee declined to comply with the condition, and removed the goods.

Held, that the grantor could not maintain an action of trespass against the grantee for the removal of the goods, but might redeem them on payment of principal, interest, and expenses incurred by the grantee in the seizure, and the costs of the claim for redemption.—Johnson v. Diprose, C.A. 371—[1893] 1 Q. B. 512; 62 L. J. Q. B. 91; 68 L. T. 485.

3. Execution by attorney—Grantee of bill appointed attorney—Payment on demand—Bills of Sale Acts, 1878, s. 10, sub-section 1; and 1882, s. 10.—Debtors covenanted, in case of default of payments, to execute such a bill of sale as their creditor's solicitor might reasonably require on its being tendered to them, and in case of non-execution appointed their creditor their attorney for the purpose. Creditor presented a bill in which the money owing was payable on demand.

Held (following Hetherington v. Groome, 33 W. R. 103, 13 Q. B. D. 789), that the bill presented was invalid, as not in statutory form, but that the creditor was entitled to tender, and, if necessary, to execute, a proper bill of sale.—Furnivall v. Hudson, CH.D. NOR., J. 358—[1893] 1 Ch. 335; 62 L. J. Ch. 178; 68 L. T. 378.

4. Form in schedule—Untrue statement of consideration—"Term for the defeasance of the security"—Agreement to have prior recourse to other securities—Bills of Sale Act (1878) Amendment Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 43), ss. 8, 9; Form in schedule.—A bill of sale, given by way of security for an advance, was expressed to be made in consideration of a sum of money paid by the grantee to the grantor. At the time of the execution of the bill of sale an agreement was made between the grantor and the grantee that the grantee would not enforce the bill of sale until certain other securities in the hands of the grantee were first realized or attempted to be realized. This agreement was not inserted in the bill of sale. In an action by the grantor to have the bill of sale declared void and delivered up to be cancelled, upon the ground that it was void under section 9 of the Bills of Sale Act, 1882, as not being in accordance with the form in the schedule, the grantee counter-claimed for the principal sum and interest under a covenant for repayment by the grantor contained in the bill of sale. At the trial it was proved that the consideration was not truly stated.

Held, first, that the untrue statement of the consideration did not make the bill of sale void under section 9, as not being in accordance with the form, but only made it void within section 8 in respect of the personal chattels comprised therein; and, secondly, that the agreement that the bill of sale should not be enforced until the other securities were realized or attempted to be realized was not a "term for the defeasance of the security" within the meaning of those words in the form, and that, therefore, the non-insertion of this agreement in the bill of sale did not make the bill of sale void under section 9.

Held, therefore, that the covenant for repayment by the grantor remained unaffected, but that, as the other securities had not been exhausted, the counter-claim was premature.—Heseltine v. Simmons, C.A. 67—[1892] 2 Q. B. 547; 62 L. J. Q. B. 5; 67 L. T. 611.

5. Pledge—Transfer of property—Possession—Bills of Sale Acts, 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 31) and 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 43).—The sheriff having seized the goods of A. under a fi. fa., the appellant (an auctioneer) agreed verbally with A. to pay out the sheriff, provided he was put into possession, with authority to sell by auction and to repay himself, handing over the balance (if any) to A. The sheriff was paid out, the man in possession remaining in possession, not for the sheriff, but for the appellant, and a document was then drawn up embodying this arrangement.

Held (reversing the decision of the Court of Appeal, 39 W. R. 1, 25 Q. B. D. 421), that the appellant did not get his title under the document, but by virtue of the transaction, and, consequently, that there was no bill of sale within the Bills of Sale Acts, 1878 and 1882.

Ex parte Hubbard, 35 W. R. 2, 17 Q. B. D. 690, approved.—Charlesworth v. Mills, H.L. (E.) 129—[1892] A. C. 231; 61 L. J. Q. B. 830; 66 L. T. 690.

6. Receipt—Execution—Goods sold privately—Receipt given by sheriff—Bills of Sale Act, 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 31), ss. 4, 8, 10.—Goods seized by the sheriff under a writ of execution were sold privately by leave of the court, and a receipt was given by the sheriff to the purchaser in the following form:—"Received from, &c., . . . the sum of £122 1s. 9d., being for the goods, chattels, and effects now in and upon the premises No. 471, Bethnal Green-road, which were seized by the sheriff of the county of London under and by virtue of a writ of fi. fa., and hereby sold as far as he lawfully can or may, without any warranty of title, and with the consent of the defendant, who is a builder, and under an order of the master." The goods were left by the purchaser in the possession of the debtor until the presentation of the bankruptcy petition.

Held, that the document was a bill of sale within the meaning of the Bills of Sale Act, 1878, and, not being registered, must be declared void.—In re Hood, Ex parte Blandford, Q.B.D., BKCY. 558—68 L. T. 591.

7. Re-registration — Accidental omission to re-register—Extension of time—Bankruptcy of grantor supervening—Bills of Sale Act, 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 31), ss. 11, 14.—Under section 14 of the Bills of Sale Act, 1878, the court will not rectify an accidental omission to re-register a bill of sale by extending the time to re-register, as against the trustee in bankruptcy of the grantor, where the bankruptcy has intervened between the lapsing of the original registration and the application for extension of time.

8. Specific description—Inventory or schedule therein referred to—Registration—Bills of Sale Act, 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 31), s. 10, sub-section 2—Bills of Sale Act (1878) Amendment Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 43), s. 4.—A bill of sale was given in respect of the furniture and other chattels in the grantor's house. The schedule annexed to the bill specified the furniture and other chattels in each room of the house. Under the heading "Study" was the item, "Eighteen hundred books, as per catalogue." The bill of sale and the schedule were registered, but not the catalogue. No evidence was given that there was any difficulty in identifying the books.

Held (affirming the judgment of Cave, J.), that the catalogue was not referred to in the bill of sale within the meaning of section 10, sub-section 2, of the Bills of Sale Act, 1878, and that the non-registration of the catalogue did not, therefore, render the bill of sale void; and that the books were "specifically described" in the schedule within section 4 of the Bills of Sale Act, 1882.—Davidson v. Carlton Bank, C.A. 132—[1893] 1 Q. B. 82; 62 L. J. Q. B. 111; 67 L. T. 641.

9. "True owner"—Bills of Sale Act (1878) Amendment Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 43), s. 5.—The "true owner" of the personal chattels described in a bill of sale at the time of its execution, within the meaning of section 5 of the Bills of Sale Act, 1882, must be taken to include the person who is the legal owner thereof at that time, irrespective of whether he is also the equitable owner or only trustee for another.—In re Sarle, Ex parte Williams, Q.B.D., BKCY.—[1892] 2 Q. 2. Mortgage—Proviso for redemption—Advanced member—Subsequent alteration of rules—Contract of membership and of mortgage—Liability of mortgagor.—An advanced member of a building society executed a mortgage in favour of the society, the proviso for redemption being upon payment of "the several sums, whether consisting of monthly subscriptions, fines, interest, or other payments which, under the constitution of the said society and the rules and regulations thereof, ought to be by him paid in respect of the share or shares by virtue of which money is now or shall be hereafter advanced to him by the trustees of the said society." At the date of the mortgage the rules of the society did not provide for any contribution by advanced members in respect of losses; but after the date of the mortgage the rules were amended so as to give the directors power to direct a levy upon members to provide for contribution to losses. A levy was duly made under the rules as amended. The mortgagor claimed to redeem without paying any part of the levy.

Held, that the mortgagor's contract was one of membership and mortgage combined; that, by virtue of it, he was bound by the amended rules, although the mortgage deed did not refer to the rules "for the time being"; and that, therefore, he was not entitled to redeem except upon payment of the amount of the levy apportioned in respect of his shares.—Bradbury v. Wild, CH.D. 4. Withdrawal—Member—Notice of withdrawal—Alteration of rules after notice and before payment—Building Societies Act, 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 42), ss. 16, 18.—By the rules of a building society a member, on giving the prescribed notice, might withdraw his shares, and the rules might be altered by the prescribed majority of members.

The society altered a rule to the detriment of a member, P., after P. had given notice to withdraw, but before P. was repaid.

Held, that, though P had a vested right to be paid when he gave his notice, that right was liable to be divested by an exercise of the power left in the society, and liable to be exercised against P., of altering the rules; and that P. was, therefore, bound by the altered rule.

CANADA, LAW of:—

1. British North America Act, 1867—Relations between Crown and provinces—Winding up of bank—Priority of provincial government over other simple contract creditors—Prerogative of the Crown.—The British North America Act, 1867, has not severed the connection between the Crown and the provinces, the relation between them is the same as that which subsists between the Crown and the Dominion in respect of the powers executive and legislative, public property, and revenues as are vested in them respectively. In particular all property and revenues reserved to the provinces by sections 109 and 126 are vested in her Majesty as Sovereign of each province.

Held, affirming a judgment of the Supreme Court of Canada, that the provincial government of New Brunswick, being a simple contract creditor of the Maritime Bank of the Dominion of Canada in respect of public moneys of the province deposited in the name of the Receiver-General of the province, is entitled to payment in full over the other depositors and simple contract creditors of the bank, its claim being for a Crown debt to which the prerogative attaches.—Maritime Bank of Canada v. Receiver-General of New Brunswick, P.C.—[1892] A. C. 437; 61 L. J. P. C. 75; 67 L. T. 126.

2. Fraud—Failure of prrof—New issue as to negligence cannot be raised in appeal.—Where a writ and declaration alleged that the defendant had been guilty of wilful deceit, and had fraudulently effected a transference of fire insurance in his books after a fire had occurred from a company of which he was agent to the appellants, of whom he was also agent, with a specific fraudulent purpose, and such charges of fraud and deceit failed,

Held, that the appellants could not be allowed in a final appeal to contend for the first time that the pleadings and evidence disclosed such negligence or breach of duty by the respondent as their agent as is in law sufficient to infer his liability for the amount paid by them under the insurance so transferred. Fraud was of the essence of the declaration, and the evidence of the respondent directed to that issue cannot be accepted as representing all that he would have brought forward to rebut a charge of negligence; nor had the points connected with that issue been submitted to the courts below. —Connecticut Fire Insurance Co. v. Kavanagh, P.C. —[1892] A. C. 473; 61 L. J. P. C. 50; 67 L. T. 508.

3. Manitoba—Dominion Statute, 33 Vict. c. 3—Manitoba Public Schools Act, 1890—Denominational schools—Powers of provincial Legislature.—According to the true construction of the Constitutional Act of Manitoba, 1870 (33 Vict. c. 3) (Dominion statute), having regard to the state of things which existed in Manitoba at the date thereof, the Legislature of that province did not exceed its powers in passing the Public Schools Act, 1890.

Section 22 of the Act of 1870 authorizes the provincial Legislature exclusively to make laws in relation to education so as not to "prejudicially effect any right or privilege with respect to denominational schools which any class of persons have, by law or practice in the province, at the union."

Held, that the Act of 1890, which abolished the denominational system of public education established by law since the union, but which did not compel the attendance of any child at a public school, or confer any advantage in respect of attendance other than that of free education, and at the same time left each denomination free to establish, maintain and conduct its own schools, did not contravene the above proviso; and that accordingly certain bye-laws of a municipal corporation which authorized assessments under the Act were valid.—City of Winnipeg v. Barrett, City of Winnipeg v. Logan, P.C.—[1892] A. C. 445; 61 L. J. P. C. 58; 67 L. T. 429.

4. Nova Scotia—Revised Statutes of Nova Scotia (5th series), c. 7, s. 19—Appointment of arbitrator in default of the proprietor—Notice not necessary.—Where the warden of the municipality had, under Revised Statutes of Nova Scotia (5th series), c. 7, s. 19, appointed an arbitrator on behalf of the respondent to estimate damages to be paid to him by the appellants under the statute, and it appeared that the respondent had received and neglected a notice under section 18 to appoint,

Held, that such appointment was not a judicial act, and that a fresh notice to the respondent in relation thereto was not a condition precedent to its validity.

Where an award gave a landowner a fixed sum as estimated damages for all works or occupation necessary to or required by the mining lessee,

Held, that, having regard to the subject-matter and scope of the Act, such award was not bad for uncertainty.—Palgrave Gold Mining Co. v. McMillan, P.C.—[1892] A. C. 460; 61 L. J. P. C. 85; 67 L. T. 425.

5. Quebec—Action of ejectment—Effect of Act (18 Vict. c. 3) as to defendant's title—Prescription—Immemorial possession—Disclosure of title with its infirmities.—In an action of ejectment by the Crown, it appeared that the appellant company derived title through a grant made in 1661 by the French Government, which gave no seigneurie over the land in suit, but only a right to make establishments for hunting and fishing within certain limits; that an ordonnance in 1733, together with the action of the French Crown thereunder, did not create or recognize any title in the heirs of the grantee to such seigneurie; that down to 1854 there was no evidence of either its creation or recognition by the British Crown, but that in 1854 the Canadian Act (18 Vict. c. 3) (amended by subsequent Acts), recognized that there was a seigneurie of Mingan, being part of the disputed land the boundaries whereof were conclusively established by a schedule authorized by the Acts.

Held, that the High Court was right in dismissing the suit as regards the scheduled lands. If a mistake had been made the Legislature alone could correct it; a court of law must give effect to the enactment as it stands.

Held, further, with regard to the claim of the company to hold the whole of the land in suit by prescription and immemorial possession, that inasmuch as it had disclosed the true roots of its title, the law of prescription did not apply.—Labrador Co. v. The Queen, P.C.—[1893] A. C. 104; 62 L. J. P. C. 33; 67 L. T. 730.

6. Quebec—Interpretation of Code—Civil Code, ss. 1056, 2262 (2)—Prescription—Widow's right of action distinct from that of deceased.—An appeal to earlier law and decisions for the purpose of interpreting the provisions of a statutory code can only be justified on some special ground, such as the doubtful import or previously acquired technical meaning of the language used therein.

Held, that the Civil Code of Lower Canada does not make it a condition precedent to the right of action given by section 1056 to the widow of a person dying as therein mentioned, that the deceased's right of action should not have been extinguished in his lifetime by prescription under section 2262 (2). The death is the foundation of the right given by the former section, which is governed by the rule of prescription contained therein and is exempt from the rule of prescription which barred the claim of the deceased.—Robinson v. Canadian Pacific Railway Co., P.C.—[1892] A. C. 481; 61 L. J. P. C. 79; 67 L. T. 505.

CANAL:—

Minerals—Right of support—Compensation—Lapse of time—Fulfilment of conditions precedent to be assumed—Statutory powers.—Ordinarily, where land is granted by private grant for the construction of specific works, the grant, in the absence of a contrary intention appearing on the face of it, carries by implication the right of reasonable and necessary support for the works to be constructed.

The same principle applies to titles and rights created by Act of Parliament, and, where an express statutory right is given to make and maintain a thing necessarily requiring support, the right to necessary support is, in the absence of a contrary context, implied to accompany the right to make and maintain the thing requiring support; and, in cases where a mode of compensation is provided for the owners of the lands furnishing such support, the reason for implying that such right of support is intended by the Act are overwhelming.

By a private Act of 1754 the plaintiffs' predecessors in title were empowered to convert a brook and its branches into a navigable river for the use of the public, and to make and maintain such cuts and canals in, upon, and through the lands of owners adjoining as might be proper and requisite for the navigation and carrying out of the undertaking. The Act provided for "the said undertakers, their heirs and assigns, doing as little damage as may be in the premises, and first giving satisfaction to the owners or proprietors of such lands, tenements, and tithes or hereditaments respectively, as shall be digged, cut, removed, or otherwise made use of, or that in any wise shall be diminished, prejudiced, or damaged by or for the carrying on, effecting, or preserving the said navigation, or for maintaining or managing the same," as the commissioners under the Act or a jury should decide.

The undertaking was carried out, and the undertakers paid an annual sum, under the provisions of the Act, to landowners in respect of the lands required and used for the purposes of the canal; but there was in the Act no express power for the undertakers to purchase lands (though persons under disability were authorized to sell lands required for the navigation), and no conveyances of surface lands were ever executed to them.

Under another private Act of 1864 the canal became vested in the plaintiffs. The defendants, who were lessees and owners of coal in the subjacent and adjacent lands over which the canal was constructed, in the ordinary course of working their coal endangered the canal. Upon the plaintiffs asking for an injunction to restrain the defendants from so working their mines as to cause damage to the canal,

Held, that provisions for compensation to those whose lands would be required for the making and maintenance of the canal were to be found in the Act of 1754, authorizing the undertaking; that the right of support required for the canal and the value of the minerals underlying the lands taken and used might have been—whether or not they in fact were—taken into account and estimated in the price to be calculated and given to the landowners before the works were undertaken, had the landowners been sufficiently prescient to demand it; that, after so great a length of time, it must be presumed that all was paid for which was thought worth claiming for, and that all conditions precedent were fulfilled which were requisite to give the plaintiffs' predecessors the necessary right of support; and that the plaintiffs were therefore entitled to an injunction.

Decision of Kekewich, J., reversed.—London and North-Western Railway Co. v. Evans, C.A. 149—[1893] 1 Ch. 16; 62 L. J. Ch. 1; 67 L. T. 630.

CARRIER:—

Through rate—Wharfinger—Principal and agent—Liability of wharfinger.—The defendants, who were wharfingers in London, in answer to a request by the plaintiffs quoted a through rate for the carriage of machinery from London to Cork, at owners' risk, including collection within three miles and delivery at other side, and freight and wharfage at both ends. The plaintiffs paid the through rate, and delivered the machinery to the defendants. The machinery was damaged while on board a steamer belonging to a steam packet company.

Held, that there was no concluded contract in the above documents between the plaintiffs and the defendants, and that parol evidence was admissible to prove that the defendants received the goods as wharfingers, and acted in the carriage as agents only, and that they were not liable.—Pontifex & Wood v. Hartley & Co., C.A.—62 L. J. Q. B. 196.

CHARITY:—

1. Mortmain—Will made before passing of Act—Death of testator after passing of Act—Mortmain and Charitable Uses Act, 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 73) s. 9.—A testator by his will, dated before the passing of the Mortmain Act, 1891, gave his residuary estate, consisting of realty and personalty, "in trust to pay such part of my said residuary estate which may by law be given for charitable purposes to the Brompton Hospital." He gave the remainder of his residuary trust estate to his wife's niece. Testator died after the passing of the Mortmain Act, 1891.

Held, that the hospital was entitled to the whole of testator's residuary estate.—In re Bridger. Brompton Hospital for Consumption v. Lewis, CH.D. NOR., J. 104—[1893] 1 Ch. 44; 62 L. J. Ch. 146; 67 L. T. 549.

2. Mortmain — Contingent bequest to charity—Investment on mortgage—Discretion of trustees.—A testator bequeathed the residue of his personal estate to trustees on trust for sale, conversion, and investment, and to stand possessed of the same on trust for his niece for life, with remainder to her issue, and on her decease without issue on trust to transfer the same or so much thereof as might by law be so applied for the benefit of a charity. He gave his trustees power to postpone the conversion of his mortgage securities, and also power to invest on real securities. The trustees invested part of the residuary personal estate on mortgage of real estate; and some part of the residuary personal estate, consisting at the decease of the testator of real securities, was left unconverted. Testator's niece died without issue.

Held, that the charity could only take such parts of the residuary estate as, at the decease of the testator's niece, consisted of pure personalty.—In re Corcoran, Corcoran v. Riddell, CH.D. NOR., J. 311—62 L. J. Ch. 267; 67 L. T. 751.

3. Mortmain—Interest in land—Surplus lands stock of Metropolitan Railway—Metropolitan Railway Act, 1885 (48 & 49 Vict. c. lxxxix.), s. 39—Mortmain and Charitable Uses Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 42), ss. 4, 10.—By a series of Acts passed between 1862 and 1880 the Metropolitan Railway Co. was empowered to deal with its surplus lands otherwise than in accordance with the provisions of the Lands Clauses Act, 1845, and was vested with extensive power of sale and leasing for the benefit of the company and its shareholders. By an Act of 1885 the company was empowered to divide its ordinary stock into two portions, which should be entitled respectively to the revenues arising from the surplus lands and estates, and to the ordinary revenue arising from the working and use of the railways, works, and stations. By section 39 the surplus lands were vested in the company, together with powers of dealing with such lands. These powers, however, were to be exercised in accordance with the decision of a statutory committee thereby constituted, in whom were vested "the sole decision, control, and management of the lands, and the sale, lease, or other dealing with any part or parts thereof." The sole right of a stockholder under the section was to have the net annual income arising from the surplus lands applied "to the payment of interest upon the surplus lands stock."

Held, that such stock was not an interest in land within the Mortmain and Charitable Uses Act, 1888, and could therefore be validly bequeathed for charitable purposes.—In re Hollon, Forbes v. Hardcastle, CH.D. STI., J.—68 L. T. 160.

4. "Religious societies"—Charitable purposes—Bequest.—Testator bequeathed his residuary estate "to the following religious societies—viz."—then followed a blank—"to be divided in equal shares among them."

Held, (1) that this bequest was to be treated as a bequest for "religious purposes"; (2) that, being for "religious purposes," it was primâ facie a bequest for "charitable purposes"; and (3) that, as no religious society was particularly mentioned, there was nothing from which anything to the contrary of this primâ facie presumption could be shown; and, consequently, that a scheme for the application cy-près of the charitable gift should be directed.

Decision of Kekewich, J., reversed.—In re White, White v. White, C.A. 683—[1893] 2 Ch. 41; 62 L. J. Ch. 342; 68 L. T. 187.

5. Sale of land—Consent of Charity Commissioners—Charitable Trusts Act, 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 137), ss. 24, 62, 66—Charitable Trusts Amendment Act, 1855 (18 & 19 Vict c. 124), ss. 29, 48.—Land conveyed to a charitable corporation by a voluntary settlement was afterwards sold by the corporation to a purchaser who took exception to such sale as ultrà vires without the consent of the Charity Commissioners.

Held, that this land, not being subject to any specific trust, did not require the consent of the Charity Commissioners for its sale.—In re Corporation of the Sons of the Clergy and Skinner.—CH.D. NOR., J. 461—[1893] 1 Ch. 178; 62 L. J. Ch. 148; 67 L. T. 751.

6. Sale of land—Consent of Charity Commissioners—Sale to tenants.—Lands were vested in the College of Physicians upon trust to apply the rents and profits towards payment of the salaries of professors in connection with the college, and the balance of the rents for the benefit of a hospital. The college had the power of leasing for thirty-one years, but they were restrained by a statute of 15 Geo. 2, which had been passed to regulate the charity, from alienating or disposing of the land otherwise. The college having entered into agreements with their tenants for sale under the Lands Purchase Acts, Held, that the vendors were entitled to sell, but not without obtaining the sanction of the Court of Chancery, or the consent of the Charity Commissioners.—In re College of Physicians, C.A. (Ir.)—32 L. R. Ir. 341.

COMPANIES CLAUSES ACT:—

Transfer of stock—Trustee—Deposit of certificate—Blank transfer—Subsequent filling up by transferee—Delivery—Execution—Purchase for value without notice—Legal title—Companies Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845 (8 & 9 Vict. c. 16), ss. 14, 15, 18.—M. E., the executor of a sole surviving trustee of a marriage settlement, held on behalf of the trust a sum of stock of a company which was governed by the provisions of the Companies Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845; his name was indorsed as executor on the certificate, and the certificate bore on the face of it that "no interest in this stock can be acquired by the deposit of this certificate." He deposited the certificate with a bank to secure an overdraft, stating that the stock belonged to him absolutely; he also signed and deposited a loan note, undertaking when called upon to execute a proper assignment or transfer; and he further deposited a blank transfer, signed and sealed by him, purporting to transfer the stock. The period of credit having run out, the bank, after giving notice to him that they proposed to register the stock in their name, filled in the blank transfer with their own name as transferees, and got themselves registered as owners of the stock. The transfer, at the time of and after being filled up, was never seen by M. E., but the bank afterwards wrote and told him that they had received the dividend on the stock, and that they proposed to credit him with the amount, and they were subsequently authorized by him to sell the stock, but it was not, in fact, sold.

Held, that there had been nothing amounting to a redelivery of the transfer by the transferor after the blanks had been filled in by the bank, and that the bank had no legal title to the stock.

Decision of Wright, J., affirmed.—Powell v. London and Provincial Bank, C.A. 545.

COMPANY:—

BORROWING POWERS—

1. Debenture—Compromise—Meeting—Majority binding minority—Notice—"Fourteen clear days"—Arrangement to receive shares instead of debentures—Dissentient minority.—A company issued a class of debentures which charged all its property, and it was provided that a meeting of debenture-holders should have power, by special resolution, "to sanction any modification or compromise of the rights of the debenture-holders against the company or against the property." The company afterwards transferred its assets to a new company, subject to the debentures, and was dissolved. The new company, in August, 1892, passed resolutions for voluntary winding up, with a view to reconstruction. Its funds were exhausted, and its property consisted of certain mining rights in California, which would be forfeited unless fees to a considerable amount were paid by the end of 1892. A scheme was formed for a new company with a larger capital, as part of which scheme the debenture-holders were to accept ordinary shares in the new company instead of their debentures. This scheme was duly sanctioned by the shareholders, and was also sanctioned by a special resolution of a meeting of debenture-holders on the 31st of October, 1892. A dissentient debenture-holder brought his action to restrain the carrying out of this scheme, on the ground that it was beyond the powers of a meeting of debenture-holders to sanction it so as to bind any dissentient debenture-holders. North, J., refused an interlocutory injunction, on the ground that the plaintiff was not damnified by the proceedings if they did not bind him.

Held, by the Court of Appeal, the motion being treated as the trial, that the difficulty in the way of the debenture-holders enforcing their rights made the case one in which the power to compromise arose, and that this was a compromise of the rights of the debenture-holders against the property which it was within the power of a meeting of debenture-holders to sanction by special resolution so as to bind the dissentient debenture-holders, and the action was dismissed.

But where under a similar power a resolution approving a similar scheme to exchange debentures for shares was passed by a body of debenture-holders whose rights were undisputed and capable of being enforced without difficulty,

Held, that the power to compromise had not arisen, and that the resolution did not bind a dissentient minority: Mercantile Investment and General Trust Co. v. International Co. of Mexico, [1893] 1 Ch. 384n.

The question what is a "compromise" discussed.

An advertisement in the newspaper convening a meeting of debenture-holders under a trust deed is sufficient notice, unless the deed expressly requires notice to be given by circular.

Notice "at least fourteen days before the date" of a meeting of debenture-holders means fourteen clear days between the issue of the advertisement or circular calling the meeting and the day of meeting; and the notice so given is effectual, though it may not actually reach any debenture-holders until some days afterwards.—Sneath v. Valley Gold (Limited), C.A.—[1893] 1 Ch. 477; 68 L. T. 602.

2. Debenture — Construction — "Property and assets"—Uncalled capital—Charge.—The principal and interest payable upon each debenture in a company was secured by a first charge and mortgage upon all and singular the property, assets, and revenues of the company. The defendant company had power by the articles of association to raise money upon debentures charged upon the property and rights of the company both present or future, or either, including uncalled capital. By the memorandum of association one of the objects of the company was expressed to be to borrow money by the issue of debentures charged on the company's property, present or future, including its uncalled capital.

Held, that the uncalled capital was included in the debentures under the word "assets," even if the word "property" was not sufficient.—Page v. International Agency and Industrial Trust, CH.D. STI., J.—62 L. J. Ch. 610; 68 L. T. 435.

3. Debenture—Debenture-holders' security in danger—Interest on debentures—Time for payment—Receiver and manager.—In a debenture-holders' action, where the security was endangered, but no interest was due on the debentures, and the time for payment had not arrived, the court, on the motion of the debenture-holders, made an order for the appointment of a receiver and manager.—Edwards v. Standard Rolling Stock Syndicate, CH.D. NOR., J. 343—[1893] 1 Ch. 574; 62 L. J. Ch. 605; 68 L. T. 194.

4. Debenture—Debenture trust—Failure of trust—Return of money to debenture-holders—Minority of debenture-holders.—A company, incorporated under Spanish law, obtained a concession from the Spanish Government to construct and work a railway in Spain. The line was to be constructed in three sections, and was to form part of a through route. The company created by deed first mortgage debentures to bearer, and hypothecated the railway to secure the same. The company entered into contracts with a construction company to make the line and provide rolling stock, and by the contracts engaged to issue certain of the debentures, the proceeds of which were to be paid to three commissioners as trustees for the debenture-holders, to be applied, subject to interest and amortization of bonds, in completing the railway. The company thereupon issued a prospectus inviting subscriptions. £320,000 was raised and paid to Paris bankers, but, owing to litigation in Paris, was only paid to the commissioners after considerable delay, reduced by expenses and the service of the loan. Meanwhile the construction of the railway was impeded for lack of funds. One section only was partially completed, and the other two had not been commenced. The concession, owing to breaches thereof, was liable to forfeiture. In 1890 the contracts with the construction company were put an end to and the contractors released, whereupon a temporary contract was entered into with another company to keep the works going. Two actions were commenced by a small, but substantial, minority of the bondholders, who desired a return of their money, and a third action by other bondholders, who desired to have the scheme carried out.

Held, that the court must decide whether the company possessed resources in præsenti or in prospectu available to complete the line; that, on the evidence, there was no reasonable hope, as a matter of business, that the line could be completed out of such resources; that a portion of the line was comparatively valueless; that the minority of the bondholders were entitled to a return of their money, subject to costs and charges properly incurred, and subject to a sufficient part of the funds being applied to properly realize the property of the company charged in favour of the bondholders; that payment of interest and the amortization of outstanding bonds must cease; and an inquiry directed to ascertain in what way the property charged could best be realized.—Collingham v. Sloper; Foreign, American, and General Investment Trust Co. v. Sloper, CH.D. NOR., J. 550—[1893] 2 Ch. 96; 62 L. J. Ch. 416.

5. Debenture—First and second issue—Priority—Reissue—"Outstanding"—Series of debentures.—A limited company had power under its memorandum to raise money by the issue of debentures secured by mortgage or otherwise upon all or any part of its property. The company shortly after its incorporation issued a series of debentures headed "Issue of £10,000 Six per Cent. Mortgage Debentures." Each debenture was to secure £100, and the company charged all its property, subject to the conditions indorsed thereon. The conditions stated that the debenture was one of a series issued or about to be issued by the company upon and subject to the like conditions for securing an aggregate sum and interest, and that the debentures as and when respectively issued should operate as creating continuously-overriding floating charges upon the undertaking and property of the company, subject to a certain mortgage for securing to the holders rateably and equally inter se, and without any preference or priority one over another, but in priority to all other debts for the time being owing by the company (save as aforesaid), of the principal moneys and interest owing upon the debentures, and as precluding the company, whilst any of the debentures should remain in force, from creating or making any further mortgage, charge, incumbrance, or security upon or over its undertaking or its property, in competition with or otherwise than subject or in subordination to the debentures then outstanding. Subsequently the company issued a second series of debentures in similar form to the first, except that the conditions stated that these latter debentures were "subject and in subordination to the debentures which have already been issued by the company for securing an aggregate principal sum of £10,000 and interest at the rate of £6 per cent. per annum, or such of them as are now outstanding." Neither series of debentures was secured by a trust deed. Some of the first series of debentures were issued before the date of the second charge, and others of the first series were issued subsequently to the second charge.

Held, that the words "debentures already issued" meant the series of, and not the particular debentures already issued, and that the words "or such of them as are now outstanding" meant such of them as, having been issued, had not been paid off, and that, consequently, all the second debentures were postponed to all the first debentures, whenever issued, except such of them as had been reissued.—Lister v. Lister & Son (Limited), CH.D. WILL., J. 330—62 L. J. Ch. 568; 68 L. T. 826.

6. Debenture—Debenture-holders' action—Protection of mortgage security—Assets of company not in actual jeopardy—Principal and interest not immediately payable—Application for appointment of receiver and manager—Practice.—Upon the principle that a mortgagee is entitled to the protection of his security, the court will, at the instance of a debenture-holder of a limited company, where the debenture creates a floating charge on the property of the company, appoint a receiver of the property so charged, if the security is in jeopardy through the insolvency of the company, even though the principal secured by the debenture is not immediately payable, and default has not yet been made in payment of interest for the period prescribed by the debenture.

Decision of Kekewich, J., affirmed.—Thorn v. Nine Reefs (Limited), C.A.—67 L. T. 93.

7. Debenture—Receiver and manager—Action by debenture-holder—Authority to charge assets in priority to debentures—Salvage—Jurisdiction.—A company, carrying on the business of music-hall proprietors, issued debentures charged on all the property of the company. In a debenture-holders' action a receiver and manager of the property and business of the company was appointed, with liberty to raise a loan of £1,000, and to charge the same on the assets of the company in priority to the debentures. The receiver and manager carried on the business at a loss, which was defrayed out of the said sum. The plaintiff applied that the receiver and manager might be at liberty to raise a further sum of £1,000 to be secured in the same manner as the previous loan; and the company consented to the application. There was evidence that the closing of the music-hall would considerably diminish the value of the property, and that it was very desirable to sell the business as a going concern. The hall itself was subject to mortgages having priority to the debentures.

Held, that the court had jurisdiction to sanction expenditure which was necessary to prevent property in the hands of its officers from being destroyed or forfeited, but that the necessity for the expenditure must be shown to be especially urgent whenever all the parties interested were not before the court.

Held, that a debenture-holder, suing on behalf of himself and all others the debenture-holders of a company, did not represent other debenture-holders for the purpose of binding them by any agreement or representation.

And, that the proposed expenditure was merely speculative, that special urgency was not shown, and that the application must be refused.—Securities and Properties Investment Corporation v. Brighton Alhambra (Limited), CH.D. KEK., J.—62 L. J. Ch. 566; 68 L. T. 249.

CHANGE OF NAME—

8. Irregularity—Registrar of Joint-Stock Companies—Certificate—Jurisdiction—Board of Trade—Companies Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 89), ss. 13, 18, 174.—An order was made altering the name of a limited company, and a certificate was issued by the Registrar of Joint-Stock Companies that the company had changed its name. It was then found that the resolutions upon which the order was based were bad.

On motion to direct the registrar to restore the old name, and also to discharge the order, Held, that the court had no jurisdiction over the Registrar of Joint-Stock Companies, he being an officer of the Board of Trade, and not of the court. —In re Australasian Mining Co., CH.D. KEK., J.—68 L. T. 437.

DIRECTORS—

9. Liability—Breach of duty—Gift of bonus, debentures, and shares—Approval of shareholders— Ultrà vires.—The directors of a company entered into an agreement with a firm of contractors, under which the contractors agreed to execute certain works on behalf of the company for a specified sum in debentures and fully-paid shares of the company, and by means of a stipulated portion of those debentures and shares to carry out the provisions of certain contemporaneous agreements under which debentures and fully paid-up shares of the company were to be made over to third parties without consideration. Each of the shareholders and debenture-holders for the time being of the company took a benefit under one or other of the agreements.

Held, that, to the extent to which the contractors had been provided with debentures and shares to be made over to third parties without consideration, the transaction was ultrà vires of the company; and that the directors were liable to make good the loss occasioned thereby.

If, acting fairly, honestly, and reasonably, directors mistake the legal powers of their company, they may not be made answerable, either in an action or in a winding up. But if they in fact know, or with due care ought to have known, that the acts done are beyond the powers of the company, then if they do those acts even in the honest belief of necessity in the interests of the company, they take the risks of the consequences.—London Trust Co. v. Mackenzie, CH.D. WRI., J.—68 L. T. 380.

DIVIDENDS—

10. Sale of business—Profit and loss account—Profits on capital—Payment of—Dividends out of capital.—A banking company which had a nominal capital of £1,000,000, divided into 100,000 shares of £10 each, had issued all its shares, the sum of £5 having been paid on each share, which thus constituted a paid-up capital of £500,000. The company sold a part of its business for £875,000, realizing thereby a net profit of £205,000 after bringing the £500,000 into account, and after making certain payments to the purchasers.

Held, that the company was justified in carrying the £205,000 to the profit and loss account, and applying the same as dividends, the capital of the company (i.e., the £500,000) being intact.—Lubbock v. British Bank of South America, CH.D. CHI., J. 103—[1892] 2 Ch. 198; 61 L. J. Ch. 498; 67 L. T. 74.

FORMATION—

11. Expenses of private Act—Receipt by agent of fixed sum for payment of such expenses—Fiduciary position—Liability to account—Private advantage—Ratification by directors—Ultrà vires.—The pursuers were a company incorporated by special Act for the construction of certain tramways, the Act containing the usual clause that the expenses of obtaining the Act should be paid by the company. The pursuers, through the defender, M., their solicitor, entered into an agreement with contractors for the execution of the work for £93,000, the contract providing that the expenses of procuring the special Act should be paid by the contractors. On the following day another agreement was entered into between the contractors, the defender M., and the defender B., the latter being the engineer of the company. By this agreement the defenders undertook to relieve the contractors of the liability to pay the expenses of obtaining the Act in consideration of a sum of £17,000, £5,000 of which was paid in cash.

Held (affirming the decision of the Court of Session, 18 Ct. Sess. Cas., 4th series (Rettie), 1140), that the defenders were liable to account for the £17,000, which they had received under the agreement, without charging against the pursuers any expense which was not within the definition of the clause of the Act, for the agreement, so far as it provided for the retention by the defenders of the balance of the £17,000 after defraying the expenses sanctioned by the Act, was illegal and void; that the facts did not show any adoption of the agreement by the pursuers, but that, even if the agreement had been adopted by the directors and shareholders, such adoption would have been ultrà vires the Act.—Mann and Beattie v. Edinburgh Northern Tramways Co., H.L. (Sc.)—[1893] A. C. 69; 62 L. J. P. C. 74; 68 L. T. 96.

13. Sale of assets to new company—Shares in purchasing company—Voluntary winding up—Companies Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 89), s. 16.—It is competent for a company, by its memorandum of association, to exclude the operation of the 161st section of the Companies Act, 1862, in the event of a sale by the company of its undertaking to another company, the whole or part of the consideration for such sale being shares in the purchasing company, notwithstanding that, at the time of the execution of the contract for sale, it is in contemplation to wind up the selling company voluntarily.—Cotton v. Imperial and Foreign Agency and Investment Corporation, CH.D. CHI., J.—[1892] 3 Ch. 454; 61 L. J. Ch. 684.

PROSPECTUS—

14. Misrepresentation—Concealment of facts—Rescission of contract to take shares.—The prospectus of a company, which was issued in February, 1889, contained (inter alia) statements to the following effect:—(1) That the company was formed for the purpose of purchasing patent rights of a most formidable projectile, the invention of S.; (2) that the projectile contained a charge of dynamite or other high explosive, which had "been fired with safety from rifled, smooth-bored, muzzle, and breech-loading guns with a full charge of gunpowder"; that there was no necessity for any alteration of the guns or of the charge of powder; and that the projectile was destined to play an important part in naval and military operations; (3) that "the experimental firing last summer demonstrated the practicability and utility of the invention, and attracted the attention of the military authorities of several foreign countries as well as our own; and at the earnest solicitation of the Senate military committee, and the representatives of several foreign Governments, further experiments were made on the Potomac. The results were astonishing, and showed the invention to be all that the inventor claimed for it.—The Independent Journal, New York."

The facts were that, as to (1), no patent was in existence at the date of the issue of the prospectus. A provisional specification had been granted on the 7th of December, 1888, to S. for his invention, and this had ripened into a patent on the 29th of June, 1889. As to (2) and (3) "the experimental firing" referred to had taken place in America some four years before the date of the prospectus, and in respect of a different patent. At one of these American trials the experiments had resulted in nothing but disaster, two guns having been destroyed by the projectile bursting in the bore, and the trials on the Potomac were only partially successful. At a subsequent trial in Wales, after the commencement of the action, it had been proved that dynamite shells could be fired out of a gun with ordinary service charges of powder without bursting the gun. The plaintiff having agreed to take shares on the faith of the statements in the prospectus, brought an action for rescission of his contract, on the ground of misrepresentation and concealment of facts.

Held, that the prospectus was not an honest, candid, and straightforward document, for it suggested that which was untrue, and was in the highest degree misleading; and that, therefore, the plaintiff was entitled to the relief which he sought.—Scott v. Snyder Dynamite Co., C.A.—67 L. T. 104.

15. Misrepresentation — Action of deceit.—Held, that a material statement in a prospectus of a company was false to the knowledge of the directors, who issued the prospectus, at the time it was made, that the plaintiff was thereby induced to take certain shares in the company, and that an action of deceit against the directors would accordingly lie.—Knox v. Hayman, C.A.—67 L. T. 137.

REDUCTION OF CAPITAL—

16. Jurisdiction — Confirmation of reduction — Companies Act, 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 131), ss. 9, 11, 12—Companies (Winding-up) Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 63), ss. 1, 2, 32 (sub-section (2)), 33—Order of the Lord Chancellor, March 26, 1892.—The judge to whom the jurisdiction of the High Court in the winding up of companies has been assigned by the order of the Lord Chancellor of the 26th of March, 1892, has jurisdiction to confirm a reduction of the capital in the case of a company which may be wound up in the High Court under the Companies (Winding-up) Act, 1890. — In re Ocean Queen Steamship Co., CH.D. WILL., J. 570—[1893] 2 Ch. 666; 68 L. T. 828.

17. Payment of shares by appropriation of reserve fund—Companies Act, 1867, ss. 9, 11, 13, 14, 25—Companies Act, 1877 (40 & 41 Vict. c. 26), ss. 3, 4.—A company set aside a reserve fund, and expended the greater part thereof in improving their property. On a further issue of shares the existing shareholders were credited with a number of shares as fully paid up equal in value to the amount of the reserve fund, which was carried to the capital account in the books of the company. On petition by the company for reduction of capital, Held, that, as the proposed reduction of the capital of the company did or might involve the diminution of liability in respect of unpaid capital, the petition must stand over until creditors had been advertised for.—In re Eastern and Australian Steamship Co., CH.D. NOR., J. 373—68 L. T. 321.

18. Purchase by company of its own shares—Sale by company of assets for good consideration—Shares in excess of wants of company—Companies Act, 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 131), s. 9—Companies Act, 1877 (40 & 41 Vict. c. 26), s. 3.—A company was registered in 1889 to carry on the business of hotel proprietors, with a capital of £130,000, divided into 26,000 shares of £5 each. In 1891 the company took on lease the M. Hotel, and increased their capital by creating 5,000 new shares of £5 each. Debentures to the amount of £75,000 were issued, all of which were outstanding, and there were very few other creditors. Upwards of £23,000 was expended on the M. Hotel, and it was worked at a loss. The company agreed with B., who was one of the lessors of the M. Hotel, to hand over the possession of the M. Hotel to B., who should pay the rent and carry on the hotel. The directors undertook to obtain, and obtained, from the shareholders the necessary resolutions for reducing the capital of the company by writing off £23,710 of fully-paid ordinary shares held by B. and his associates, and undertook to obtain the sanction of the High Court of Justice in England to such reduction, whereupon such shares should be extinguished. B was to pay to the company, for stores and goodwill, 15,000 dols. The company had power, under its articles of association, to reduce its capital by cancelling capital.

Held, that this transaction was not a purchase by the company of its own shares, but was a sale by the company of some of its assets for less than their cash value, in consideration of a release from heavy burdens and of a surrender of shares.

Held, also, that the sanction of the court to the transaction was only necessary for the permanent extinguishment of the shares, and that the court had jurisdiction to, and would, sanction the transaction.

19. Fully-paid shares—Syndicate—Opening up of business—Issue of shares as fully paid up—Consideration—Registered contract—Companies Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 89), ss. 8, 38 (4)—Companies Act, 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 131), s. 25.—A company limited by shares registered under the Companies Act, 1862, has no power to issue shares as fully paid up for which no consideration is given. This is so, although the shares are issued under a contract filed in accordance with the provisions of section 25 of the Companies Act, 1867.

The company is not estopped by recitals in the agreement purporting that consideration has been given from showing that there was none.—In re Eddystone Marine Insurance Co., C.A. 642.

20. Fully-paid shares — Bonus shares—Issue of fully-paid shares to persons taking up debentures of company—Companies Act, 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 131), s. 25.—The directors of a company issued a circular to the shareholders, inviting applications for debentures of the company upon the terms that the company should issue to the persons taking the debentures, and paying the amount due thereon in full, two free and fully paid-up shares of £5 each in the company for each debenture of £10. In accordance with the terms of the circular, and in pursuance of an agreement made between the company and the debenture-holders, which had been previously filed with the Registrar of Joint-Stock Companies, the company allotted to each debenture-holder a number of fully paid-up shares. The company was ordered to be wound up, and the liquidator sought to put the holders of these bonus shares upon the list of contributories as holders of shares upon which nothing had been paid up.

Held, that the agreement to issue shares as fully paid up was ultrâ vires the company, and was void; and that, therefore, there was in fact no registered contract within the meaning of the Companies Act, 1867, s. 25.

Held, therefore, that the owners of the bonus shares were liable to pay up the full amount thereof in cash.—In re Railway Time Tables Publishing Co., CH.D. KEK., J.—68 L. T. 649.

21. Issued at a discount — Registered contract — Companies Act, 1862, ss. 8, 38—Companies Act, 1867, s. 25.—A company incorporated with limited liability under the Companies Acts cannot issue its shares at a discount.

In re Almada and Tirito Co., 36 W. R. 593, 38 Ch. D. 415, approved.

Per Lord Herschell.—Though the company cannot exclude the liability of shareholders in a winding up to the extent unpaid on their shares for the benefit of creditors, the company may, where the memorandum of association permits, enter into any undertaking with those invited to become shareholders as to the terms on which the shares shall be taken, and as to the rights of the respective shareholders inter se.—Ooregum Gold Mining Co. v. Roper; Wallroth v. Roper, H.L. (E.) 90—[1892] A. C. 125; 61 L. J. Ch. 337; 66 L. T. 427.

22. Issued at a discount—Winding up—Contributory—Purchase by shareholder—Constructive notice.—A company issued shares at a discount. In respect thereof a contract, in which the numbers of the shares were specified, was registered with the Registrar of Joint-Stock Companies. A shareholder subsequently purchased shares in the open market, and the company issued to him certificates, in which it was stated that the shares were fully paid up. The shares so purchased were part of the shares issued by the company at a discount. The shareholder was aware that the company had issued shares at a discount. He did not, however, search the register of joint-stock companies, and, in fact, had no notice that the shares purchased by him had been improperly issued. In the winding up of the company, it was sought to place him on the list of contributories in respect of the said shares.

Held, that the shareholder, in omitting to search the register, had not been guilty of gross or culpable negligence, and consequently that he ought not to be settled on the list.—In re New Chile Gold Mining Co., CH.D. STI., J.—68 L. T. 15.

23. Lien—Lien on member's shares for debt due to company—Waiver—Transfer—Articles of association.—A lien conferred by articles of association on the shares of any member indebted to the company is valid, any transfer by such indebted member being thereby made dependent on the consent of the directors.

Bradford Banking Co. v. Briggs, 35 W. R. 521, 12 App. Cas. 29, approved.

Such a lien may be discharged by a new arrangement between creditor and debtor, the terms of which are incompatible with its retention. But the mere fact of the debtor agreeing to give his creditor authority to sell part of the subjects without notice, upon his making default, is not sufficient to warrant the inference that the creditor is not to realize the other parts of his security.

Where a shareholder indebted to a company applied for time, and gave such an authority with respect to certain shares other than those in question in this action,

Held, that no limitation of the lien in regard to the shares in the action was contemplated, and that a transfer of such shares by the indebted shareholder should not be registered.—Bank of Africa v. Salsbury Gold Mining Co., P.C. 47—[1892] A. C. 281; 61 L. J. P. C. 34; 66 L. T. 237.

24. Lien—Lien on members' shares for debt due to company—Payment of mortgage debt—Right of shareholder to require transfer of security to his nominee in lieu of reconveyance—Conveyancing and Law of Property Act, 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 41), ss. 2, 15.—The articles of association of a company provided that the company should have a first and paramount lien upon the shares of each member for his debts to the company, and that, for the purpose of enforcing the lien, the directors might, on default in payment of a debt, sell the shares and execute a transfer of the shares sold to the purchaser.

Held, that this lien constituted a "charge" upon the shares within the meaning of section 2, sub-section 6, of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, for a debt due from the shareholder to the company, and that, consequently, section 15 applied, and entitled the shareholder to require the company, on payment of the sum due, to assign the debt and their lien on the shares to his nominee.

The shareholder undertaking, on four days' notice by the company, to pay to them the sum due from him upon their transferring their lien to his nominee, an injunction was granted restraining the company, until the trial of the action or further order, from selling or transferring the shares.—Everitt v. Automatic Weighing Machine Co., CH.D. NOR., J.—[1892] 3 Ch. 506; 62 L. J. Ch. 241.

25. Transfer — Refusal to register — Certificate issued under forged transfer—Warranty—Estoppel—Measure of damages—Jurisdiction to order inquiry as to damages under the Companies Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 89), s. 35.—On the 6th of April, 1892, G. bought shares in a company, and received from the vendor a transfer and a certificate under the seal of the company signed by two directors and the secretary, certifying that the vendor was the proprietor of the shares. On the same day G. sent the transfer executed by himself, and accompanied by the certificate, to the company's office for registration. The company's clerk refused to accept the documents, saying that he had orders not to do so. G. and his solicitor again tendered the transfer and certificate, which the company's solicitor took, but stated that the company did not undertake to register G. as the owner of the shares. It appeared that the former secretary of the company had made fraudulent transfers, and had, by means of fraud, induced two of the directors to affix the seal of the company to the certificate in question, and that, in consequence of the discovery of the fraud on the 5th of April, the registration of G. had been refused. At a board meeting on the 13th of April, 1892, the consideration of the transfer was ordered to stand for further consideration, and the transfer and certificate were returned to G. On the 31st of May, 1892, G. moved, under section 35 of the Companies Act, 1862, that the register of members of the company might be rectified by inserting his name as the holder of the shares, and that the company might be ordered to pay him the damages occasioned by their refusal to register him as such holder. Between the 6th and the 13th of April the shares went down in value.

Stirling, J., made no order as to rectification, but directed an inquiry as to damages. The chief clerk certified that the amount of damages was the amount G. had paid for the shares on the 6th of April. The company moved to vary the certificate by decreasing the amount to the value of the shares on the 13th of April. Stirling, J., held that the company had refused the transfer on the 6th of April, and that the chief clerk was right in his assessment of the damages. The company appealed.

On the hearing of the appeal the court doubted whether Stirling, J., had jurisdiction to direct an inquiry as to damages under section 35 of the Companies Act, 1862, where there was no order for rectification, but, with the consent of the parties, agreed to treat the case as within that section.

Held, that the cause of action was not the representation contained in the certificate, but the refusal of the company to register, and that the date of such refusal was the 6th of April.

25a. Underwriting agreement—Agreement to take shares not taken by public—Right to notice of amount of liability.—A. signed an agreement with L., an agent employed by the promoters of a company to arrange for the issue of its capital, that A. would subscribe, or find responsible subscribers, for 200 ordinary shares on the terms of the company's prospectus, and apply for the said shares on the first day when the list opened. The agreement contained provisions that if the whole issue of shares was bonâ fide subscribed for by the public, A.'s responsibility was to cease, and no allotment to be made to him; and that if the public should not subscribe the full amount of the issue, but should bonâ fide subscribe any smaller amount, A.'s undertaking was to stand for the number of shares constituting his pro ratâ contribution with the other underwriters to make up the difference between the amount subscribed by the public and the amount underwritten; and that the agreement should be irrevocable on A.'s part, and sufficient in itself to authorize L., in the event of A.'s not applying for shares as above mentioned to apply for such shares in his name and on his behalf. A. made no application for shares. The public applied only for a small part of the capital underwritten. After the list was closed L. applied in A.'s name for 164 shares, and the company allotted them to A., sending him notice that they were allotted in pursuance of his underwriting agreement. A. brought an action to have his name removed from the register on the ground that he had only agreed to take a proportion of the shares which the public had not applied for, and had had no notice how many the public had applied for, and no opportunity of exercising his option to subscribe himself or find other subscribers.

Held, that A.'s obligation under the contract was to apply for shares the first day the list opened, and that, therefore, no such notice was necessary to enable him to discharge it or to exercise his option, and the shares had been rightly allotted to him.—Shaw v. Bentley & Co. and the Yorkshire Breweries (Limited), CH.D. WINDING UP—

26. Calls—Debentures charging uncalled capital—Debenture-holder's action—Official receiver—Duty to make call—Companies Act, 1862, ss. 92, 95, 98, 102—Companies (Winding-up) Act, 1890, ss. 12, 13—Companies Winding-up Rules, 1890, r. 92.—When an order has been made for the winding up of a company by the court, the power of the company and its directors to make calls is ipso facto at an end, and the only power to make calls is in the liquidator in the winding up. Consequently, an application after the winding up, asking that a company, by the official receiver, should make a call on shareholders for the amount unpaid on their shares, and that a receiver appointed in a debenture-holder's action should get in the amounts due on the shares, must be intituled in the winding up, as well as in the debenture-holder's action.—Fowler v. Broad's Patent Night Light Co., CH.D. WILL., J. 247—[1893] 1 Ch. 724; 62 L. J. Ch. 373; 68 L. T. 576.

27. Calls—Debenture—Equitable assignment—Calls prior and subsequent to winding up—Set-off—Companies Act, 1862, s. 75.—T., who was the registered holder of debentures in a company, in March, 1890, deposited some of them with a bank to secure a debt, and executed a memorandum of deposit and a blank transfer, but no notice was given to the company. These debentures were exchanged for others subsequently issued by the company, and the new debentures were deposited with the bank by T. on the 3rd of September, 1890, who did not execute any fresh memorandum or transfer. None of the new debentures were payable before the 31st of December, 1890.

T. was also holder of ordinary shares in the company, which were not fully paid up, and on the 3rd of November, 1890, a call was made upon the ordinary shares, payable on the 20th of November, 1890, at the bank, who were also the company's bankers. On the 4th of November, 1890, notice of the call was given to the bank, who were authorized to retain the proceeds of the call in payment of an overdraft. On the 6th of November, 1890, the bank gave the company notice of the deposit of T.'s debentures. The bank on the 12th of November, 1890, commenced an action on behalf of the debenture-holders against the company, and on the 19th of November the company went into voluntary liquidation. In the action sufficient assets of the company had been realized to pay the debentures in full, and in the winding up calls had been made on T.'s shares which had not been paid.

Held, that, in respect of the call made on the 3rd of November, 1890, the company were entitled to set off the amount of such call against what was due on the debentures; but that, in respect of the calls made in the winding up, they were not entitled to do so. The liability to pay calls did not, under section 75 of the Companies Act, 1862, become a debt due until the winding up commenced, and therefore the case was governed by Watson v. Mid-Wales Railway Co., 15 W. The judge of the county court made an order for the delivery up of the wine to the liquidator, on the ground that, the manager having acted ultrà vires, the transfer was void.

Held, that the county court judge had no jurisdiction to decide a question as to the title of property which arose before the date of the winding up between the company and a stranger, and that the order was therefore bad.—In re Ilkley Hotel Co., Q.B.D. 639—[1893] 1 Q. 30. Debenture-holders' action—Receiver of debenture-holders—Rights of debenture-holders as mortgagees — Liquidator. — Debenture-holders whose interest was in arrear, and whose debentures constituted a charge on all the property, present and future, of the company, brought an action for foreclosure or sale, and obtained an order for the appointment of a receiver, with liberty to proceed with their action, notwithstanding the winding up of the company, against whom a creditor's winding-up petition had previously been presented. A winding-up order was subsequently made, and the debenture-holders' action was transferred to the judge having jurisdiction in the winding up. The amount due on the debentures largely exceeded the assets of the company, and there was no uncalled capital. No evidence had been adduced to impeach the validity of the debentures.

Held, on these facts, that the debenture-holders, as mortgagees, were entitled to have their own receiver, and that, as creditors outside the winding up, their rights ought not to be interfered with by the winding-up proceedings; and, accordingly, that an order made on the application of the liquidator, discharging the debenture-holders' receiver, was wrong, and should be discharged.—Strong v. Carlyle Press (Limited), C.A. 404—[1893] 1 Ch. 268; 62 L. 32. Directors—Concealed profits—Gift by promoter and vendor—Extent of liability—Knowledge and acquiescence of shareholders—Companies (Winding-up) Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 63), s. 10.—Where the vendor to and promoter of a company agreed to give A., B., C., and D. a share of his profits as such vendor if they would become directors of the company, and A., B., C., and D., having consented and having become directors, took transfers accordingly from the vendor of shares in the company allotted to him in part payment of his purchase-money, although there were still matters open between him and the company at the time,

Held, on an application to make the directors liable for misfeasance under section 10 of the Companies (Winding-up) Act, 1890, that, a prospectus having been issued inviting the public to subscribe for shares, in respect of any shares so transferred by way of gift to the directors, as to which there had been concealment of the fact from the public, the directors were liable, and that the fact of knowledge of the transaction on the part of all the actual members of the company made no difference.

Held, also, that, these directors having paid full value for similar shares subscribed for by them, that raised as against them, in the case of the shares given to them, a presumption that these shares were of value.—In re Postage Stamp Automatic Delivery Co., CH.D. WILL., J. 28—[1892] 3 Ch. 566; 61 L. J. Ch. 597; 67 L. T. 88.

33. Directors—Misfeasance or breach of trust—Liability of directors—Ultrà vires—Negligence—Form of summons—Evidence required from applicant—Companies (Winding-up) Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 63), s. 10.—A summons in the voluntary winding up of a company under section 10 of the Companies Winding-up) Act, 1890, directed the respondents to attend on the hearing of an application by the liquidator for a declaration that all persons, being directors of the company, who in any manner authorized, sanctioned, or participated in the two payments to G. out of the company's money therein specified, were jointly and severally liable to repay to the liquidator the amount so paid, with interest at five per cent.

The grounds of the liquidator's application not being sufficiently defined thereby, this form of summons is not correct. A summons like this, with the affidavits in support, should show the nature of any misfeasance thereby charged.

In order to make directors liable under the section for negligence, the court must be satisfied that they did not really exercise their judgment and discretion as agents of the company in the transaction complained of.

The directors of a financial company having, in exercise of their powers, resolved to lend money of the company to A. against his promissory note and a deposit of shares by him, the resolution was immediately acted upon by handing over a cheque to the solicitor of the company.

Held, that this was not in itself an act of misfeasance.—In re New Mashonaland Exploration Co., CH.D. WILL., J. 75—[1892] 3 Ch. 577; 61 L. J. Ch. 617; 67 L. T. 90.

34. Directors—Qualifying shares—No allotment.—The articles of association of a joint-stock company provided that the qualification of a director should be the holding of fifty shares. A. was elected and acted as a director, but no shares were ever allotted to him by the company, nor did he apply for any, nor did he obtain shares from any other source.

Held, that there ought to be inferred an agreement between A. and the company that A. should serve as director on the terms specified in the articles, including a contract to take his qualifying shares, within a reasonable time, from the company itself if not obtained from any other source, and that A. must accordingly be fixed on the list of contributories under the Companies Act, 1862, s. 23.—In re Bread Supply Association, Konrath's case, CH.D. The liquidator then obtained an order under section 115 of the Companies Act, 1862, for the examination of certain persons. Subsequently to their examinations being taken, a commission was issued in the action to take evidence abroad, and one of the witnesses who had been examined under section 115 was examined under the commission on behalf of the defendants, and, upon his cross-examination, certain of his answers were read to him from the depositions taken under section 115, and he was asked whether the statements therein contained were correct, and he said that they were. Certain questions were also put to him from the depositions with regard to the answers given by other witnesses. The defendants applied for inspection of those parts of the depositions which had been referred to on the cross-examination.

Held (affirming the decision of Kekewich, J.), that the defendants were not entitled to the inspection claimed.—North Australian Territory Co. v. Goldsborough, Mort, & Co., C.A. 501—[1893] 2 Ch. 381; 62 L. J. Ch. 603; 69 L. T. 4.

37. Foreign company—Branch office in England—Voluntary liquidation abroad—Compulsory winding up in England—Companies (Winding-up) Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 63).—A colonial company, having a branch office in England, was being wound up voluntarily in the colony, subject to the supervision of the court. Upon a creditor's petition for a compulsory winding up in England, it was arranged between the petitioner and the company that the English manager should be appointed attorney of the colonial liquidator, and that the petition should stand over generally, upon the undertaking of the company not to remove the English assets without the leave of the court, and to give notice to the petitioner of any action which might be thereafter commenced against the company.

Vaughan Williams, J., refused to sanction this arrangement, and made a compulsory order, on the ground that this course was for the interest of all parties, but limited the powers of the official receiver to the collection of the English assets, and the settling the English list of creditors, and intimated that some limitation ought to be placed on his remuneration.

Held, on appeal, that, the question being one of convenience, the court would not interfere with the discretion so exercised.—In re Federal Bank of Australia, C.A.—62 L. J. Ch. 561; 68 L. T. 728.

In May, 1888, two policies held by the defendant in the plaintiff company matured, and the amount insured thereby became payable by the plaintiff company to the defendant. These policies had been previously assigned by the defendant to the plaintiff company as security for loans to him, which loans had not been repaid. In July, 1889, a winding-up order was made, and in April, 1890, a deed of arrangement was entered into, under the Joint-Stock Companies Act, 1870, between the plaintiff company and the Sun Life Assurance Co., whereby it was provided that the policies of the plaintiff company should be transferred to the Sun Co., and that the holders of policies in the plaintiff company should, in full satisfaction of all claims upon the plaintiffs, accept certain reduced payments from the Sun Co. This deed of arrangement was agreed to by a statutory majority of policy-holders; but the defendant, whose policies had matured before the date of the deed of arrangement, did not assent to it. The plaintiff company, by its liquidator, in December, 1890, sued the defendant for the sums lent to him.

Held (affirming the decision of Charles, J., 40 W. R. 443), that the defendant was entitled, by way of defence to the action, to set off the amount due on his policies against the debt owing by him to the company; that the defendant did not belong to the class of creditors who agreed to the deed of arrangement, and that he was not bound by it, and that, therefore, it did not operate as a release of his claim against the company.

40. Petition—Petition for compulsory winding up—Supervision order—Readvertisement of petition—Wishes of creditors—Companies (Winding-up) Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 63).—Since the Companies (Winding-up) Act, 1890, the making of a supervision order on a petition for a compulsory order, where the petitioners and the creditors and contributories are all, so far as is known, desirous of a supervision order, is not so much a matter of course as it was before the Act.

Where two petitions as presented and advertised prayed for the compulsory winding up of an important banking company, but a supervision order only was asked for at the hearing,

42. Petition—Fully paid-up shareholder—Grounds for winding up—Ultrà vires—Issue of shares at a discount—Companies Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 89), s. 79, sub-section (5).—A fully paid-up shareholder presented a petition to wind up the above-named company, alleging that a number of the shares had been issued at a discount, and that the petitioner and the other shareholders had been prejudiced thereby; that the company was insolvent, but that the assets were of considerable value, and, if prudently realized, would be sufficient, not only to pay and satisfy the company's debts and liabilities, but to pay a substantial dividend to the members; and that, under the circumstances, it was "just and equitable" that the company should be wound up.

Held, that the fact that a winding up would result in a surplus for the shareholders, if those who had obtained shares at a discount were made to pay up the difference between what they had actually paid and the nominal amount of their shares, did not give the petitioner the right to a winding-up order, and that the petition must, therefore, be dismissed.

The distinction drawn by Lord Herschell in Ooregum Gold Mining Co. of India v. Roper, 41 W. R. 90, [1892] A. C. 125, was not between a company as a going concern and a company in liquidation, but between the rights of the company and the rights of the creditors of the company.—In re Pioneers of Mashonaland Syndicate, CH.D. 43. Proceedings against company — Secured creditor—Debt—Scotch process—Pending action—Attachment of assets of company in Scotland—Arrestment on the dependence — Arrestment jurisdictionis fundandæ causa—Companies Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 89), ss. 87, 151.—Alleged creditors of an English company, which was being wound up subject to supervision, took proceedings against the company in the Scotch courts prior to the liquidation, which proceedings had, according to Scotch law, put them in the position of secured creditors, subject only to their obtaining a decree in Scotch courts establishing their debt.

Held, that in these circumstances, the creditors not being able to enforce their security in the winding up, the proceedings in the Scotch court ought to be allowed to continue.—In re West Cumberland Steel and Iron Co. (Limited), CH.D. 44. Prospectus—Misrepresentation—Repudiation of shares—Laches.—In February, 1889, A. was induced in consequence of statements contained in the prospectus of a company to take certain shares therein. In July, 1889, he received from B., a shareholder, a circular stating that he had commenced an action against the company for a return of the money paid by him for his shares on the ground of misrepresentations contained in the prospectus. A. thereupon informed his friend C., who was a director of the company, that he intended to pay nothing further in respect of his shares until he had ascertained the result of B.'s action. A. did not, however, give any formal notice of this intention to the company. On the 19th of February, 1892, judgment was given in B.'s action in favour of B. On the 17th of March, 1892, the directors gave notice by a circular issued to all the shareholders that an extraordinary general meeting of the company would be held on the 25th of March, 1892, for the purpose of considering a resolution for a voluntary winding up. On the 21st of March, 1892, A. took out an originating summons asking that the register of shareholders might be rectified by removing his name therefrom in respect of the shares held by him, and for repayment of the amount paid by him on account of such shares. On the 25th of March, 1892, the meeting summoned by the notice of the 17th of March was held, at which a resolution for the voluntary winding up of the company was passed and a liquidator was appointed.

Held, that A. was not entitled to await the result of B.'s action before repudiating his shares, but that, even if he were so entitled, it was clearly his duty to take very prompt steps after learning the result; that the delay between the 19th of February and the 21st of March was too long; and that consequently his application failed.—Snyder Dynamic Projectile Co., In re Skelton's case, CH.D. 46. Sale of business to another company—"Reorganization or reconstruction" of a company—Meaning of words—Companies Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 89), s. 161.—Certain debentures were issued by the W. Co., securing payment of principal in 1896, and containing covenants respectively to pay the same in accordance with the conditions indorsed thereon; and in each case condition (1) was that the defendant company might, after one year from the date thereof, redeem the debenture by giving three months' notice and paying to the holder £105 for every £100 capital secured, with interest up to the date of payment; and condition (4) was that, "if the company commenced to be wound up otherwise than for the purposes of reorganization or reconstruction," the principal should become immediately payable. In 1892 the W. Co. proceeded to wind itself up for the purpose of carrying out an agreement for its amalgamation with the N. Co., an existing company on a larger scale.

Held, that the principal secured by the debentures became payable when the resolution for winding up took effect under the 4th condition, and that the W. Co. were, therefore, entitled to pay off the debentures at par, with interest only up to the date of the commencement of the liquidation.

48. Unlimited liability—Reduction of capital—Memorandum and articles—Clause in articles giving right of withdrawal.—An unlimited company was incorporated under the Companies Acts, 1862 to 1880, with the object (as stated in the memorandum) of, among other things, lending money to its members. The articles provided that the capital of the company should not be of any fixed nominal amount, that every person should be deemed to be a member who became possessed of a share, and that any member desirous of withdrawing before his share or shares were fully paid should give notice to the company, and, if the committee allowed his withdrawal, he might, on payment of all moneys due to the company, receive back his subscription according to a scale. The company went into voluntary liquidation, and the liquidator took out a summons to have members withdrawing in accordance with the memorandum and articles of the company declared liable for calls on shares they had held.

Held, that, according to the observations of Lord Herschell in Trevor v. Whitworth, 36 W. R. 145, 12 App. Cas. 409, there was a distinction between a limited and an unlimited company with respect to the validity of a clause of withdrawal like the above, and that persons who had withdrawn from membership in pursuance of such clause were under no liability in the winding up.—In re Borough Commercial and Building Society, CH.D. CONFLICT of LAWS:—

Foreign judgment—Action on—Defendant not resident or domiciled in foreign country—No appearance by defendant or submission to jurisdiction—Judgment by default in foreign country—Right of plaintiffs to sue in this country on judgment.—An action was brought in this country upon a judgment obtained by the plaintiffs against the defendants in a New Zealand (N. Z.) court. The defendants had by letter authorized one O. in N. Z. to accept bills against documents with a view to shipments of wool being made by O. from N. Z. to the defendants in England. This letter was shown to the plaintiffs, who in consequence discounted bills for the defendants, but a subsequent letter by the defendants to O., limiting his credit, was not shown to the plaintiffs. O., in fraud of his instructions, took bills to the plaintiffs, who discounted the same, and, as the defendants refused to accept these bills, the plaintiffs brought an action in the N. Z. court and recovered judgment. The writ and statement of claim in this action were served upon the defendants in England, but they did not appear, and judgment was given against them in default of appearance. The defendants were not natives of N. Z., and were not resident or domiciled there.

Held (by Wright, J.), that, as there was no appearance, and no submission by the defendants to the jurisdiction of the N. Z. court, and as they were not resident or domiciled in that country, the judgment of the N. Z. court was wholly without jurisdiction, and could not be sued upon in this country.—Turnbull v. Walker, Q.B.D—67 L. T. 767.

CONSPIRACY:—

Trade union—Procuring breach of contract—Contract in way of trade—Intention to injure plaintiff—Malice—Combination to induce persons not to contract with plaintiff—Damage.—The plaintiff, who was a mason and builder, refused to conform to certain rules laid down by three trade unions connected with the building trade. The defendants, who were members of a joint committee of the three trade unions, with the intention of injuring the plaintiff, and so forcing him to conform to the said rules, induced and procured certain persons, who had, as the defendants knew, entered into contracts with him in the way of trade, to break those contracts, in consequence whereof the plaintiff sustained damage. The defendants also, with the like intention, conspired to induce, and did induce, certain persons not to enter into contracts with the plaintiff, in consequence whereof the plaintiff's business fell off.

Held, that the plaintiff was entitled to maintain an action against the defendants, both for the procuring breaches of contract and also for the conspiracy to induce persons not to enter into contracts with the plaintiff.—Temperton v. Russell (No. 2), C.A. 565—[1893] 1 Q. The fact that such language was used by a priest at the altar to his congregation does not thereby confer any privilege, or mitigate the contempt.—Dalton v. Fulham, Q.B.D. (Ir.)—30 L. R. 2. Nature of the offence—Obstruction to public justice—Power of Crown to remit sentence.—Where a letter published in a colonial newspaper contained criticisms on the conduct of the chief justice of the colony, of such a nature that it might have been made the subject of proceedings for libel, but was not in the circumstances calculated to obstruct or interfere with the course of justice or the due administration of the law:

Held, that the same did not constitute a contempt of court.

It appearing that the editor had, on notice from the court, refused to discover the name of the writer, and had thereupon been sentenced to fine and imprisonment during pleasure for the publication, and to fine or imprisonment for the refusal, but had been released by order of the governor,

Held, (1) that the chief justice had no legal authority to require either the name of the writer or the manuscript of the letter; (2) that the governor had under his commission power in the circumstances to remit the sentence. There may not be imported into a case of this kind any matter which was not in evidence against the defendant, nor will their lordships permit any such matter to be laid before them.—In re a Special Reference from the Bahama Islands, P.C.—[1893] A. CONTRACT:—

1. Advertisement — Reward — Consideration — Acceptance—Notification of acceptance—Wagering—Insurance against disease—8 & 9 Vict. c. 109—14 Geo. 3, c. 48, s. 2.—The defendants, who were the proprietors and vendors of a medical preparation called "The Carbolic Smoke Ball," in November, 1891, published the following advertisement:—"£100 reward will be paid by" the defendants "to any person who contracts the increasing epidemic, influenza, after having used the ball three times daily for two weeks" in a certain specified manner; "£1,000 is deposited with the A. Bank, showing our" (the defendants') "sincerity in the matter." The plaintiff, on the faith of this advertisement, purchased from a chemist one of the defendants' smoke balls, and used it three times a day from the 20th of November, 1891, to the 17th of January, 1892, when she contracted influenza.

Held, that the advertisement was not a mere puff, but an offer to contract intended to be acted upon; that, by the performance of the conditions therein contained, the offer had been accepted by the plaintiff, and a contract thereby constituted between the plaintiff and the defendants; that, having regard to the character of the transaction, no notification of acceptance of the offer was necessary; that there was consideration moving from the plaintiff; and, consequently, that a binding contract by the defendants to pay the plaintiff £100 in the event which happened had been constituted.

Held, also, that such contract was neither a contract by way of wagering within 8 & 9 Vict. c. 109, nor a policy of insurance within 14 Geo. 3, c. 48, s. 2, and that the plaintiff was entitled to recover.

Decision of Hawkins, J. ([1892] 2 Q. B. 484), affirmed.—Carlill v. Carbolic Smoke Ball Co., C.A. 210—[1893] 1 Q. B. 256; 62 L. J. Q. B. 257; 67 L. T. 837.

2. Illegality—Agreement to make a market for shares—Illegality not pleaded—Criminal conspiracy—In pari delicto potior est conditio possidentis—Judicial notice.—In these consolidated actions the plaintiffs sought to recover from the defendants, who were stockbrokers, the price paid by the plaintiffs for shares in a new company, upon the ground (amongst others) that the defendants had transferred to the plaintiffs the defendants' own shares, instead of purchasing them in the market in the usual way. Wright, J., before whom both actions were tried, nonsuited the plaintiffs in both actions, upon the ground that there was no evidence to go to the jury. The plaintiffs applied for a new trial, and in the course of the hearing the Court of Appeal took judicial notice of the fact that the correspondence and telegrams between the parties disclosed the nature of the transaction, which was an agreement between the plaintiffs and defendants to induce would-be buyers of shares in the company, contrary to the fact, to believe that there was a market for the shares, and that the shares were of greater value than they really were.

Held, that the transaction was illegal, and might be made the subject of an indictment for conspiracy, and that, although the illegality of the contract was not pleaded, the plaintiffs were not entitled to relief.—Scott v. Brown, Doering, M'Nab, & Co.; Slaughter v. The Same, C.A. 116—[1892] 2 Q. 3. Validity—Arbitration clause—Award not to be impeached for fraud—Public policy.—A contract provided that an arbitrator's certificates, orders, or awards should not be impeached for fraud.

Held, in the absence of fraud of the contracting parties, a valid contract, and not void as against public policy.

COPYHOLD:—

1. Common—Common appurtenant—Grant in fee to third person of part of tenant's occupation—"Together with all commons belonging."—By a deed dated in 1859 the lord of the manor of B. granted to M. in fee simple "all that piece or parcel of land situate at B., containing fifty-three acres, now or late in the occupation of S. as tenant thereof, together with all ways, waters, watercourses, trees, woods, underwoods, hedges, ditches, commons, and all other rights, members, and appurtenances whatsoever to the said piece or parcel of land and hereditaments, or any part thereof, belonging." The parcel of land was a portion of a large farm held by S. under a lease dated in 1856, and which was unexpired. Under a succession of leases from 1809, S. and those who had held the farm before him, and the lord of the manor, had enjoyed rights of common of pasture and of estovers in respect of the whole farm over all the wastes of the manor. M. arranged with S. that the latter should give up to him possession of the piece of land granted by the deed, and paid S. a valuation accordingly. The plaintiff, who derived his title from M., claimed under the deed of 1859 a right of common over a particular one of the wastes in respect of the parcel of land granted by the deed. There was evidence that throughout the period, from 1824 to 1859, the particular waste over which the right was claimed by the plaintiff was not used, but another of the wastes was, for turning out thereupon the flock when folded upon that particular portion of the farm; and since that period up to the time of the action there had been no user of the alleged right.

Held, that the right of common did not pass.

Per Lindley, L.J.—The general words in the deed were not sufficient to pass or to create a right of common in respect of the parcel of land granted, in the absence of special circumstances as between the grantee in fee and the tenant under the lease; and the state of things and the position of the parties did not warrant the inference that it must have been intended that any such right should be given, but the contrary.

Per Bowen, L.J.—The language of the deed, though vague, obscure, and ambiguous, might possibly have passed such a right if (which was not shown to be the case) it was the intention of the parties that it should.

2. Common—Custom for lord to make grants of waste—Consent of homage—Enfranchisement—Statutory reservation of right of common—Copyhold Act, 1852 (15 & 16 Vict. c. 51), s. 45.—Where a custom existed in a manor for the lord, with the consent of the homage, to make grants of portions of the waste to be held on copyhold tenure, although a sufficiency of common was not left,

Held, that such a grant might be made by the lord, with the consent of the homage, as against a commoner, although his tenement had been enfranchised under the Copyhold Act, 1852, and he could therefore no longer attend the manor court. Ramsey v. Cruddas, C.A.—[1893] 1 Q. B. 228; 62 L. J. Q. B. 269; 68 L. T. 364.

3. Common—Enfranchisement—Freeholds of the manor—Release of seignorial rights.—The plaintiffs were respectively the owners in fee simple of two properties in the parish of W., situated on the north side of a lane used by them as the nearest way to the village and railway station. A short distance from the plaintiffs' properties the lane became a patch of green and then forked off into two branches. The defendant was the owner of a property situated between the two branches, the southern boundary of which adjoined the patch of green with a fence between.

The defendant had attempted to inclose the patch of green adjoining the end of his property, and by so doing had interfered with one of the branches of the lane.

The plaintiffs thereupon brought an action against him, claiming an injunction to restrain him from inclosing any part of the patch of green, on the ground (inter alia) that the patch of green was waste of the manor of W., and that they had rights of common of pasture and turbary thereon. It appeared that down to 1881 the plaintiffs' properties were freeholds of the manor of W. At that date the seignory thereof was released. The plaintiffs alleged that their predecessors in title, freehold tenants of the manor, were entitled in respect of the two properties and over the wastes of the manor, including the patch of green, to rights of common of pasture and turbary thereon.

The question, however, was whether the rights claimed by the plaintiffs had not been destroyed by a deed of enfranchisement, by which the lord of the manor had released all rents and services due to him by the freeholders.

Held, that, although rights of common annexed to copyholds were extinguished on enfranchisement, there was no similar doctrine with reference to the extinguishment of rights of common on the release of seignorial rights due by the freeholders of a manor; and, accordingly, that the plaintiffs' rights of common had not been extinguished by the enfranchisement in 1881.

Held, therefore, that they were entitled to the injunction claimed.

COPYRIGHT:—

1. Author—Mutilated book—Libel—Trade libel—Publisher—Injunction.—This was a motion on behalf of the plaintiff, an author, to restrain the defendant, a publisher, from publishing or selling a certain book otherwise than in the form in which it was prepared by the author, or from representing that the plaintiff was the author of the book published by the defendant. The book was originally published in its complete form in 1886. In 1892 the publisher issued an edition of the book, omitting the preface, table of contents, introduction, bibliographical notice, and index. The ground of the motion was that the publication of the book in a mutilated form caused an injury to the plaintiff's reputation as an author.

Held, that the plaintiff's remedy in law was libel; that, with the exception of a case of trade libel, the court will not grant an injunction to restrain a libel before the case has been submitted to a jury.—Lee v. Gibbings, CH.D. KEK., J.—67 L. T. 263.

Held, that "the terms" referred to in this section need not be in writing or express, but might be implied from the general nature of the employment and of the business.

Sweet v. Benning, 3 W. R. 519, 16 C. B. 459, approved.

The plaintiff was the registered proprietor of a directory of foreign traders, which consisted of a series of catchwords or headings descriptive of various trades, arranged in alphabetical order, together with a collection—under and appropriate to each heading—of advertisements obtained from the traders, containing their names and addresses, and in some cases illustrations of their trade-marks. These advertisements and headings, and translations thereof in several languages, were obtained and composed by the defendants and other persons employed and paid for doing so by the plaintiff, and the defendants, under their agreement with the plaintiff, undertook to devote themselves therein exclusively to the plaintiff's service. The agreement, however, did not contain any express stipulation as to copyright, nor any stipulation by the defendants not to engage in a similar business on behalf of themselves or others after their employment by the plaintiff had terminated. The defendants, having ceased to be employed by the plaintiff, proposed to supply to a rival publication copies of the headings and advertisements appearing in the plaintiff's work.

Held, that the "headings" in the plaintiff's publication were a good subject-matter for copyright; that, on the facts, the reasonable inference was that the headings were composed on the terms that the copyright therein should belong to the plaintiff; and that the plaintiff was entitled to an injunction to restrain infringement of his copyright in the "headings."

Semble, that the plaintiff would also be entitled to copyright in respect of the collocation and arrangement in his work of a series of the advertisements.

Held, also, that it was a reasonable inference from the nature and object of the defendants' employment that all documents and materials prepared and obtained by the defendants in the course of that employment were for the purposes of the plaintiff's publication only, and that the plaintiff was entitled, notwithstanding that his employment of the defendants had come to an end, to restrain the defendants making any use of such documents or materials for any other purpose—the plaintiff's right in this respect depending, not in any way on copyright, but on the ground that it would be contrary to the good faith implied by the nature and object of the defendants' employment that the defendants should use documents or materials compiled while in the plaintiff's employment for any other purpose than that of the plaintiff's publication.—Lamb v. Evans, C.A. 405—[1893] 1 Ch. 218; 62 L. J. Ch. 404; 68 L. T. 131.

5. International copyright—Saving of rights and interests previously acquired—Trade-mark—Interest in advertising—Subsisting and valuable interests—Artistic work first produced in foreign country—International Copyright Act, 1886 (49 & 50 Vict. c. 33), s. 6.—By the International Copyright Act, 1886, s. 6, upon an Order in Council being made with respect to any foreign country, the author and publisher of any artistic work shall be entitled to copyright in the United Kingdom in respect of works first produced before such order comes into operation, "provided that, where any person has, before the date of the publication of an Order in Council, lawfully produced any work in the United Kingdom, nothing in this section shall diminish or prejudice any rights or interests arising from or in connection with such production which are subsisting and valuable at the said date."

An Order in Council was made applying the Act to German subjects. Before the date of the publication of the order an artistic work, first produced in Germany, was lawfully produced in the United Kingdom and registered, and used as a trade-mark upon goods. The work was also reproduced by the proprietors of the trade-mark on showcards and trade lists for the purpose of advertising their goods. The trade-mark, as registered, had the words "trade-mark" printed on it, but these words were omitted in the showcards and trade lists. In an action to restrain infringement of copyright by the use of these showcards and trade lists.

Held, that the proprietors of the trade-mark had an interest, as such proprietors, in advertising it; that this was an interest arising from or in connection with the trade-mark itself, and subsisting and valuable at the date of the publication of the Order in Council; that the omission of the words "trade-mark" in the showcards and trade lists was immaterial; and, consequently, that the proprietors of the trade-mark were protected in their use of the showcards and trade lists by the proviso to section 6.

6. International copyright—English copyright in foreign painting—Right to sue for infringement without registration—Fine Arts Copyright Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 68), s. 4—International Copyright Act, 1886 (49 & 50 Vict. c. 33), s. 6—Order in Council.—Held, by Charles, J., that registration in accordance with section 4 of the Fine Arts Copyright Act, 1862, is not necessary in order to entitle the owner of the English copyright in a foreign painting to sue for infringement.

Held, also, by Charles, J., that section 6 of the International Copyright Act, 1886, applies to any literary or artistic work produced before the 6th of December, 1887 (the date at which an Order in Council of the 28th of November, 1887, made under the Act with respect to a foreign country came into operation), whether produced before or after the 25th of June, 1886, the date of the passing of the Act, and that the interest contemplated by the proviso in the section is a direct subsisting pecuniary interest in the continuation of the production.

CORONER:—

Treasure trove—Title of Crown—Prerogative—Grant to subject—Coroner's inquisition—Jurisdiction—Coroners Act, 1887 (50 & 51 Vict. c. 71), ss. 4, 18 (1), 36.—The Crown is primâ facie entitled to treasure trove, and it is not necessary that an inquest should be held for the purpose of informing the Crown as to its rights (following the case of Reg. v. Toole, 16 W. R. 439); but its rights may be displaced by a grant to a subject of the franchise of treasure trove.

Articles of silver were found concealed in the earth. The coroner for the district held an inquest on them before a jury, who unanimously agreed that the articles were treasure trove. The coroner then desired to hold a further inquisition to decide who was entitled to the treasure.

Held, that the coroner had no jurisdiction, either under the Coroners Act, 1887, or otherwise, to determine the question of title.—Attorney-General v. Moore, CH.D. STI., J. 294—[1893] 1 Ch. 67; 62 L. J. Ch. 607; 68 L. T. 574.

COUNTY COURT:—

1. Administration—Estate exceeding £500—Transfer to High Court—County Courts Act, 1888, ss. 67, 68.—Where an estate exceeding £500 has been administed in a county court, and the estate finally wound up, the High Court has discretion to refuse an order directing the matter to be reopened and the action transferred to the Chancery Division.—Prangnell v. Prangnell, Q.B.D.—62 L. J. Q. B. 346.

2. Admiralty jurisdiction—Appeal—Judgment of county court varied by divisional court—Appeal to Court of Appeal—Leave to appeal—Judicature Act, 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 66), s. 45—County Courts Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 50), s. 10.—County Courts Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 43), s. 188, sub-section 5.—Where a divisional court of the Probate, Divorce, and Admiralty Division alters on appeal the judgment of a county court in an admiralty action, an appeal lies without leave from the judgment of the Divisional Court to the Court of Appeal, notwithstanding the repeal of section 10 of the County Courts Act, 1875, by section 188 of the County Courts Act, 1888.—The Dart, C.A. 153—[1893] P. 33; 62 L. J. P. D. & A. 32.

3. Appeal—Notice of appeal, service of—Service upon London agent of country solicitor—Remitted action—County Courts Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 43), s. 65—County Court Rules, 1889, ord. 33, r. 1.—An action was commenced in the High Court, and upon the writ the address of the plaintiff's solicitor, who carried on business in the country, as well as that of the London agents, were indorsed as addresses for service.

The action was remitted to a county court under section 65 of the County Courts Act, 1888, and upon the particulars lodged by the plaintiff with the registrar under ord. 33, r. 1, of the County Court Rules, 1889, the address of the country solicitor alone was indorsed as the address for service.

After the trial of the action the defendant served a notice of appeal from the judgment of the county court judge upon the London agents of the solicitor for the plaintiff.

Held, that the address for service indorsed upon the plaintiff's particulars was substituted for the addresses for service indorsed upon the writ, and that, therefore, the service of the notice of appeal upon the London agents was bad.

The appeal was ordered to be heard under ord. 59, r. 16, as there had been a slip, and the point was a fresh one, but the court felt considerable difficulty in making the order.—Malley v. Shepley, Q.B.D. 63—62 L. J. Q. B. 31; 68 L. T. 294.

4. Appeal—Notice of appeal, service of—Service on London agent of country solicitor—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 59, r. 12.—In appeals from county courts to divisional courts, where the solicitor for the respondent carries on business in the country, it is not sufficient that the notice of appeal should be served by the appellant, within the proper time, upon the London agent of the respondent's country solicitor. Such notice must be served within the proper time upon the respondent's country solicitor.

5. Appeal—No note of proceedings in court below—Order of Divisional Court for production and examination of witnesses examined at the trial—Jurisdiction—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 59, r. 8.—When no note of what occurred in the county court has been taken, a Divisional Court has, upon appeal, jurisdiction to order that the witnesses of both parties called and examined in the court below should be produced and examined on the hearing of the appeal; but care ought to be taken by the court to prevent fresh evidence being given, so that such appeal should not become practically a new trial.

6. Bailiff — "Misconduct" — Execution — Implements of trade—Seizure and sale of, by high bailiff—Error of judgment by high bailiff—County Courts Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 43), s. 50.—The seizure and sale of the implements of an execution debtor's trade by a high bailiff of a county court, in the levying of an execution under the judgment of the court, even though done recklessly and under a serious error of judgment, but not with any wrongful intent, is not "misconduct" within the meaning of section 50 of the County Courts Act, 1888.—Moore v. High Bailiff of Brompton County Court, Q.B.D. 557.

7. Costs — Action commenced in High Court — Transfer before trial to county court—Jurisdiction of High Court—County Courts Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 43), Part III., s. 65; Part IV., s. 116.—In an action commenced in the High Court, and transferred to the county court before trial, there is no jurisdiction in the High Court to make any order after the transfer. Every proceeding in the action must be taken in the county court, as if the action had been originally commenced therein.

Decision of the Divisional Court (Day and Charles, JJ.), reported 40 W. R. 461, affirmed.—Harris v. Judge, C.A. 9—[1892] 2 Q. B. 565; 61 L. J. Q. B. 577; 67 L. T. 19.

8. Costs—Action commenced in High Court and transferred to county court—Less than £20 recovered—County Courts Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 43), ss. 65, 116.—Section 116 of the County Courts Act, 1888, applies to actions brought in the High Court and transferred to the county court under section 65. Therefore, where an action of contract for less than £50 is brought in the High Court and transferred to the county court, and less than £20 is recovered, the county court has no power to allow the plaintiff any costs of the action, notwithstanding the provisions as to costs contained in section 65.

Armitage v. Fison, 67 L. T. N. S. 415, overruled.—White v. Cohen, C.A. 396—[1893] 1 Q. B. 580; 62 L. J. Q. B. 274; 68 L. T. 305.

9. Interrogatories — Irrelevancy — Ord. 16, r. 1 (County Court Rules, 1889).—In an action for damages for injuries alleged to have been caused by the fall of a piece of wood through the negligence of the defendant's servants, the plaintiff in the course of interrogatories asked the following question: "If you allege that the piece of wood was not knocked down by one of your servants, state the name and address of the person or firm in whose employ the person was, and the name of the person by whom and how it was so knocked down, and for what he was on your premises." The defendant in his answer stated that the wood was knocked down, without the knowledge or consent of himself or his servants, by some person who was upon his premises as a customer, and declined to give the name and address of such person, on the ground that the information was not relevant and not required bonâ fide for the purpose of the action.

Held, on an application for a further and better answer, that the question went beyond the sphere of interrogatories, and that the defendant's objection to answer was good.—Meek v. Witherington, Q.B.D.—67 L. T. 122.

10. Judgment debt—Married woman—Examination as to property—"Debtor"—County Court Rules, 1889, ord. 25, r. 52.—A married woman against whom a judgment has been obtained is within the terms of ord. 25, r. 52, of the County Court Rules, 1889, and may be ordered to attend for examination as to whether she has means of satisfying the judgment.—Aylesford v. Great Western Railway Co., Q.B.D. 42—[1892] 2 Q. B. 626.

11. Payment into court without denial of liability—County Court Rules, 1889, ord. 9, r. 11 (1)—Forms 103, 104A.—The plaintiff brought an action in the High Court for work and labour as an engineer, and the particulars of his claim consisted of various items. The action having been remitted to the county court, the defendants paid £10 into the county court under the County Court Rules, 1889, ord. 9, r. 11 (1), without denying liability, and without specifying any items as being those in respect of which the payment was made.

Held, that, by the payment into the county court, a cause of action was admitted, but not that something was due on every item of the account.

12. Registrar—Refusal to issue summons under Bills of Exchange Act—Order in nature of mandamus —County Courts Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 43), s. 131. —The registrar of a county court declined to issue a summons under the Bills of Exchange Act, 1855 (now applicable to county courts).

Held, that the proper course was to apply to the High Court under section 131 of the County Courts Act, 1888, for an order calling upon him to show cause why he should not issue the summons, the county court judge having no jurisdiction over the registrar, as there was no cause in the county court.—Reg. v. Registrar of Southampton County Court, Q.B.D.—61 L. J. Q. B. 706.

13. Remittal of counter-claim for trial—Counter-claim in tort—Action stayed except as to counter-claim —County Courts Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 43), s. 66.—A counter-claim, even where by reason of the original action having been stayed it is the sole matter remaining to be tried between the parties, is not an "action" within section 66 of the County Courts Act, 1888, and the court has no power under that section to order it to be remitted for trial to the county court.—Delobbel-Flipo v. Varty, Q.B.D.—[1893] 1 Q. B. 663; 62 L. J. Q. B. 398; 68 L. T. 797.

14. Remitted action—Costs—Action of contract brought in High Court—Action remitted to county court after certain proceedings in High Court—Amount recovered in county court less than £20—Right of plaintiff to costs incurred in county court—County Courts Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 43), ss. 65, 116.—Where an action of contract, which might have been commenced in a county court, is brought in the High Court and after certain proceedings therein is transferred, under section 65 of the County Courts Act, 1888, to a county court, where it results in a judgment for the plaintiff with costs for a sum of less than £20, then the plaintiff is entitled, under section 65 of the Act, to his costs incurred in the county court subsequent to the transfer, though not to the costs incurred in the High Court before the transfer, unless he had a certificate for such costs given under section 116 of the Act.—Armitage v. Fison, Q.B.D.—67 L. T. 415. [Overruled: see ante, No. 8.]

COUNTY COURT (IRELAND):—

Committal of debtor—Liability to pay sheriff's fees. —A creditor who obtains in the county court a committal order against a debtor, on which the debtor is subsequently arrested, is not entitled to recover the sheriff's fees paid on the execution of the order.

Semble, the rules and forms made under the County Courts and Officers (Ireland) Act, 1877, so far as they throw upon the debtor the liability to pay these fees, are ultrà vires.—Barrett v. Goodman, Q.B.D. (Ir.)—32 L. R. Ir. 213.

CRIMINAL LAW:—

1. Cruelty to animals—"Domestic animals"—Wild rabbits confined and coursed in enclosure—12 & 13 Vict. c. 92, ss. 2, 29—17 & 18 Vict. c. 60, s. 3.—The respondents coursed with dogs, in an enclosed field, wild rabbits, which had been caught in nets five or six days previously, and since kept in confinement and fed, and cruelly tortured them. On a case stated on an information for cruelly torturing rabbits,

Held, that the rabbits were not "domestic animals," and therefore the respondents could not be convicted.—Aplin v. Porritt, Q.B.D.—[1893] 2 Q. B. 57; 62 L. J. M. C. 144.

2. Evidence—Confession—Admissibility of.—At the trial of a prisoner for the embezzlement of moneys of his master evidence was received of a confession made by the prisoner to his master. It was proved that shortly before this confession was made the master had said to the prisoner's brother, under circumstances from which it was to be inferred that his words would be conveyed to the prisoner, "It will be the right thing for Marcellus" (the prisoner) "to make a clean breast of it." The prisoner was convicted.

Held, by the court (Lord Coleridge, C.J., and Hawkins, Cave, Day, and Collins, JJ.), that the confession was not admissible in evidence, and that the conviction must be quashed.—Reg. v. Thompson, C.C.R. 525—[1893] 2 Q. B. 12; 62 L. J. M. C. 93; 69 L. T. 22.

3. Manslaughter—Death accelerated by neglect—Implied duty.—A prisoner, a woman between thirty and forty years of age, was indicted for manslaughter. It was proved that she had lived with the deceased, who was her aunt and was seventy-three years of age, and at her expense, for a considerable time; that for some days before her death the deceased was incapable through illness of moving about or attending to her wants or procuring assistance; that the prisoner continued to live in the house of the deceased, and to receive and use articles of food which were brought to the house by tradespeople; that she failed to supply the wants of the deceased, either as to food or the obtaining of medical or nursing attendance, or to make known the condition of the deceased to her neighbours; and that the death of the deceased was substantially accelerated by neglect, want of food and of nursing and medical attendance. The prisoner was convicted.

Held, that, under the above circumstances, there was a duty implied by law on the part of the prisoner to attend to the wants of the deceased, and that, the prisoner's failure to perform that duty having assisted to cause the death of the deceased, the conviction was right.—Reg. v. Instan, C.C.R. 368—[1893] 1 Q. B. 450; 62 L. J. M. C. 86; 68 L. T. 420.

4. Offences against the person—Male under the age of fourteen—Carnal knowledge of girl under the age of thirteen—Incapacity—Presumption of law—Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1885 (48 & 49 Vict. c. 69), s. 4.—A male person under the age of fourteen years is presumed by the law to be incapable of having carnal knowledge, and cannot be convicted under section 4 of the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1885, of having carnal knowledge of a girl under the age of thirteen years.—Reg. v. Waite, C.C.R. 80—[1892] 2 Q. B. 600; 61 L. J. M. C. 187; 67 L. T. 300.

5. Offences against the person—Male under the age of fourteen—Indictment for carnal knowledge of girl under the age of thirteen—Acquittal—Conviction for indecent assault—Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1885 (48 & 49 Vict. c. 69), ss. 4, 9.—A boy under the age of fourteen years, who has been put on his trial under section 4 of the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1885, for carnally knowing a girl under the age of thirteen years, although by reason of his age he is entitled to be acquitted of that offence, may yet, under section 9 of the same Act, be convicted of an indecent assault.—Reg. v. Williams, C.C.R. 332—[1893] 1 Q. B. 320; 62 L. J. M. C. 69.

6. Receiving stolen goods—Resumption of possession by the prosecutor after discovery of the larency—Subsequent receiving—24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, s. 91.—Goods were intrusted to carriers for delivery to a consignee; it was discovered by the carriers that one of their servants had stolen them in transitu, and had readdressed them to the prisoners. The carriers ordered another servant of theirs to deliver them to the prisoners at the place to which the thief had addressed them, and placed them in a van for the purpose of such delivery. The goods were accordingly delivered to the prisoners, who received them knowing that they had been stolen. In the indictment the property in the goods was laid in the carriers.

Held, that the carriers had resumed possession of the goods, and that, therefore, when the prisoners received them they were not stolen property, and the prisoners could not be convicted of feloniously receiving them.

7. Vagrant Acts—Gaming—Betting in a public place—"At any game or pretended game of chance"—Vagrant Act Amendment Act, 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 38), s. 3.—In order to obtain a conviction on a charge of betting by way of wagering, under section 3 of the Vagrant Act Amendment Act, 1873, it is necessary to allege and prove that the wagering was at some game or pretended game of chance.—Ridgeway v. Farndale, Q.B.D. 128—[1892] 2 Q. B. 309; 61 L. J. M. C. 199; 67 L. T. 318.

CROWN:—

1. Costs—"Proceeding"—18 & 19 Vict. c. 90, s. 2.—Upon a motion in a petition matter for an order declaring the petitioners entitled to moneys lodged in court by a railway company for lands acquired compulsorily, an affidavit was filed on behalf of the Crown resisting the motion and claiming the moneys.

Held, that this was a "proceeding" within section 2 of 18 & 19 Vict. c. 90, and the court, having decided in favour of the petitioners, awarded costs against the Crown.—Ex parte Jordan, V.C. (Ir.)—31 L. R. Ir. 1.

2. Prerogative—Treaties—Interference with private rights—Acts of State.—Quære, whether the Crown has the power of compelling its subjects to obey the provisions of a treaty made either for the purpose of putting an end to war or to preserve peace, or whether interference with private rights can be authorized otherwise than by the Legislature.

Where the Government justified certain acts, in derogation of the private rights of the plaintiff in regard to his lobster fishery, as acts and matters of State arising out of political relations between Her Majesty and the French Government, contending that they involved the construction of treaties and of a temporary modus vivendi for lobster fishing in Newfoundland and other Acts of State, and that they were matters which could not be inquired into by the court, Held, that this defence disclosed no answer to the action.—Walker v. Baird, P.C.—[1892] A. C. 491; 61 L. J. P. C. 92; 67 L. T. 513.

DEBTORS ACT:—

1. "Default in payment of money"—Attachment—Jurisdiction—Order to pay money in pursuance of undertaking—Contempt of court—Debtors Act, 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 62), ss. 4, 5.—An execution creditor gave, in interpleader proceedings, an undertaking to make good any deficiency on sale, which was embodied in an order made directing the sheriff to sell the goods seized. There was a deficiency on the sale, and the master made an order directing the amount to be paid by the execution creditor to the claimant. This order not being obeyed, an order was made by a judge attaching the execution creditor and committing him for contempt of court; but there was no proof of means to pay.

Held, that the case was one of "default in the payment of a sum of money" which had become due as a debt, and was within section 4 of the Debtors Act, 1869, and that there was, therefore, no jurisdiction to make the order for attachment.—Buckley v. Crawford, Q.B.D. 239—[1893] 1 Q. B. 105; 62 L. J. Q. B. 87; 67 L. T. 681.

2. Trustee—Non-compliance with order to pay money into court—Bankruptcy of trustee—Jurisdiction—Exercise of discretion—Appeal—Debtors Act, 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 62), s. 4 (3)—Debtors Act, 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 54), s. 1—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 9—The court has jurisdiction to order the attachment of a trustee who has made default in payment of a sum of money which he has been ordered to pay into court, notwithstanding that a receiving order in bankruptcy has been made against him.

Where a judge to whom an application for an attachment is made appears to the Court of Appeal to have exercised upon an erroneous ground the discretion conferred on the court by the Debtors Act, 1878, they will review his decision.—In re Smith, Hands v. Andrews, C.A. 289—[1893] 2 Ch. 1; 62 L. J. Ch. 336; 68 L. T. 337.

DEED:—

Unsealed instrument—Bond duly stamped and purporting to be sealed—Claim by obligee.—The executor of a testatrix discovered amongst her papers after her decease, which occurred in 1891, a bond dated in 1874, under the hand only of the obligor, in the sum of £800, in favour of S., one of her nieces, conditioned for the transfer by the obligor in her lifetime, or by her executors or administrators within six calendar months after her decease, into the name of S., for her separate use, or to her executors, administrators, or assigns, of the sum of £400 Three per Cent. Consols; and the bond contained a proviso that if the obligor should by her will or any codicil thereto bequeath to or in favour of S. a sum of Consols equal to or greater than such sum of £400 Consols therein mentioned, then such sum should be deemed a satisfaction of the whole or part, as the case might be, of such sum of £400 Consols. Although the bond bore the words "sealed with my seal," which preceded the date, and the attestation clause stated that the bond was "signed, sealed, and delivered" by the obligor, it did not appear that a seal had in fact ever been affixed, there being no mark, wafer, or seal visible on the face of the document. The bond was, however, properly stamped. S. nevertheless claimed to be entitled to enforce the bond against the estate of the obligor, as, the document being properly stamped, and purporting to have been sealed, and the attestation clause being in the usual form, there was primâ facie evidence that the document had been duly sealed, and the court would presume that it had been sealed.

Held, that the court could not, under the circumstances, presume that the bond had been sealed; and that, therefore, S., being a volunteer, was not entitled to enforce it.

DEFAMATION:—

LIBEL—

1. Injunction—Business—Trade union.—An action was brought by a business firm against a trade union, and the secretary, president, vice-president, and treasurer of the union for an injunction to restrain them from publishing a circular in which the plaintiffs were accused of boycotting some lightermen. The circular was signed by the secretary. It was admitted that the vice-president did not belong to the union, and was joined as defendant by mistake. The names of the president and treasurer were printed upon the paper upon which the circular was written, but they gave evidence that the circular was issued without their knowledge and authority, and that they disapproved of it. The plaintiffs in their statement of claim stated that the statements in the circular were untrue, and "had been made maliciously and unjustifiably on the part of the defendants." An interim injunction had been granted.

Held, that the injunction must be made perpetual against the society, the secretary, and other officers, servants, or agents of the society, with costs. That the plaintiffs were justified in joining the president and treasurer as defendants; the court, therefore, gave them no costs.—Pink v. Federation of Trade and Labour Unions, CH.D. KEK., J.—67 L. T. 258.

1a. Plea of justification—Particulars—Insufficiency of—Validity of plea.—A general plea of justification in an action of libel, where the libel complained of consists of a general charge against the plaintiff, is bad, unless the defendant, in his particulars, states specifically the facts upon which he relies in support of the charge.—Zierenberg and Wife v. Labouchere, C.A. 675—[1893] 2 Q. B. 183.

2. Privilege—Absolute privilege—Charges against solicitor under Solicitors Act, 1888.—An action of libel was founded upon charges of professional misconduct against the plaintiff, a solicitor, made in an application to the Incorporated Law Society with an affidavit attached under the Solicitors Act, 1888.

Held, that the action must be dismissed as vexatious, the proceedings being judicial proceedings and the statements being absolutely privileged.—Lilley v. Roney, Q.B.D.—61 L. J. Q. B. 727.

3. Privilege—Report of judicial proceeding—Application to justices for summons—Open court—Fairness of report—Burden of proof—Province of judge.—Where justices specially summoned for the purpose sit in their council chamber to hear an application for the issue of a summons on a criminal charge, a fair report of what takes place on such proceeding is privileged, although no evidence is given on oath, and although such proceeding does not result in a final decision, but leads to a further inquiry.

The burden of showing that an alleged libel is a fair report of a judicial proceeding lies on the defendant; but it is sufficient if this clearly appears from the plaintiff's evidence. Where the plaintiff's contention is that the report is rendered unfair by certain omissions, if the judge thinks such omissions to be immaterial he may decline to leave the case to the jury, and order verdict and judgment to be entered for the defendant.—Kimber v. Press Association, C.A. 17—[1893] 1 Q. B. 65; 62 L. J. Q. B. 152; 67 L. T. 515.

DIVORCE:—

1. Bigamous marriage of petitioner—Bona fides of petitioner—No adulterous intent—Intervention by Queen's Proctor—Discretion of court—Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857 (20 & 21 Vict. c. 85), s. 31—Decree to be made absolute—Form of order.—Where a petitioner acts purely in ignorance of the law, and has no intention to commit adultery, being in fact unaware that what he is doing amounts to adultery, the discretion conferred upon the court by section 31 of the Matrimonial Causes Act should be exercised in his favour.—Snook v. Snook, P.D. & A.D.—67 L. T. 389.

2. Bigamous marriage of petitioner—Ignorance of law—Special circumstances—Discretionary bar—Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857 (20 & 21 Vict. c. 85), s. 31.—On the hearing of a husband's petition for dissolution of the marriage on the ground of his wife's adultery, it was proved that the husband and wife signed a paper to the effect that they agreed to separate, and that each was at liberty to marry again. The husband, who was in humble rank, was advised by a friend who had done the same thing himself, and to whom the husband mentioned that he wanted a divorce, that this document would be legal and binding; and the court found on the evidence that the husband believed this. The husband lived for eighteen months as a single man, and then met a lady to whom he communicated the above facts, and she consented to and did go through a ceremony of marriage with him, and they lived together as man and wife for three years, when someone informed the husband that he was living in adultery, and, after consulting a solicitor, and on learning that the second marriage was not legal, he separated from the lady and took his own wife back; she did not remain long with him, and the charge against her was proved.

Held, that, as the petitioner acted in ignorance of the law, and in the bonâ fide belief that the second marriage was legal, it was a proper case for the court to exercise its discretion under section 31 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857, to excuse the adultery of the petitioner. The court accordingly pronounced a decree nisi for dissolution of the marriage.—Whitworth v. Whitworth and Thomasson, P.D. & A.D. 592—[1893] P. 85; 62 L. J. P. D. & A. 71; 68 L. T. 467.

3. Bigamous marriage of petitioner—Desertion—Discretional bar.—A wife, sixteen years after her husband had deserted her and believing him to be dead, married again. She subsequently discovered that her husband was living, and had also contracted a bigamous marriage nineteen years after he left his wife. The wife petitioned for dissolution of the marriage.

Held, following Freegard v. Freegard, 8 P. D. 186, that the court in the exercise of its discretion would grant a decree.—Potter v. Potter, P.D. & A.D.—67 L. T. 721.

4. Condonation—Damages—Husband's petition—Dismissal of petition—Second petition.—After a husband's petition for divorce had been presented, he condoned the offence, and abandoned the petition. Subsequently he presented a second petition charging his wife with adultery with the same co-respondent (alleging the same offences as were charged in the first petition) and another, and claiming damages.

Held, on motion to dismiss the first co-respondent from the suit, that the condonation was no bar to a claim for damages.—Bernstein v. Bernstein, P.D. & A.D.—[1892] P. 375; 62 L. J. P. D. & A. 16; 67 L. T. 529.

5. Damages—Qualified verdict—Position of co-respondent—Further direction to jury—Reconsidered verdict—Judgment for increased amount.—In an undefended suit for dissolution of marriage brought by the husband against his wife upon the ground of her adultery with the co-respondent, damages were claimed against the latter, and the jury awarded £150, adding that if the co-respondent had been in a better position they would have awarded more.

The President thereupon told them that this would not do, as the real question to be considered in such cases was the injury done to the petitioner through the wrongful act of the co-respondent, whose means and position were irrelevant upon the assessment by the jury of the quantum of damages. The jury then reconsidered their verdict upon this point, and awarded £500.—Bikker v. Bikker & Whitewood, P.D. & A.D—67 L. T. 721.

6. Decree nisi not made absolute—Wife's petition—Petitioner married again—Resumption of cohabitation with respondent—Condonation—Cruelty—Revival—Discretionary bar—Decree absolute—20 & 21 Vict. c. 85, s. 30.—In a petition by the wife for a divorce on the ground of adultery and cruelty, a decree nisi was pronounced, but no steps were taken to make it absolute. The petitioner, believing that the marriage was dissolved at the end of six months, went through a form of marriage with a man with whom she cohabited for some years until he died. She then resumed cohabitation with the respondent, but he was guilty of cruelty to her, and she left him after living with him a year and nine months.

Held, upon an application by the petitioner to make the decree nisi absolute, the Queen's Proctor intervening, that there was nothing in the circumstances to prevent the cruelty of which the respondent had been guilty during the second cohabitation from reviving the matrimonial offences on the ground of which the decree nisi had been pronounced, and that, inasmuch as it must be taken that she went through the form of marriage with another person in the honest belief that her marriage with the respondent was dissolved, the court was entitled to make the decree nisi absolute.—Moore v. Moore, P.D. & A.D.—[1892] P. 382; 62 L. J. P. D. & A. 10; 67 L. T. 530.

7. Desertion—Husband willing to return but cohabiting with another woman.—A husband may be guilty of desertion, even though he is willing to return to cohabitation with his wife, if at the time he is so willing he is actually cohabiting with another woman.—Edwards v. Edwards, P.D. & A.D. —62 L. J. P. D. & A. 33.

8. Jactitation of marriage.—In a suit of jactitation of marriage brought by the supposed wife, the jury found that she had at a former period acquiesced in the representations of the respondent that she was his wife.

Held, affirming the decision of Barnes, J., that upon this finding the petition must be dismissed. —Thompson v. Bourke, C.A.—[1893] P. 70; 62 L. J. P. D. & A. 46; 67 L. T. 788.

9. Judicial separation—Custody of child—Guardianship of Infants Act, 1886 (49 & 50 Vict. c. 27), s. 7—Declaration as to unfitness of guilty parent—Effect.—The court appended to its decree for judicial separation, granted upon the ground of gross misconduct on the husband's part, a declaration, in terms of section 7 of the Guardianship of Infants Act, 1886, that he was a person unfit to have the custody of the only child of the marriage (a girl), notwithstanding the fact that all the witnesses concurred in saying that the respondent was very fond of his child, and had never been cruel in any way to her personally.

The court (Barnes, J.) concurred with the view expressed by Jeune, J., in Webley v. Webley, 64 L. T. N. S. 839, as to the operation and effect of such a declaration.—Hitchings v. Hitchings, P.D. & A.D.—67 L. T. 530.

10. Judicial separation—Separation deed—Prior adultery of wife—Mutual covenant not to commence or prosecute proceedings—Subsequent adultery by husband —Prior adultery of wife a bar to relief.—A separation deed contained a clause, "No proceedings shall be commenced or prosecuted by or on behalf of either party against the other in respect of any cause of complaint which now exists or which has arisen before the date of these presents." Prior to the execution of the deed it was known that the wife had committed adultery. Subsequently the husband committed adultery, and the wife filed her petition for a judicial separation.

Held, that the wife's prior adultery was a bar to the court granting her the relief prayed for, and that the husband was not precluded by the covenant from pleading it, as he was not thereby "commencing or prosecuting" proceedings.

Rose v. Rose, 30 W. R. 736, 31 W. R. 573, 7 P. D. 225, 8 P. D. 98, considered.—Gooch v. Gooch, P.D. & A.D. 655—[1893] P. 99; 62 L. J. P. D. & A. 73; 68 L. T. 462.

11. Jurisdiction—English domicil—Foreign decree at suit of wife—Unjust allegations—Non-submission of husband to foreign jurisdiction—English suit—Philadelphian law.—A domiciled Englishman married in England a native of the United States of America. After a time the wife left the husband of her own accord without any cause, and, returning to America, refused to return to this country. She applied for and obtained from the court at Philadelphia, under a recent Act of that court, a decree dissolving the marriage, on the ground of her husband's cruelty. The husband was served with a citation to appear in the proceedings, but, acting on advice, he refused to submit to the jurisdiction of the court of Philadelphia, and did not appear. The wife subsequently went through a ceremony of marriage in Philadelphia with the co-respondent, and they cohabited together.

Held, that, though the marriage in America was legal there, the decree there dissolving the English marriage was not binding in this country, and could not affect the petitioner, who was a domiciled Englishman and had never been resident in Philadelphia or submitted himself to the jurisdiction of that court, and that the English marriage was still valid and binding; and this court accordingly pronounced a decree nisi dissolving that marriage, on the ground of the adultery of the respondent and co-respondent.—Green v. Green and Sedgewick, P.D. & A.D. 591—[1893] P. 89; 68 L. T. 261.

12. Non-consummation owing to wife's refusal—Bigamy and adultery of husband—Wife's petition—Unreasonable delay.—Husband and wife lived together for some months, but the marriage was never consummated owing to the wife's refusal. The husband then contracted a bigamous marriage, but the wife did not institute proceedings for two years after she knew all the facts.

Held, this was unreasonable delay; and, further, that her refusal to allow the marriage to be consummated was misconduct on her part which had directly conduced to the adultery of her husband, and was a discretional bar to her suit for divorce; but that she was entitled to a judicial separation, the above circumstances constituting no bar to such relief.—Dixon v. Dixon, P.D. & A.D.—67 L. T. 394.

13. Nullity—Domicil—Collusion—English marriage—Scotch divorce.—A petition by a husband for divorce in England was dismissed. An arrangement was then made between the petitioner and the co-respondent that the respondent and co-respondent should cohabit in Scotland, and that an office should be taken for the petitioner there also, in order to found proceedings in Scotland for divorce. All possible steps were taken to conceal the real facts from the Court of Session, and a decree of divorce was pronounced. The respondent and co-respondent then went through a ceremony of marriage in the Isle of Man. Upon a petition to declare this marriage invalid, Held, that the Court of Session had no jurisdiction to dissolve the first marriage, and that the second marriage was null and void.—Bonaparte v. Bonaparte, P.D. & A.D.—[1892] P. 402; 62 L. J. P. D. & A. 1; 67 L. T. 531.

14. Practice—Costs—Wife's petition—Order for costs—Writ of elegit—Motion to set aside.—The husband, respondent in divorce proceedings, obtained in the Queen's Bench Division a mandamus directing his wife to deliver up certain title deeds. The property comprised in these deeds constituted, practically, his whole means. Upon the husband failing to comply with an order of this court for costs of the divorce suit, the wife sued out a writ of elegit, and the sheriff took possession of the property in virtue thereof.

Upon motion by the husband to set aside the writ of elegit until the wife should comply with the mandamus and deliver up the deeds of the property, which he had meanwhile agreed to sell, the court refused to set aside the writ of elegit, but put the wife upon terms as to the receipts arising from the property.—Kippax v. Kippax, P.D. & A.D.—67 L. T. 382.

15. Practice—Costs—Dismissal of wife's petition—Unnecessary charges of cruelty—Rule 159.—In a petition by a wife for divorce, on the ground of adultery and cruelty, the petitioner, in addition to charging the respondent with the communication of venereal disease to her, which was the only evidence of adultery, made general charges of cruelty, as to which the respondent pleaded condonation. At the trial the jury found all the issues in favour of the respondent, and the petition was dismissed.

Held, on an application to allow the petitioner the full costs of the suit, that she was entitled to the costs of the main charge of cruelty and adultery contained in it; but that, inasmuch as the other acts of cruelty charged had been obviously condoned, the charges in respect of them were equally unnecessary whether the main charge failed or succeeded, and that she was not entitled to the costs in regard to such charges.—Ash v. Ash, P.D. & A.D.—[1893] P. 222; 68 L. T. 500.

16. Practice—Evidence—Wife's petition—Motion for leave to prove bigamous marriage, adultery, and identity by affidavits—Witnesses living in America—Order.—Where the witnesses in a divorce suit were all resident in America and the expenses of a commission would be beyond the petitioner's means, the court, upon motion by the petitioner, made an order that the bigamous marriage, the subsequent adultery, and the identity might be proved by affidavit.—Burslem v. Burslem, P.D. & A.D.—67 L. T. 719.

17. Practice — Evidence — Marriage in India — Register in custody of Secretary of State for India— 14 & 15 Vict. c. 40.—The court admitted as evidence, in proof of a marriage which had been performed by a Roman Catholic priest in India, a register of marriages compiled by the Secretary of State for India from periodical reports sent to him from India by clergymen of various denominations.—Regan v. Regan, P.D. & A.D.—67 L. T. 720.

18. Practice—Husband's petition—Counter-charges of adultery and cruelty—Admission of adultery—Condonation—Discretional bar—Right of petitioner to place whole case before court and jury, notwithstanding intimation that decree must be refused.—Upon a husband's petition for dissolution of marriage, the wife, in her answer, made counter-charges of cruelty and adultery against her husband, who denied the alleged cruelty, but admitted that, while living apart from his wife, he had, for a considerable period, lived and cohabited with another woman, but the adultery had been condoned. The condonation was admitted.

At the trial, upon the opening by counsel for the petitioner, the court intimated that relief would be refused, upon the ground of the petitioner's adultery.

The petitioner, notwithstanding this intimation, insisted upon putting all the facts of the case before the jury.

Held, that he could not be precluded from doing so.—Boucher v. Boucher and Judd, P.D. & A.D.—67 L. T. 720.

19. Practice—Order to pay and secure wife's costs—No indorsement—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 41, r. 5—Attachment—Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857 (20 & 21 Vict. c. 85), s. 52—Leave to husband to file defence.—The court declined to attach a husband for disobeying an order as to his wife's costs, where the order upon which the wife sought to attach him was not indorsed in terms of ord. 41, r. 5. But the court refused the husband leave to file a defence to his wife's petition for divorce unless the order as to costs was first complied with.—Pace v. Pace, P.D. & A.D.—61 L. J. P. D. & A. 114; 67 L. T. 383.

20. Practice—Undefended suit by husband—Decree in absence of petitioner.—The court pronounced a decree nisi for divorce upon a husband's petition without requiring his evidence.—Nicolson v. Nicolson and Fairley, P.D. & A.D.—68 L. T. 28.

21. Queen's Proctor—Intervention—Previous findings of adultery, cruelty, and collusion against the petitioner—Res judicata—Estoppel—Discretion—20 & 21 Vict. c. 85, s. 30.—Upon an intervention by the Queen's Proctor for the purpose of showing cause against a decree nisi obtained by a husband in a petition for a divorce on the ground of his wife's adultery, it appeared that, at a trial of cross-petitions previously presented by the husband and wife against each other, it had been arranged that the husband should submit to a decree nisi being pronounced on the ground of his adultery and cruelty, and should withdraw his petition against his wife. It also appeared that, on an intervention by the Queen's Proctor to rescind such decree nisi on the ground of collusion, suppression of material facts, and the wife's adultery, the jury had found that there had been collusion and suppression of material facts, but were unable to agree as to the wife's adultery, whereupon the decree nisi was rescinded and the petition dismissed.

The Queen's Proctor in the present intervention pleaded that the findings of the juries at the former trials operated as an estoppel against the husband in the present petition, and that the adultery, cruelty, and collusion found against him were res judicata, which disentitled him to relief.

Held, on motion of the Queen's Proctor to dismiss the petition, that, though the previous findings must be taken as conclusive evidence that the petitioner had been guilty of adultery, cruelty, and collusion, they did not amount to an estoppel, and that it would be open to the petitioner at the trial of the issues raised by the present intervention to show that the collusion was not in regard to the present petition, and that the circumstances were such as to induce the court to grant relief notwithstanding the findings of adultery and cruelty.—Butler v. Butler, P.D. & A.D.—[1893] P. 185.

22. Settlement—Guilty wife—Leasehold property of wife—Restraint on anticipation—Amount settled variable or fixed—Allowance to children for life—Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857 (20 & 21 Vict. c. 85), s. 45.—On a husband's petition, under section 45 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857, for settlement of property to which the wife, who had been found guilty of adultery, was entitled, the registrar reported that the husband's annual income was £350, derived from his business, whilst the wife's income was £1,140, principally arising from leasehold property, but settled without power of anticipation. The registrar recommended that during the respondent's life £250 a year should be settled on the husband, and £60 on each of five children in the custody of the husband, the sixth child, an infant, having been left in the custody of the respondent.

The court confirmed the registrar's report, and refused to make the allowance variable to meet a possible fall in the respondent's income, or to limit the husband's receipt of his allowance to such time as he should be unmarried, or to limit the allowance to the children to the time when they should be under sixteen years of age.

The settlement was executed by the respondent on a subsequent day immediately after the decree for dissolution of the marriage was made absolute.—Midwinter v. Midwinter, P.D. & A.D. 560—[1893] P. 93; 62 L. J. P. D. & A. 77; 68 L. T. 262.

23. Settlement—Variation—Children—Registrar's report—Recommendation that costs be paid out of settled property—Consent of all parties.—The court sanctioned the payment, out of the corpus of the settled property, of costs of the petition for variation of settlements, in a case where a yearly allowance was to be made for each of the children during their lives, and where all parties, including the trustees of the settlement, consented.—Hamilton v. Hamilton, P.D. & A.D.—68 L. T. 467.

24. Settlement—Variation—Assignment of property during cohabitation not a "settlement"—22 & 23 Vict. c. 61, s. 5—Dismissal of petition for variation—Order to secure property as maintenance.—The wife obtained a decree dissolving her marriage, and she thereupon petitioned for variation of settlements, or, in the alternative, for maintenance. Some twenty years before the date of the decree she assigned to her husband certain property of which she then stood possessed subject to mortgages. This she now sought to have reassigned to her, subject to all valid mortgages.

Held, that the assignment was not a "settlement" within the meaning of the Act, but that, upon a petition by the wife for maintenance, the court could order, and did order, the respondent to secure to the petitioner, by way of maintenance, the property which she had formerly assigned to him, subject to outstanding mortgages.—Chalmers v. Chalmers, P.D. & A.D.—68 L. T. 28.

DIVORCE (IRELAND):—

Costs—Motion for new trial—Application to stay issue of certificate of taxation—Ord. 70, r. 92.—A wife having obtained a decree for a divorce a mensâ et thoro, the husband served notice of motion for a new trial, and the time allowed for moving had expired. The petitioner afterwards lodged her costs for taxation, and the respondent, without lodging money in court or offering security, applied that the taxing master should not issue his certificate of taxation until the new trial motion should be disposed of.

The court refused the application.—Riordan v. Riordan, P. & M.D. (Ir.)—31 L. R. Ir. 222.

DOMICIL:—

Marriage of Scotchman with Englishwoman—Domicil of origin—Residence—Animus revertendi et manendi—Evidence—Scotch law—Wife's property—Jus mariti—Ante-nuptial contract.—The domicil of a person is that place or country in which his habitation is fixed without any present intention of removing therefrom.

The plaintiff, a son of Scotch parents, his domicil of origin being Scotch, brought an action to establish his title, jure mariti, according to the Scotch law, to one-half of the property of his deceased wife, an English lady, alleging that during the marriage his own domicil, and consequently his wife's also, was Scotch.

Held, upon the evidence, that the plaintiff had, during the marriage, acquired by choice a domicil in England, and that the domicil so acquired continued until his wife's death.

Judgment of Chitty, J., affirmed.

Per Chitty, J.—Upon the marriage of a Scotchman with an Englishwoman upon whom property has already been settled, it is desirable that an antenuptial contract should be entered into by them confirming the wife in her rights according to English law, so as to preclude the husband, in the event of the wife's death, from setting up any claim, jure mariti, to her property under the Scotch law.

Where the domicil of birth is changed during infancy by a change of domicil of the father, Semble, that the altered domicil cannot be regarded as the infant's domicil of origin.—In re Craignish, Craignish v. Hewitt, C.A.—[1892] 3 Ch. 180; 67 L. T. 689.

DRAINAGE ACTS (IRELAND):—

Charge—Final award of Public Works Commissioners—Proprietor therein named grantee under fee-farm grant—Eviction for non-payment of rent—Liability of grantor's estate.—A drainage district having been duly constituted, the final award of the Commissioners of Public Works named as the proprietor of part of the lands the grantee under a fee-farm grant. The grantor evicted the lands for non-payment of the fee-farm rent. The drainage charge having fallen into arrear, Held, that the drainage charge affected only the estate of the grantee in the fee-farm grant, and that the grantor's estate was not liable thereto.—Attorney-General v. Wilson, C.A. (Ir.)—31 L. R. Ir. 28.

ECCLESIASTICAL LAW:—

1. Burial—Cremation—Faculty for removal of dead body to be cremated.—Faculty for the removal of a dead body from its place of burial in a mausoleum for the purpose of its being cremated and the ashes deposited in the mausoleum refused.

The court is accustomed in proper cases to grant faculties for the removal of remains buried in consecrated ground for the sole purpose of such remains being re-interred in other consecrated ground, and would not be justified in granting a faculty for the removal of remains after burial for cremation; but,

Semble, where a body has been cremated, there is no legal objection to the ashes being buried in consecrated ground, accompanied with the use of the burial service.—In re Dixon, CONSIST. CT.—[1892] P. 386.

2. Burial—Order in Council directing bodies under a parish church to be removed—Faculty.—An Order in Council was made under section 23 of the Burial Act, 1857, directing the churchwardens of a parish church in the City of London to cause to be removed all human remains found beneath the floor of the church and buried in some consecrated burial ground, the work to be carried on under the supervision of the medical officer of health. The rector and churchwardens applied for a faculty for the removal of the remains to a certain consecrated site in a cemetery.

Held, that the petitioners had taken the proper course, and that it was the duty of the court to issue a faculty with provisions for preserving the fabric of the church, and for authorizing the families of persons buried in the vaults to remove the remains to any consecrated burial-ground they might select.—Rector and Churchwardens of St. Mary-at-Hill v. Parishioners of same, CONSIST. CT.—[1892] P. 394.

3. Ceremonies — Bishop — Communion service — Lighted candles—Administration of mixed chalice—Eastward position—Singing of hymn "Agnus Dei"—Rule as to evidence of historical facts—Finality of Privy Council judgments.—Where it is important to ascertain ancient facts of a public nature, the law permits historical works to be referred to as evidence thereof.

The rule of finality applicable to decisions of the Privy Council in relation to rights of property is not equally binding as regards decisions which relate to ritual and ecclesiastical practice, and depend, to some extent, upon the accuracy of historical investigation.

Held, affirming the judgment of the Archbishop, that, although the mixing of wine with water in and as part of the Communion service is against the law of the Church, yet that the use of a cup mixed beforehand does not constitute an ecclesiastical offence;

Held, that the choir's singing of the hymn "The Agnus" before and during the reception of the elements is not illegal;

Held, that the priest's standing at the northern end of the west side of the table during the whole of that part of the Communion service which intervenes between its commencement and the ordering of the bread and wine before the Prayer of Consecration is not illegal.

It being admitted that two candles, not required for the purpose of giving light, were alight throughout the celebration on the holy table without objection on the part of the respondent, who was officiating as bishop, but there being no evidence either of a ceremonial use of the lights or that the respondent had introduced them as unlawful ornaments,

Held, that the respondent was not responsible therefor, and that his making no objection thereto was not an ecclesiastical offence.

Held, that where promoters have established the commission of an ecclesiastical offence, they are not entitled as of right to a monition; but that the Archbishop was entitled, on being satisfied that the offence would not be repeated, to accept the assurance of future submission.—Read v. Bishop of Lincoln, P.C.—[1892] A. C. 644; 62 L. J. P. C. 1; 67 L. T. 128.

4. Churchwarden—Qualification—Residence within parish—1 & 2 Will. 4, c. 38, s. 16.—It is provided by 1 & 2 Will. 4, c. 38 that where the population of a parish exceeds a certain number, and a new church is built within such parish, a district may be assigned to such new church; and it is enacted by section 16 that two fit and proper persons shall be appointed to act as churchwardens for every church built under the provisions of this Act at the usual period of appointing parish officers in every year, and shall be chosen one by the incumbent of the church for the time being, and the other by the renters of the pews in such church.

Held, that a person not resident within the parish was not qualified to be elected as churchwarden of a church built under the provisions of the abovementioned Act.—Reg. v. Cree, Q.B.D.—67 L. T. 556.

5. Clergy Discipline Act, 1892 (55 & 56 Vict. c. 32), ss. 2, 12—Complaint against clergyman for immorality—Offence of occasioning scandal by immoral conduct not justiciable by Chancellor of diocese sitting with elected assessors—Amendment of complaint—Charge of habitual drunkenness—Practice.—The complaint in a criminal suit tried before the Chancellor of the Diocese of Rochester sitting with assessors, under the Clergy Discipline Act, 1892, after charging the defendant, a clergyman holding preferment within the diocese of Rochester, with certain specified offences against morality, further charged him with "occasioning grave scandal and offence in the parish of which he was incumbent by his scandalous conduct in the several preceding charges set forth."

Held, that the ecclesiastical offence of "occasioning scandal and evil report" was not an offence which could be legally tried under the Clergy Discipline Act, 1892, and that all reference to any such charge must be struck out of the complaint.

Practice of the Consistory Court of Rochester as to admitting to proof in a criminal suit charges of habitual drunkenness and of acts of drunkenness, the precise dates of which the prosecutor cannot specify.—Bishop of Rochester v. Harris, CONSIST. CT. —[1893] P. 137.

6. Faculty—Jurisdiction—Closed churchyard—Act vesting churchyard in corporation—Excavation of chamber for electric light.—In two cases of faculty it appeared that for the purpose of lighting two districts in the City of London with electric light it was necessary that underground chambers should be constructed in two closed churchyards in the districts, there being no other places suitable for their construction, and that it was in the interest of the parishioners and public that electric light should be introduced in the districts.

Held, that the court had jurisdiction in its discretion to decree a faculty in each case authorizing the construction of such a chamber in the churchyard, and the use of the same as a transformer chamber for twenty-one years, subject to the payment of a rent to the rector and churchwardens.

Held, also, that the court was not precluded by a local Act, which vested the churchyard in the Corporation of the City of London, to be unappropriated to any purpose except ornamental purposes, from granting the faculty.—In re St. Nicholas Cole Abbey, In re St. Benetfink Churchyard, CONSIST. CT.—[1893] P. 58.

7. Faculty—Stained glass window in chancel—Opposition of majority of parishioners—Discretion of ordinary—Memorials not admissible in evidence.—The rector and churchwardens of a parish petitioned the ordinary for a faculty to enable them to place stained glass in the east window of the chancel. The faculty was opposed, upon the grounds that the majority of the parishioners desired the existing window to remain unaltered, though no objection was raised to the design of the proposed window, and that the ventilation of the church would suffer, and the chancel be darkened. The judge of the consistory court found that the last two grounds of objection were not borne out by the evidence, and decreed the faculty to issue, and condemned the opponents in costs.

Held, on appeal, that the discretion of the ordinary as to granting or refusing the faculty was the same as if it had been proposed to place the window in any other part of the church; that, assuming that the majority of the parishioners desired the existing window to remain, that in no way fettered the discretion of the ordinary; that the court below had come to a right conclusion on the evidence, and that the decree must be affirmed, except that each of the parties must bear their own costs.

In a contested cause of faculty memorials signed by parishioners asking that a faculty prayed for be not granted are inadmissible in evidence.—Nickalls v. Briscoe, ARCH. CT.—[1892] P. 269.

8. Nomination to benefice by Roman Catholic patron—Void presentation—13 Anne, c. 13.—Held, that a presentation to a benefice made by a college on the nomination of a Roman Catholic patron, and appearing on the face of it to have been made, not in right of the college, but in trust for the Roman Catholic, was absolutely void under 13 Anne, c. 13. —Boyer v. Bishop of Norwich, P.C.—[1892] A. C. 417; 61 L. J. P. C. 76; 67 L. T. 30.

9. Pew—Chapel—Long user—Acts of ownership—Presumption of legal origin—Faculty—Prescription.—In the year 1782 a chapel upon the first floor of a building the ground floor of which was occupied by a school-house was licensed by the bishop of a diocese, and was constituted a perpetual cure and benefice under 1 Geo. 1, stat. 2, c. 10, s. 4, pews being allotted to the subscribers. These pewholders sold and transferred their seats by entries in the chapel-book. In 1846 the chapel was removed, and a new chapel was erected upon the site of the school-house, which had then been demolished. The circumstances under which the new chapel was erected were such as to warrant the presumption of a conveyance of the site of the school-house for the purposes of the benefice. On the 12th of February, 1848, pews in the new chapel were allotted to the holders of pews in the old chapel, and on the 22nd of February, 1848, the new chapel was consecrated. These pews, and others which were substituted for them upon the re-pewing and repairing of the chapel under a faculty granted in 1867, were exclusively enjoyed by the persons to whom they were allotted and their successors in title down to the commencement of this action, and were dealt with by them by way of assignment and devise. There was no evidence of the pews having been repaired by these persons. The plaintiff, in whom the rights of the previous holders of three of these pews were vested, brought an action against the vicar and churchwardens of the parish, claiming a declaration that he was entitled to the pews and an injunction to restrain interference by the defendants.

Held, that the evidence did not justify the presumption of a legal origin for the user of the pews, and that the plaintiff could not maintain the action. —Proud v. Price, Q.B.D. 650—68 L. T. 682.

ESTOPPEL:—

1. Deed—Sale—Mortgage—Fraud—Innocent mis-

representation—Covenant for title—Averment of legal estate.—By indenture of the 4th of December, 1875, the defendants, being seised in fee of certain real estate, conveyed a plot of ground, part thereof, to the use of T., his heirs and assigns, by way of sale. By indenture of the 25th of May, 1876, T. conveyed the plot by way of mortgage to the A. Society. By an indenture of the 4th of April, 1877, after reciting that the testator, of whose real estate the defendants were the trustees, being at the date of his will, and so continuing till the time of his death, seised in fee simple, free from incumbrances, of certain real estate, of which the plot thereby granted formed part, made his will, and thereby devised his real estate unto the defendants, their heirs and assigns, upon certain trusts, and also reciting that the testator died without having revoked or altered his will, and also reciting that the defendants, in exercise of a power in the will, had agreed with T. for the absolute sale to him of the plot of land and premises intended to be thereby granted, and the inheritance thereof, in fee simple in possession, free from incumbrances, at a certain price, and also reciting that H. S., one of the defendants, as beneficial owner of the plot of ground subject to the power of sale, had agreed to concur in the indenture, it was witnessed that the defendants did grant and convey, and the defendant, H. S., did grant and confirm, the plot of ground unto and to the use of T., his heirs and assigns, for ever. The identure contained a covenant that the defendants and the defendant H. S. respectively had not incumbered; and also a covenant that the defendant H. S., together with the defendants, had good right to convey. By an indenture of the 22nd of September, 1877, T. purported to convey the plot of ground and premises comprised in the indenture of the 4th of April, 1877, to the plaintiffs by way of mortgage to secure certain moneys. The plot of ground comprised in the indentures of the 4th of April, 1877, and the 22nd of September, 1877, was comprised in, and had been already conveyed by way of sale and by way of mortgage by, the indentures of the 4th of December, 1875, and the 25th of March, 1876, respectively. The indenture of the 4th of April, 1877, was innocently executed by the defendants at the request of T., who was employed by them in the development of the testator's estate, and who enjoyed their confidence, and upon a representation made by him, which they accepted in good faith, that the plot of ground had not already been sold. The plaintiffs innocently advanced their money upon the faith of the representations made through T. to them by the defendants in the indenture of the 4th of April 1877. In an action for breach of covenant for title, Held, that the statements as to title in the deed of the 4th of April, 1877, were not sufficiently precise to raise an estoppel against the defendants so as to prevent them from denying that in fact they had no title to convey, and from setting up the true facts.

Held, by Lindley, L.J., that the defendants were not liable to the plaintiffs for the loss sustained by them on the mortgage of the 22nd of September, 1877, on the further grounds—(1) that the plaintiffs were in no better position as against the defendants than T., from whom they took the mortgage, and (2) that the misrepresentation of the defendants, by which the plaintiffs had been misled, was an innocent one.

Decision of Kekewich, J., reversed.

Quære, whether, supposing there had been an estate created by estoppel as against the defendants, a plea of fraud would be well answered by the reply of purchase for value without notice.—Onward Building Society v. Smithson, C.A. 53—[1893] 1 Ch. 1; 62 L. J. Ch. 138; 68 L. T. 125.

EVIDENCE:—

Bankers' Books Evidence Act, 1879 (42 & 43 Vict. c. 11), ss. 3-7—Libel action—Plea of justification—Application by defendants for order to inspect plaintiff's bank accounts under section 7—Discretion.—In an action of libel the defendants pleaded that the defamatory statements complained of were true, and in order to establish this plea they desired to put in evidence the plaintiff's banking account. They therefore asked for an order under section 7 of the Bankers' Books Evidence Act, 1879 (42 & 43 Vict. c. 11), that they might be at liberty to inspect and take copies of the entries in the books of the plaintiff's bankers relating to his affairs. On their behalf it was contended that they were entitled to the order, as the immunity granted to the banker by section 6 of the Act of 1879 shut out all other means of procuring the desired evidence.

The order having been successively refused by the master and the learned judge, it was now Held (dismissing the defendants' appeal), that section 6 of the Act must be construed in the light of the sections which precede it, and that it means that no banker shall be compellable to produce his books only so long as he avails himself of the course provided by the Act for his convenience; and that the issue of such an order as was here asked for was in the discretion of the judge, and that that discretion had been rightly exercised.—Emmott v. Star Newspaper Co., Q.B.D.—62 L. EXECUTION.—See SHERIFF.

EXECUTOR:—

1. Action by—Breach of contract causing testator's death—Damage to personal estate—Previous action under Lord Campbell's Act.—A passenger on a railway was injured by an accident, and after an interval died in consequence. The executrix recovered £750 in an action under Lord Campbell's Act. She now sued for damage to his personal estate caused during his lifetime by medical expenses and loss from inability to attend to business.

Held (affirming the judgment of the Queen's Bench Division), that the former action was no bar to the present one.

2. Renunciation of probate—Intermeddling—Consent of parties interested.—There is no absolute rule that an executor who has intermeddled with the assets of a testator will not be allowed to renounce in a proper case. Thus, where an executor had only intermeddled so far as was necessary to protect the assets, and desired to renounce on the ground of his relationship with the next of kin, who were opposing the will, and the parties interested under the will consented, the court gave liberty to renounce.

FACTOR:—

Pledge of goods—Goods entrusted for sale—Mercantile agent—Ordinary course of business—Factors Act, 1889 (52 & 53 Vict. c. 45), ss. 1, 2.—Where a person entrusted with goods for the purpose of sale only pledges them with a pawnbroker, he is not a mercantile agent "acting in the ordinary course of business of a mercantile agent" within the meaning of section 2 of the Factors Act, 1889, and the pawnbroker is not protected by that section from an action by the owner to recover the value of the goods.—Hastings (Limited) v. Pearson, Q.B.D. 127—[1893] 1 Q. B. 62; 62 L. J. Q. B. 75; 67 L. T. 553.

FAIRS:—

"Fair," meaning of—Occupier allowing on his land swings, roundabouts, and other contrivances for amusement—No buying or selling on land—No payment to occupier—Walsall Corporation Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. cxxx.), s. 126.—Section 126 of the Walsall Corporation Act, 1890, imposes a penalty upon any occupier of land within the borough who "holds or permits to be held any market or fair" thereon, without the licence of the corporation.

The defendant, being the occupier of certain land within the borough of Walsall, on certain days (one being a regular fair day) without the licence of the corporation, brought on to his land and used certain swing boats, roundabouts, shooting galleries, and many other contrivances for the amusement of the people. These contrivances were the property of different persons, and it was not proved that such persons made any payment to the defendant for the use of the land, or that there was any buying or selling of goods, or exposing the same for sale thereon.

The defendant was convicted under the section of permitting the holding of a "fair" on his land.

Held, by Bruce, J., that he ought not to have been convicted, as the word "fair" in the section is used in its proper sense as a mart or gathering for the selling of goods, and would not include gatherings where amusements only were provided.

Held, (by Lawrance, J.), that the defendant was properly convicted, as the word "fair" has a wider meaning than that of a fair in the ordinary sense as a place for buying and selling, and that, although buying and selling are the chief idea in the word, yet that it would include places where amusements of the kind in question were provided, although there was no buying and selling.

The junior judge (Bruce, J.) having withdrawn his judgment, the conviction stood.—Collins v. Cooper, Q.B.D.—68 L. T. 450.

FALSE REPRESENTATION:—

Negligence—Misrepresentation — Mortgage—Building agreement—Certificate of surveyer—Liability of surveyor for misstatements without fraud on contract —Action of deceit.—A builder who was engaged in erecting houses upon certain land under a building agreement mortgaged his interest under the agreement. The mortgagees advanced the mortgage money to him upon the faith of certain certificates given by a surveyor, that certain specified stages in the buildings had been completed. The surveyor was appointed, not by the mortgagees, but by a third party, namely, the vendor under the building agreement, to whom the certificates were made out; there was no contract between him and the mortgagees, and he was unaware of the terms of the mortgage deed. The certificates contained untrue statements, the result of the negligence of the surveyor; but there was no fraud on his part.

Held, that, in the absence of fraud or a contractual relationship between him and the mortgagees, the surveyor owed no duty to them to exercise care in giving the certificates, and that an action would not lie against him at the suit of the mortgagees for negligence.

FEE-FARM GRANT:—

1. Redemption of Rent (Ireland) Act, 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 57), s. 1—Amount of redemption price—Fee-farm grant — Buildings erected by grantee. — In determining the amount to be paid to the grantor for the redemption of a fee-farm rent regard should be had to the buildings on the holding as increasing the security for the rent, although they have been erected by the grantee.—O'Hea v. Morrison, LAND COM. 2. Redemption of Rent (Ireland) Act, 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 57)—Application of Act.—The Redemption of Rent (Ireland) Act, 1891, deals only with the rights of parties standing in the relation of landlord and tenant. The rent created by a fee-farm grant dated the 9th of February, 1846, which did not create this relation, cannot be redeemed, nor can the fair rent of the lands on which it is charged be fixed under the said Act.—Kelly v. Rattey, C.A. (Ir.)—32 L. R. Ir. 445.

3. Redemption of Rent (Ireland) Act, 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 57)—Demesne lands—Subletting—Land Law (Ireland) Acts, 1881, 1887.—A fee-farm rent reserved in respect of demesne lands cannot be redeemed under the Redemption of Rent (Ireland) Act, 1891. If the grantee in fee-farm of such lands serve an originating notice claiming to redeem the fee-farm rent, the court will set aside the notice on motion.

If the demesne lands held in fee-farm be sublet by the grantee, his subtenants cannot fix a fair rent against him.

Demesne lands are not undemesned by the mere fact of their having been granted or demised for so long a period as to negative any intention in the grantor or lessor of resuming possession at some future time.—Spencer v. Tedcastle, C.A. (Ir.)—32 L. R. Ir. 411.

4. Redemption of Rent (Ireland) Act, 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 57), s. 1—"Grantee under a fee-farm grant"—Conveyance in fee subject to a rent-charge.—A. granted certain lands to B., his heirs and assigns, to the use that A., his heirs and assigns, should for ever receive out of the lands granted the yearly rent of £45. The deed contained powers of distress and entry, and an ultimate limitation to the use of B., his heirs and assigns, for ever; also a power to redeem the rent wholly or in part. B., being in occupation of the lands, served an originating notice to redeem the rent under the Redemption of Rent (Ireland) Act, 1891.

Held, that B. was not a "grantee under a fee-farm grant" within the meaning of the Act, and had not the status necessary to entitle him to maintain his originating notice.—Christie v. Peacocke, LAND COM. (Ir.)—30 L. R. Ir. 646.

FIJI, LAW of:—

Boundaries of town—Construction of proclamation—High-water mark on the seashore.—Where by proclamation the limits of a town, and therefore of rateable property within a town, were fixed, the western boundary to be the sea coast at high-water mark, the eastern boundary to be at a specified distance therefrom, the northern and southern boundaries to connect the eastern by lines of specified length with certain points on the high-water mark, and it appeared that the appellants had been rated in respect of lands reclaimed by them beyond the western boundary or high-water mark, as it existed at the date of the proclamation, but within that mark as it existed when the rates were imposed.

Held, that the appellants were liable. The true construction was that the eastern boundary was absolutely, and the northern and southern sufficiently fixed in reference to the high-water mark as it existed when proclaimed, but that the western boundary varied from time to time with the high-water mark as it shifted.—Smart & Co. v. Town Board of Suva, P.C.—[1893] A. FISHERY ACTS:—

1. Fishery district—Definition of limits—River—Tributary—Reservoir formed by embankment across tributary.—The River Severn Fishery District included that river and all its tributaries. Under the provisions of the Liverpool Corporation Waterworks Act, 1880, an embankment was constructed across the River Vyrnwy, a tributary of the River Severn, and a reservoir was formed for the purpose of supplying water to the town of Liverpool. The Act provided for a daily and monthly supply of "compensation" water from the reservoir into the part of the River Vyrnwy below the embankment.

Held, that so much of the River Vyrnwy as was above the embankment had ceased to be a tributary of the River Severn, and therefore was not within the jurisdiction of the conservators of the Severn Fishery District.

FRAUDS, STATUTE of:—

1. Agreement in consideration of marriage—Parol promise to give lease of house—Possession—Part performance—Incumbrances—Freedom from—Statute of Frauds (29 Car. 2, c. 3) s. 4.—In 1889 the defendant was married to the plaintiff's son, and the plaintiff gave to his son as a marriage present, but only by word of mouth, a certain business carried on at a certain house, and also (as the defendant contended but the plaintiff denied) the lease of that house. Directly after the marriage possession of the house was given up by the plaintiff and was held by the son, and he carried on the business there for his own benefit till his death, which occurred in April, 1891. Soon after that event a family disagreement arose, and the plaintiff brought an action of ejectment to recover possession of the house.

Held, that the possession of the house given up to the son, equivalent to part performance, dispensed with the necessity of a writing; and that, as nothing was said to the contrary, the gift was free from incumbrances.

2. Interest in land—Contract for purchase of debentures—Company—Charge on undertaking and property—Floating security—Statute of Frauds, s. 4.—A company issued debentures whereby it charged its undertaking and all its property whatsoever and wheresoever, both present and future. One of the conditions indorsed on the debentures provided that the charge thereby created should be a floating security; and another condition provided that the moneys secured by the debentures should become payable if the company created any specific charge on any of its freehold or leasehold property in priority to the debentures. The company was possessed of certain leasehold property.

Held, that a contract for the purchase of such debentures was a contract for an interest in land within section 4 of the Statute of Frauds.

Held, that this was not a sufficient description of the intending mortgagee to satisfy section 4 of the Statute of Frauds.—Pattle v. Anstruther, C.A. 625.

during the examination of witnesses called on behalf of the society. The Arbitration Committee decided that he was not entitled to sick pay.

Held, that the reception of evidence in the member's absence rendered the decision invalid, and, there being no decision within forty days after the application, the justices had jurisdiction to entertain the application.—Bache v. Billingham, Q.B.D.—62 L. J. M. C. 117.

2. Bankruptcy of officer—Debt due to society—Preferential payment—Friendly Societies Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 60), s. 15, sub-section 7—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 40—Preferential Payments in Bankruptcy Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 62), s. 2 (1).—By the Friendly Societies Act, 1875, it is provided that "registered societies shall be entitled to the following privileges": Section 15, sub-section 7, "Upon the death or bankruptcy or insolvency of any officer of a society having in his possession, by virtue of his office, any money or property belonging to the society, or if any execution, attachment, or other process be issued or action or diligence raised against such officer or against his property, his heirs, executors, or administrators, or trustee in bankruptcy or insolvency, or the sheriff or other person executing such process, or the party using such action or diligence respectively, shall, upon demand in writing of the trustees of the society, or any two of them, or any person authorized, by the society or by the committee of management of the same, to make such demand, pay such money and deliver over such property to the trustees of the society in preference to any other debts or claims against the estate of such officer."

The treasurer of a friendly society, who carried on business as a publican, became bankrupt. He was at the time indebted to the society in the sum of £100 6s. 7d., which he had received by virtue of his office. The money did not exist in any specific or traceable form, but his property realized in the bankruptcy some £290. Upon a claim by the trustees of the friendly society to be paid in preference to the other creditors,

Held (affirming the Divisional Court), that it was not the intention of the above section of the Act of 1875 to repeal then existing privileges of friendly societies; that its application was not restricted to specific moneys, or to such as could be specifically traced; that the bankrupt had in his possession, by virtue of his office, £100 6s. 7d. belonging to the society; and that the trustees of the society were entitled, therefore, to be paid that sum in preference to any other claim upon the bankrupt's estate.

3. Dispute—Member—Friendly Societies Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 60), s. 22.—A dispute does not come within the rules of a friendly society as to the settlement of disputes between members and the society if the dispute relates to a claim made by a party to be a member of the society, which claim is denied by the trustees of the society.—Willis v. Wells, Q.B.D. 64—[1892] 2 Q. B. 225; 61 L. J. Q. B. 606.

4. Sum paid for funeral expenses of child under ten years of age—Production of certificate of death—Industrial assurance company—Persons "who issue, or are liable upon, policies of assurance upon human life"—Friendly Societies Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 60), ss. 4, 28—Life Assurance Companies Act, 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 61), s. 2.—By section 28 of the Friendly Societies Act, 1875, it is made an offence for any "society" to pay any sum on the death of a child under ten years of age, except upon the production by the parent of the child of a certificate of death issued by the registrar of deaths; and (sub-section 7) "society" is defined to include "industrial assurance companies assuring the payment of money on the death of children under the age of ten years."

By section 4, "industrial assurance company" is defined to mean (if not inconsistent with the context) "any company as defined by the Life Assurance Companies Act, 1870, which grants assurances on any one life for a less sum than twenty pounds, and which receives contributions . . . by means of collectors at less periodical intervals than two months."

By section 2 of the Life Assurance Companies Act, 1870, "company" is defined to mean "any person or persons, corporate or unincorporate, not being registered under the Acts relating to friendly societies, who issue, or are liable under, policies of assurance upon human life."

A society, whose registration under the Friendly Societies Acts had been cancelled, and which was registered under the Companies Acts, did not issue policies of assurance, but collected and entered upon a contribution card fortnightly contributions from its members, and was liable to pay sums of money upon the death of a member for funeral expenses. The society was convicted under section 28 of the Friendly Societies Act, 1875, for having paid such a sum on the death of a child under the age of ten years without the production of a certificate of death.

Held, that the words in section 2 of the Life Assurance Companies Act, 1870, "who issue, or are liable under, policies of assurance upon human life," must be excluded from the definition of "society" in section 28 of the Friendly Societies Act, 1875, as being inconsistent with the context; and that the society fell within that definition, and the conviction was right.—Newbold Friendly Society v. Barlow, Q.B.D. 543—[1893] 2 Q. B. 128; 62 L. J. M. C. 124; 68 L. T. 798.

GAME:—

Licence to deal in game—Exposing for sale and selling hare and black game killed in Russia—Game Act, 1831 (1 & 2 Will. 4, c. 32)—2 & 3 Vict. c. 35—23 & 24 Vict. c. 90, ss. 13, 14—24 & 25 Vict. c. 91, s. 17.—A person who did not hold an excise licence under 23 & 24 Vict. c. 90, s. 14, exposed for sale in his shop and sold a hare and a brace of black game which had been killed in Russia and imported into this country for sale.

Held, that, the hare and black game having been killed abroad, it was not necessary to hold the excise licence.—Pudney v. Eccles, Q.B.D. 125—[1893] 1 Q. B. 52; 62 L. J. M. C. 27; 67 L. T. 713.

GAMING:—

1. Betting—Employment of agent to bet—Gaming Act, 1892 (55 & 56 Vict. c. 9)—Bet made and paid before passing of Act—Action brought after passing of Act—Whether Act retrospective.—The Gaming Act, 1892, does not apply to a promise made before the Act came into operation.

Before the Act came into operation a betting agent made certain bets at the request of and for a principal.

Before the Act came into operation the betting agent received the winnings and paid the losses in respect of such bets. The result of these transactions was that there was a balance against the principal.

After the Act came into operation the agent brought an action against the principal to recover the balance.

Held, that he was entitled to recover.—Knight v. Lee, Q.B.D. 125—[1893] 1 Q. B. 41; 62 L. J. Q. B. 28; 67 L. T. 688.

2. Betting—Money paid by plaintiff at defendant's request for lost bets—Plaintiff no party to the betting—Right of plaintiff to recover money so paid—8 & 9 Vict. c. 109—Gaming Act, 1892 (55 & 56 Vict. c. 9), s. 1.—Section 1 of the Gaming Act, 1892, enacts that "any promise, express or implied, to pay any person any sum of money paid by him under or in respect of any contract or agreement rendered null and void by 8 & 9 Vict. c. 109 . . . shall be null and void, and no action shall be brought or maintained to recover any such sum of money."

Held, that money paid by the plaintiff at the request of the defendant, in settlement of sums which were in fact bets made and lost by the defendant, the plaintiff himself being no party to the betting, comes within this section as money paid "in respect of" contracts rendered null and void by 8 & 9 Vict. c. 109, and that, therefore, the plaintiff is not entitled to recover the money so paid by him.—Tatam v. Reeve, Q.B.D. 174—[1893] 1 Q. B. 44; 62 L. J. Q. B. 30; 67 L. T. 683.

3. Lottery—Wager—"Missing word" competition—Illegal contract—Right of competitors to return of their contributions—Lottery Act, 1802 (42 Geo. 3, c. 119), s. 1.—The defendant, who was the proprietor of a newspaper, carried on in connection therewith a competition under the following conditions:—He published in his paper a paragraph, omitting the last word. In the same paper he printed a coupon with a direction that persons wishing to enter the competition must cut out the coupon, fill in the word missing from the paragraph, together with their names and addresses, and send it, with a postal order for 1s., to the office of the paper. It was further stated in the paper that the missing word was in the hands of a chartered accountant, enclosed in a sealed envelope; that his statement with regard to it would appear, with the result of the competition, in a subsequent issue of the paper; and that the whole of the money received in entrance fees would be divided equally amongst those competitors who filled in the missing word correctly. In an action by the successful competitors against the defendant and the unsuccessful competitors, seeking administration of the trusts of the moneys in the hands of the defendant for the purposes of the competition and distribution among the persons entitled thereto, Held, (1) that the competition constituted a lottery within the meaning of 42 Geo. 3, c. 119, and was illegal; (2) that so far as the money in the hands of the defendant was impressed with any trust, it was one which had arisen out of an illegal transaction, and the court would not render any assistance in its administration; and, semble, (3) that, notwithstanding the illegality of the competition, the competitors had a legal right, enforceable by action of law, to the return of their contributions, at all events, provided that they gave notice of their claim before the money had been distributed by the defendant.—Barclay v. Pearson, CH.D. HARBOURS and DOCKS:—

Bye-laws—Regulations—Statutory powers—Ultra vires—Harbours, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act, 1847 (10 & 11 Vict. c. 27), ss. 23, 33, 83, 85—Practice—Action by individual—Special damage—Public injury—Ord. 25, r. 5.—A dock company, having, under its special Act and section 83 of the Harbours, &c., Act, 1847, power to make regulations and bye-laws, issued a compulsory code of regulations for shipowners using the docks, but these regulations were not confirmed as "bye-laws" in manner provided by section 85 of the general Act. Certain accommodation provided for by the regulations was in excess of what was required by statute to be provided by the company, and certain rates and charges imposed by them were beyond their statutory powers. A firm of shipowners, which, prior to the regulations, had been in the habit of using the docks and having particular berths appropriated for their ships, finding that the regulations caused them inconvenience and increased expense, brought an action against the dock company for a declaration that the regulations were invalid and for an injunction, a shipowners' trade protection association, which itself owned no ships, being made co-plaintiffs.

Held (affirming the judgment of A. L. Smith, J., dismissing the action), that the association, not being shipowners, and not being entitled to sue as agent for their members, had no locus standi; and that the plaintiff firm, suing as individuals and not by the Attorney-General, were bound to prove special damage by the issue of the regulations, and this they had failed to do, inasmuch as any accommodation provided beyond the statutory requirements must be a matter of agreement between the firm and the dock company; but, under ord. 25, r. 5, a declaration was made that the regulations, not having been confirmed as bye-laws, were not binding on the plaintiff firm save so far as they agreed to be bound by them; and that they were not entitled to have berths appropriated to their ships, or any other special accommodation, except by agreement with the dock company.—London Association of Shipowners v. London and India Docks Joint Committee, C.A.—[1892] 3 Ch. 242; 62 L. HIGHWAY:—

1. Access to—Mandatory injunction—Esplanade—Adjoining landowner.—An owner of land which runs right up to a public highway is entitled to access to that highway from his land, and that is so whether he is the presumptive owner of the soil of the highway or not. Where, therefore, a landowner, whose land adjoined a public promenade which had been also for many years used as a public highway for foot passengers, was deprived of his access to the promenade by a fence erected by a local board in whom the promenade had been vested,

Held, that a mandatory injunction must issue to compel the removal of the fence, and an inquiry as to damages be directed.—Ramuz v. Southend Local Board, CH.D. ROM., J.—67 L. T. 169.

2. Repair—Extraordinary traffic—Excessive weight—Power of road authority to recover expenses—Death of person liable—"Actio personalis moritur cum persona"—Highways and Locomotives (Amendment) Act, 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 77), s. 23.—Proceedings under section 23 of the Highways and Locomotives (Amendment) Act, 1878, to recover the amount of extraordinary expenses incurred in the repair of a highway by reason of damage caused by excessive weight passing along the same or extraordinary traffic thereon cannot be maintained against the legal personal representatives of a deceased person by whose order the excessive weight or extraordinary traffic was put upon the road, such proceedings being founded in tort, and the maxim "Actio personalis moritur cum persona" applying.—Story v. Sheard, Q.B.D. 31—[1892] 2 Q. B. 515; 61 L. J. M. C. 178; 67 L. T. 423.

3. Repair—Extraordinary traffic—Unusual purpose—Highways and Locomotives Act, 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 77), s. 23.—The carriage of building materials for the construction of a Government fort over a road in an agricultural district, where the weights are neither individually nor collectively excessive, does not amount to "extraordinary" traffic within section 23 of the Highways and Locomotives Act, 1878, merely because the building of the fort is unusual.—Hill v. Thomas, Q.B.D.—62 L. J. M. C. 89. [Reversed in C.A. Aug. 10, 1893.]

4. Repair—Urban authority—Surveyors of highway—Non-repair—Breach of statutory duty—Liability—Public Health Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), ss. 144, 149.—A highway was by virtue of the Public Health Act, 1875, vested in and under the control of a local board as urban authority. Sections 144 and 149 provide that the urban authority shall have and be subject to all the powers, duties, and liabilities of surveyors of highways, and shall from time to time level, alter, and repair the highways vested in them. An owner of land adjoining the highway in making an approach to his land, without the sanction or authority of the local board, made a drop in the level of the highway and left it in a dangerous condition. The appellant, walking along the highway, fell down the drop and was injured. In an action by him against the local board for allowing the highway to be out of repair and in a dangerous condition, it appeared that the local board were chargeable only with nonfeasance.

Held, that the action would not lie.

5. Surveyor—Limitation of action—Urban authority—Highway Act, 1835 (5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50), ss. 26, 109—Public Health Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), ss. 144, 264.—By section 109 of the Highway Act, 1835, no action shall be commenced against any person for anything done in pursuance of or under the authority of the Act after three months next after the fact committed for which such action is brought. By section 144 of the Public Health Act, 1875, urban authorities (including, by section 6, corporations of boroughs) are made surveyors of highways within their district, and are subject to all the powers, duties, and liabilities of surveyors of highways under the law for the time being in force. By section 264 every action against any local authority for anything done, or intended to be done, or omitted to be done, under the provisions of the Act shall be commenced within six months after the cause of action accrued.

In an action to recover damages for negligence on the part of the defendants as surveyors of highways, Held, that the defendants were entitled to the protection of section 109 of the Highway Act, 1835, and that the action must be commenced within three months after the cause of action accrued.

Taylor v. Meltham Local Board, 47 L. J. C. P. 12, 26 W. R. Dig. 95, and Kay v. Atherton Local Board, 42 J. P. 792, overruled.

6. Trespass—Right of owner of soil of highway—Right of public—Interference with owner's right of shooting.—The defendant was the owner of certain moors across which a public road ran. While the defendant and his friends were engaged in shooting over the moors, the plaintiff went upon the road for the purpose of preventing, and acted so as to prevent, the grouse, which were being driven, from flying across the road towards the place where the defendant and his friends were. The defendant's keepers thereupon seized hold of the plaintiff and held him down upon the road until the drive was over. In an action to recover damages for assault and false imprisonment,

Held, that, as the soil of the road was vested in the defendant as owner of the adjoining land, subject only to the right of the public to pass and repass along it, the plaintiff, not being upon the road in the exercise of the right of way, but for another purpose, was a trespasser.—Harrison v. Duke of Rutland and others, C.A. 322—[1893] 1 Q. B. 142; 62 L. J. Q. B. 117; 68 L. T. 35.

IMPROVEMENT of LAND (IRELAND) ACT:—

Loan from Board of Works—Personal liability of borrower after eviction—10 & 11 Vict. c. 32.—The defendant, being entitled under lease for ever to lands in Ireland, obtained in 1880 from the Board of Works (under 10 & 11 Vict. c. 32 and amending Acts) a loan of £300, secured by an order creating an annual rent-charge payable for a term of thirty-five years. In 1888 the defendant was evicted for non-payment of rent.

Held (Gibson, J., dissenting), that the rent-charge so created was a security merely, and that the defendant was personally liable to repay the amount due upon the advance, the liability under the order being to repay the amount at the periods and by the sums fixed thereby, and that therefore the defendant was liable for the instalments accruing due after the eviction.—Attorney-General v. Fetherstonhaugh, Q.B.D. (Ir.)—30 L. R. Ir. 585.

INCLOSURE ACTS:—

1. Highway—Pasturage—Presumption of ownership—Lord of manor—Annual letting of pasturage by vestry—Long user—Presumption of grant to trustees for parishioners—Churchwardens and overseers—59 Geo. 3, c. 12, s. 17—Enrolment—Charitable Uses Act (9 Geo. 2, c. 36), s. 3—Statute of Limitations.—In pursuance of an Inclosure Act passed in 1774 the commissioners thereby appointed set out a lane as a public way over certain land in the manor of T. Since 1778 this lane had been let by the vestry of the parish every Easter to persons who paid for the hire of it and depastured it. There was no evidence to show to whom the soil of the lane belonged before the passing of the Inclosure Act. Nor was there evidence of any grant thereof at any time to any trustee for the parishioners. The defendant, to whom the lane was so let by the vestry for a year, used it for grazing sheep thereon, though one of the terms of his lease was that he should not turn sheep into it. An action was brought by the lord of the manor of T. asking for a declaration that the soil of the lane belonged to him, and an injunction to restrain the defendant from grazing sheep thereon.

Held (affirming the judgment of Charles, J.), first, that the true presumption was that the soil of the lane was not in the lord of the manor, but, notwithstanding 9 Geo. 2, c. 36, s. 3, and the absence of any enrolled grant, was vested in some persons as trustees for the parishioners, and that, by virtue of 59 Geo. 3, c. 12, s. 17, the churchwardens and overseers of the parish were such trustees; secondly, that apart from all presumptions the parish had gained a title to the lane by the Statute of Limitations, subject to the public right of way; and, thirdly, that the fact that the defendant had broken one of the conditions of his lease by putting sheep into the lane did not entitle the lord of the manor to treat him as a trespasser.—Haigh v. West, C.A.—[1893] 2 Q. B. 19.

2. Norfolk Broad—Allotment—Fen—Injunction—Sporting rights—Public right of way—Tidal waters.—A landowner who claimed to be owner of part of one of the Norfolk Broads, brought an action for an injunction to restrain a person, claiming (inter alia) as one of the public, from shooting or fishing over the plaintiff's part of the broad, and from boating over such part, except within certain limits comprising what was called "the channel." The plaintiff claimed to be owner under an award made in 1808 by commissioners under a local inclosure Act of 1801, and which award purported to allot the part of the broad so claimed to one of his predecessors in title. The defendant impeached the validity of the award, and challenged the claim to ownership on various grounds, alleging (inter alia) that the broad was a tidal water, and therefore Crown property, and open to the public for all purposes.

Held, upon the evidence, that the broad was not tidal, that the defendant's other contentions against the plaintiff's claim to the ownership and exclusive right of shooting and fishing failed, and that an injunction must be granted accordingly; but that the plaintiff had not made out his claim to restrict the public right of way and boating to the so-called "channel."—Micklethwait v. Vincent, CH.D. ROM., J.—67 L. T. 225.

INCOME TAX.—See REVENUE, 1, 2.

INFANT:—

1. Accumulations — Maintenance — Vested gift to infant for life—Conveyancing and Law of Property Act, 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 41), s. 43.—Property comprising, in part, a share of residue, was devised and bequeathed to trustees in trust to pay the income to an infant for life, remainder to such of her children as should attain twenty-one, and in default of such issue, then over. There was no express maintenance or accumulation clause.

The trustees, until the marriage of the infant, made an annual allowance out of the income of the said property for the infant's maintenance and education, and accumulated the balance.

Held, that the infant took a vested interest in the property; and as the income of the property had been expressly given to the infant by the instrument under which the infant's interest arose, that the infant was entitled to the accumulations of income accrued prior to her marriage; and that the case came under sub-section 3 of section 43 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, by which the section is only to apply if and as far as a contrary intention is not expressed in the instrument under which the infant's interest arises.—In re Humphrys, Humphrys v. Levett, C.A. 519—62 L. J. Ch. 498; 68 L. T. 729.

2. Contract for service—Beneficial contract.—An infant, in consideration of being employed as a milk carrier, agreed not to compete in business within a radius of five miles for two years after leaving. He left shortly after attaining majority.

An injunction was granted to restrain breach of the agreement by the servant.—Evans v. Ware, CH.D. NOR., J.—[1892] 3 Ch. 502; 62 L. J. Ch. 256; 67 L. T. 285.

3. Contract not to solicit customers—Majority—Implied new contract—Injunction.—In September, 1886, the defendant agreed to serve the plaintiffs (a firm of law accountants) at a weekly salary of 30s., or such other sum as might be agreed upon, and at the expiration of the agreement not to seek employment from or do work for persons who might at any time up to the expiration of the agreement have employed the plaintiffs. At the time of the execution of the agreement the defendant was a minor. After attaining twenty-one he continued in the plaintiff's service for over four years, and his wages were raised from time to time. He left in April, 1892, and sought and obtained employment from persons who, prior to that date, were customers of the plaintiffs.

Held, that it ought to be inferred from the conduct of the parties that a new contract between them, containing a stipulation by the defendant in the terms of the agreement of September, 1886, not to seek employment or do work for former customers of the plaintiffs, had been entered into after the defendant attained twenty-one, and that an injunction ought to be granted to restrain the breach of such stipulation.—Brown v. Harper, CH.D. STI., J.—68 L. T. 488.

4. Custody of children—Husband and wife—Paternal authority controlled by external considerations.—On the application of a husband against his wife for a writ of habeas corpus in respect of their three children, two of them being above twelve years of age, and, therefore, not within the discretion as to custody given by a local statute framed on the principle of Talfourd's Act, it appeared that the wife had twice left him, taking her children with her, on account of his habitual drunkenness; that on each occasion he agreed that she should maintain and educate the children apart from him; that after the second separation he publicly and falsely alleged on oath against his wife charges so injurious that she could not be expected ever to live with him again; that the wife had ample means, while the husband had only a narrow income.

Held, that the courts below exercised a right discretion in discharging the writ and remanding the children to the custody of their mother.

The father's legal power was controlled, as to the youngest child, by a statute which gave absolute authority to the court; it was materially affected as regards the other two by breach of marital duty, by considerations with respect to their welfare, and the objection to separating them from each other.—Smart v. Smart, P.C.—[1892] A. C. 425; 61 L. J. P. C. 38; 67 L. T. 510.

5. Guardian—Jurisdiction where no property—Religious education—Wishes of deceased father—Welfare of infant—Guardianship of Infants Act, 1886 (49 & 50 Vict. c. 27), ss. 6, 13.—The court has jurisdiction to interfere with and to remove a guardian of a child who has no property, on proof of misconduct of the guardian towards the child, or on proof that it is for the welfare of the child that the guardian should be removed.

But the duty of the court towards a penniless child under the care of a legal guardian who is able and willing to maintain the child is to leave the child alone, unless the court is satisfied that it is for the welfare of the child that some other course should be taken. The welfare of the child—religious, moral, and social, as well as physical and pecuniary—is the paramount consideration for the court.

Notwithstanding the Guardianship of Infants Act, 1886, the wishes of the father, expressed or implied, will be the guide of, and followed by, the court, for the religious education of the child, unless there is very strong reason for disregarding his wishes. Ordinarily, where such wishes are not expressed, the court must infer, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, that the wishes of the father were that his child should be brought up in the religion which the father professed; and that inference practically amounts to a rule of law that a child shall be brought up in the father's religion. But the welfare of the child is the ultimate guide of the court, and where the father has been himself indifferent to religion, and it is not for the welfare of the child that the ordinary rule should be enforced, the court will make an exception, and will not direct the child to be brought up in the religion nominally professed by the father.

Decision of North, J. (40 W. R. 683), affirmed.—In re McGrath, C.A. 97—[1893] 1 Ch. 143; 62 L. J. Ch. 208; 67 L. T. 636.

6. Maintenance—Contingent interest—Intermediate income—Conveyancing Act, 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 41), s. 43.—Infant contingently entitled to a share of residue can be allowed maintenance out of the income thereof until one of them attains a vested interest.

7. Marriage settlement—Repudiation after full age—Reasonable time.—A female infant, upon her marriage in 1857, at the age of eighteen, executed, without the sanction of the court, a settlement of her reversionary interest (subject to a prior tenancy for life) in a share of real estate, upon trust to pay the income to the wife for life for her separate use without power of anticipation, then to the husband for life, then to the children. The husband in 1865 deserted his wife, and in 1869 she obtained a protection order. She had not heard of him since. The reversion fell into possession in 1890, and since then the income had been paid to the wife, but she was entitled to receive that income whether the settlement was binding on her or not. She had done nothing else to confirm the settlement. There were two children of the marriage. In an action for partition of the real estate,

Held, that the wife was still entitled to repudiate the settlement.—In re Jones, Farrington v. Forrester, CH.D. NOR., J.—[1893] 2 Ch. 461; 69 L. T. 45.

INSURANCE (ACCIDENT):—

1. "Injury caused by violent, accidental, external, and visible means"—Dislocation of knee.—By a policy of insurance against accident the defendants agreed to pay the plaintiff compensation if he should sustain "any bodily injury caused by violent, accidental, external, and visible means." The policy contained a proviso that the insurance should not cover injury arising from natural disease or weakness. The plaintiff sustained injury by breaking a ligament in his knee while he was in the act of stooping.

Held, that such injury was covered by the policy.—Hamlyn v. Crown Accident Insurance Co., C.A. 531—[1893] 1 Q. B. 750; 62 L. J. Q. B. 409; 68 L. T. 701.

2. Principal and agent—Knowledge of agent imputed to principal—Misstatement in proposal.—B. effected an insurance with the defendant company through their agent against accidental injury. The proposal for the insurance contained a statement by the assured that he had no physical infirmity, and that there were no circumstances that rendered him peculiarly liable to accidents, and it was agreed that the proposal should form the basis of the contract between him and the company. By the terms of the policy the company agreed to pay the insured £500 on permanent total disablement, and £250 on permanent partial disablement—the policy stating that by permanent total disablement was meant, inter alia, "the complete and irrecoverable loss of sight to both eyes," and by permanent partial disablement was meant, inter alia, "the complete and irrecoverable loss of sight in one eye."

At the time when he signed the proposal for the insurance the assured had lost the sight of one eye, a fact of which the defendants' agent was aware, though he did not communicate it to the defendants.

The assured during the currency of the policy met with an accident which resulted in the complete loss of sight in his other eye, so that he became permanently blind.

Held, that it must be taken, first, that the assured had sustained a complete loss of sight to both eyes within the meaning of the policy; secondly, that the knowledge of the agent was the knowledge of the defendants, and that they were liable on the policy for £500.—Bawden v. The London, Edinburgh, and Glasgow Assurance Co., C.A.—[1892] 2 Q. B. 534; 61 L. J. Q. B. 792.

INSURANCE (FIRE):—

Condition in policy—Lloyd's policy—"To be on same rate, terms, and identical interest" as specified assurance companies, "and to follow their settlements"—Warranty.—The plaintiff effected with the defendant, a Lloyd's underwriter, a policy of fire insurance, containing the following clause:—"Warranted to be on same rate, terms, and identical interest as the U. Assurance Co. £800, and the G. Assurance Co. £700, and to follow their settlements." The rate at which the plaintiff had insured with the U. Co. was not, in fact, the same as the rate specified in the Lloyd's policy.

Held (reversing Wright, J.), that the clause, on its true construction, constituted a stipulation by the plaintiff with the defendant that the plaintiff had insured in the two other companies on the same terms as to risk, the same rate, and identical interest, as was thereby undertaken by Lloyd's underwriters; that such stipulation was one going to the root of the transaction, and therefore a condition precedent to any liability under the Lloyd's policy on the part of the defendant; and, as the condition had not been fulfilled, that the defendant was not liable.

Semble, that the construction of the clause would have been the same, even if the word "warranted" had not been used.—Barnard v. Faber, C.A. 193 —[1893] 1 Q. B. 340; 62 L. J. Q. 159; 68 L. T. 179.

INSURANCE (LIFE):—

Power of nomination—Disposition or charge—Will —Residuary bequest.—Testator effected a policy of insurance upon his life. The rules of the insurance society provided that, in default of any nomination by the assurer, the sum insured should be paid to his assigns under any disposition or charge made by the assurer specifically affecting the said sum, either by express reference thereto or by reference generally to sums due upon assurance, and, in default of any nomination or disposition, the sum should be paid to the assurer's widow if she survived him, and, if not, to his children living at his death. Testator, by his will, gave three-fourths of his residue to his three daughters, and the remaining one-fourth to the widow and children of his deceased son. Testator made no nomination or disposition of the sum unless by the above residuary bequest. Testator's wife predeceased him. Three daughters were living at his death.

Held, that testator had not by his will disposed of the policy-money, and that the contract was legal by which, in the events which happened, the policy-moneys should go to his three daughters.—In re Davies, Davies v. Davies, CH.D. NOR., J. 13—[1892] 3 Ch. 63; 61 L. J. Ch. 595; 67 L. T. 548.

INSURANCE (MARINE):—

1. Chartered freight—Cessation of hire in consequence of working of vessel being delayed for more than twenty-four hours owing to damage occasioned by perils insured against.—By the charter-party of a vessel, the chartered freight of which was insured against (inter alia) "fire," it was provided that the vessel should be hired by the charterer at a stipulated sum per month, and that, in the event of loss of time from collision, stranding, want of repairs, breakdown of machinery, or any cause appertaining to the duties of the owner, preventing the working of the vessel for more than twenty-four hours, the payment of hire should cease from the hour when detention began until the ship should be again in a sufficient state to resume her service.

During the continuation of the charter-party, and at a time when the chartered freight was covered by the policy, the vessel was damaged by fire to such an extent as necessitated her being repaired. During the time the repairs were being done—for more than twenty-four hours—the hire of the vessel "ceased" within the meaning of the charter-party, and a loss of chartered freight, amounting to £179 6s. 6d., thereby accrued to the shipowner. In an action by the shipowner on the policy to recover from the underwriters the portion of this amount for which they were liable, Held, that there had been a loss of chartered freight by the perils assured against, and that the plaintiffs were entitled to judgment.—The Alpe, P.D. & A.D. 527—[1893] P. 109; 62 L. J. P. D. & A. 59; 68 L. T. 624.

1a. Chartered freight—General average—Foreign statement clause.—The plaintiffs, who were owners of a ship chartered to proceed to a port in the United States, as ordered at port of call, and there load a cargo for the United Kingdom or Continent, and deliver the same, effected with the defendants an insurance on "chartered homeward freight," the voyage being described in the policy as from Liverpool to Delaware breakwater, and thence to New York or one other named port, and thence to any port in the United Kingdom or Continent within named limits, and general average was to be payable "as per foreign statement if required." The plaintiffs' ship left Liverpool in ballast, under the above charter, and two days afterwards, in consequence of heavy weather causing her tanks to leak, put into Holyhead without incurring expense in so doing; but at that place some expense was incurred, and three days later she returned to Liverpool, where further expenses were incurred in repairs, but none of the items of expenditure at Holyhead or Liverpool were incurred for the preservation of ship and freight. The ship then sailed for Delaware breakwater, where she received orders for Baltimore, to which port she proceeded, and there loaded, under the charter, a cargo which she delivered at Barrow. By an average statement, prepared in London according to the alleged provisions of American law, general average charges in respect of the expenses incurred in Holyhead and Liverpool were shown amounting to £186, including a sum of £154 for wages and victualling of the crew whilst the ship was at Holyhead and Liverpool. By the statement the ship was made to bear £164 of these charges, and the chartered freight was made to bear £21. In respect of the defendants' proportion (£11) of this latter sum the plaintiffs brought their action, alleging that a general average loss had arisen, which had been properly adjusted according to American law, and that the plaintiffs must be treated as having contributed to the loss on the basis of the statement.

Held, that, as the ship was under charter bound in ballast to load for the return voyage, and the only persons interested in the ship and chartered freight were the shipowners, the expenses in question were not a general average loss for which the defendants could be liable under the policy on chartered homeward freight, and, as there was no necessity for any foreign adjustment, the "foreign statement" clause had no effect.—The Brigella, P.D. & A.D.—[1893] P. 189.

2. Voyage — Risk — Distinction between insured voyage and risks insured—Deviation clause.—In construing an open policy of marine insurance in order to ascertain what risks are covered by the policy, it must first be ascertained what the voyage insured is. If the goods lost never were upon the insured voyage, then the policy never attached; and the fact that the policy contains a deviation clause is immaterial.

Consignors, at Bradford, of the goods in question, effected, through their agents at Liverpool, a marine policy of insurance from the Mersey to any port in Portugal or Spain "this side Gibraltar, and (or) at and from thence to any place in the interior, including all risks by any conveyance whatsoever from the time of leaving the warehouse in the United Kingdom until on board . . . and all risks of every kind until safely delivered at the warehouse of the consignees." The policy contained the following marginal clause:—"Deviation and (or) change of voyage . . . not included in the policy, to be held covered at a premium to be arranged." The consignees were merchants at Madrid, and the consignors intended that the goods should be shipped at Liverpool for Seville and carried thence by land to Madrid. By the blunder of the consignors' agents the goods were in fact declared and shipped at Liverpool on board a vessel bound only for Carril and Huelva, on the west coast of Spain, and for Carthagena and other ports on the east coast of Spain. The bills of lading of the goods in question were made out for Carthagena. The consignors only discovered the mistake after the vessel had sailed. The vessel was lost between Liverpool and Carril, a part of the voyage common to vessels bound either for the west or the east coast of Spain.

Held, that the goods in question never were upon the insured voyage; that, consequently, the policy never attached; and that the underwriters were not liable to pay the consignors the amount of the goods in question.—Simon & Co. v. Sedgwick, C.A. 163—[1893] 1 Q. B. 303; 62 L. J. Q. B. 163; 67 L. T. 785.

3. Warranty—Stranding—Liability of insurer—Goods insured in ship and in craft—Valuation stated—"Included" advance on freight.—By a policy of insurance certain maize was insured, as to part, from San Nicolas, and, as to the remainder, from Buenos Ayres, for a voyage to the United Kingdom, free from particular average unless the ship or craft should be stranded, sunk, or burned.

The policy included all risks of steam navigation, and in craft, transhipment, or while waiting transit. The maize was valued in the policy at £7,940 "(included £1,361 6s. 6d. for advance on freight)." Between San Nicolas and Buenos Ayres the ship stranded, and a portion of the cargo was discharged into lighters, and part was wetted, and part lost. The ship got off, and at Buenos Ayres was surveyed, and was admitted by both parties to be seaworthy to continue her voyage, and thereupon the discharged cargo was reshipped, together with the Buenos Ayres portion of the maize, which had been awaiting the ship in lighters. On the voyage to Europe a large part of the cargo was lost and the remainder damaged owing to perils of the seas. In an action raising the question as to the amount of damage recoverable by the assured under the policy,

Held, that, the stranding having occurred before the Buenos Ayres portion of the maize was on board, the assured were not entitled to recover for particular average loss in respect of it, but only in respect of the maize shipped at San Nicolas.

Held, also, that the assured were entitled to have the particular average loss calculated on the valuation stated in the policy, without deduction of the amount of the freight advanced.—Thames and Mersey Marine Insurance Co. v. Pitt, Son, & King, Q.B.D. 346—[1893] 1 Q. B. 476; 68 L. T. 524.

4. Warranty—Stranding—"Free from particular average unless the ship be stranded"—Cargo not on board at time of stranding.—The plaintiffs effected with the defendants an insurance on some rice on a voyage from Calcutta to Demerara or Barbadoes in a named ship. By the policy the rice was warranted free from average, unless general or the ship be stranded, and there was a special memorandum by which the rice was "warranted free from particular average unless the ship be stranded." The ship, which was chartered by the plaintiffs, was of French nationality. She encountered heavy weather, obliging her master to jettison some of the rice, and subsequently to put into the Mauritius for repairs. To effect these repairs the cargo was discharged, and part of it, including some of the rice in question, being damaged, was condemned as unfit to be forwarded and was sold. Whilst the ship was being repaired and whilst the whole of the cargo was on shore, a cyclone burst over the island, during which the ship stranded, and was abandoned. The remainder of her cargo was subsequently shipped on a British vessel, and after a portion of it, including some of the rice in question, had been damaged by sea perils on the voyage, it was finally delivered at Barbadoes. The defendants paid their proportion of general average loss and forwarding charges, but disputed the plaintiff's claim for particular average loss on the rice sold at Mauritius and on that damaged in the British vessel.

Held, that the defendants were not liable, as the stranding took place when the insured goods were not on board the ship, and therefore the warranty against particular average remained in force.—The Alsace Lorraine, P.D. & A.D.—[1893] P. 209.

5. Warranty—"Free from average under three per cent., unless general or the ship be burnt"—Meaning of "burnt" in memorandum of policy.—Where a ship has sustained damage by reason of fire, she is not "burnt" within the meaning of the memorandum in a marine insurance policy unless the injury resulting from the fire is sufficient to cause some interruption of the voyage so that the ship is thereby temporarily unnavigable, that is, for the time incapable of being properly used for the purposes of her voyage.—The Glenlivet, P.D. & A.D. 671—[1893] P. 164; 62 L. J. P. D. & A. 65; 68 L. T. 860.

INTEREST:—

Legacy—Interest on legacy—Infant executor.—Testatrix by her will appointed an infant one of her executors, and gave to him, as such executor, a legacy of £1,000.

Held, that the legacy would not carry interest until the infant should attain twenty-one years and agree to act as executor.—In re Gardner, Long v. Gardner, CH.D. NOR., J. 203—67 L. T. 552.

INTERNATIONAL LAW:—

International law—Penal and private actions—Foreign judgment.—No proceeding which has for its object the enforcement by the State of punishment for breaches of its laws will be enforced by a foreign tribunal when the penalties attached to them are recoverable at the instance of the State, or of a member of the public as a common informer; but it is otherwise where an individual as such has a remedy for an infraction of the municipal law. It is, moreover, the duty of the tribunal, when a penalty of this nature is sought to be enforced through its instrumentality, to decide whether the foreign judgment which imposes the fine or other obligation is or is not penal in the sense of international law above stated.—Huntington v. Antrill, P.C. 574—[1893] A. C. 150; 62 L. J. P. C. 44; 68 L. T. 326.

IRISH CHURCH ACT, 1869:—

Register of marriages—Return to Registrar-General—Duty of rector to make.—A clergyman of the Church of Ireland is bound to fulfil the duty (imposed by

JAMAICA, LAW of:—

Yearly or half-yearly bonds—Accounts.—Where, by agreement between the appellant company and the local Government, second mortgage bonds were to be issued with the interest (non-cumulative) dependent on the yearly earnings; then, by a law passed to give effect thereto, the bonds were treated as half-yearly bonds with interest contingent on half-yearly profits; then bonds were issued in terms of the agreement and not of the law; and then, by a certificate of the local Government, the bonds were erroneously certified to be according to the law.

Held, in a suit by the holders of the said bonds to expunge certain items debited against the half-year's income to the prejudice of the claim for half-yearly interest, that, reading the agreement and the law together, the intention was that the account should be taken at the end of each year, and not upon the footing that there was to be a rest at the end of ever half-year.

Held, further, that costs of issuing the bonds could not be charged against income to the prejudice of their holders; and that, with regard to the expenditure on stores, the amount chargeable to any one year must be regulated by what is fair in the interest of all concerned.—Jamaica Railway Co. v. Attorney-General of Jamaica, P.C.—[1893] A. C. 127.

JERSEY, LAW of:—

Alienation in mortmain of seigneurial lands—Rights of seigneur—Indemnity.—Where land in Jersey held of the Queen as lady of the seigneurie thereof is brought into mortmain, held that the purchaser is bound to pay to the Crown the indemnity due by law in respect of the consequent loss or diminution in value of the seigneurial rights. But the Crown is not also entitled by the custom of the island to preserve its seigneurial rights by interposing a nominal vassal called "homme vivant mourant et confisquant" between itself and the holders in mortmain in order to pay duties and service in respect of the property.

To ascertain the amount of indemnity, the court should not refer it generally to experts, but should itself fix the percentage to be paid by the purchasers, and refer it to experts to ascertain the true value of the property.—Attorney-General and Receiver-General for Jersey v. Turner (Solicitor-General for Jersey), P.C.—[1893] A. C. 326.

JUDICIAL SEPARATION.—See DIVORCE, 9, 10.

JUSTICES:—

1. Appeal—Appeal to quarter sessions on ground of excessive punishment—Respondent not appearing—Jurisdiction of justices to quash conviction.—A person was convicted and sentenced by a magistrate for ill-treating a horse. Upon his appealing in due form to the court of quarter sessions upon the ground only of excessive punishment, the prosecutor failed to appear, and the justices quashed the conviction altogether.

Held, that, since the prosecutor failed in his duty to adduce evidence upon the appeal in order to justify the sentence, the justices had no materials before them to enable them to decide that any punishment was proper, and that they were bound to quash the sentence; and that, as, upon the authority of R. v. Vipont, 2 Burr. 1163, a conviction without a sentence was bad, the justices had jurisdiction to quash the whole conviction.—Reg. v. Justices of Surrey, Q.B.D. 79—[1892] 2 Q. B. 719; 61 L. J. M. C. 200; 67 L. T. 266.

2. Appeal—Notice of appeal—Serve upon solicitor who had appeared for respondent at petty sessions—Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879 (42 & 43 Vict. c. 49), s. 31.—The appellant, against whom a bastardy order had been made at petty sessions, served notice of appeal to quarter sessions upon the solicitor who had been retained to appear for the respondent at petty sessions, and the solicitor accepted service on her behalf. The quarter sessions declined to hear the appeal, upon the ground that the service of the notice of appeal was bad.

Held, affirming the decision of the Queen's Bench Division, that the solicitor upon whom the notice of appeal was served had ceased to be the respondent's solicitor when the proceedings at petty sessions had determined, and that the service was bad.—Reg. v. Justices of Oxfordshire, C.A. 615—[1893] 2 Q. B. 149.

3. Assault—Complaint by or on behalf of party aggrieved—Conviction—24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 42—25 & 26 Vict. c. 50, s. 9.—A police officer who appears as complainant on a charge of assault at petty sessions is not a party acting on behalf of the person aggrieved within the meaning of 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 42.

A complaint by or on behalf of a person aggrieved by a common assault, or affirmative evidence that the aggrieved person has declined or refused to prefer a complaint, is necessary to found the jurisdiction of justices at petty sessions to summarily convict an offender under 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 42, and 25 & 26 Vict. c. 50, s. 9.—Reg. v. Justices of Wicklow, Q.B.D. (Ir.)—30 L. R. Ir. 633.

4. Case stated—Justices acting under private Act—"Court of summary jurisdiction"—Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879 (42 & 43 Vict. c. 49), s. 33—Inter- pretation Act, 1889 (52 & 53 Vict. c. 63), s. 13, sub-section 11—Construction of private Act enlarging the ambit of a borough.—By a private Act of 1845 (8 & 9 Vict. c. vi.) provisions were made for the benefit of the freemen of the borough of Leicester, and certain lands were vested in "deputies" in trust for the freemen, to whom they were to be let out in allotments.

An appeal was given by the Act from the decision of the deputies to the justices of the peace for the borough, whose decision was to be "final and conclusive upon all parties concerned, and not to be removable by certiorari or any other writ or process whatsoever into any of Her Majesty's courts of record."

By the Leicester Extension Act, 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. c.), the limits of the borough were extended, and certain adjoining parishes and places, in the Act called "the added area," were taken in. The respondent, a freeman of the borough, but resident in this "added area," made application for an allotment, which was refused by the deputies on the ground that he was not resident in the borough within the Act of 1845. This decision was reversed on appeal to the justices, who stated a case for the opinion of the High Court, on the hearing of which it was Held, (1) that the justices were sitting as a court of summary jurisdiction, within the meaning of section 13, sub-section 11, of the Interpretation Act, 1889 (52 & 53 Vict. c. 63), and that section 33 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879 (42 & 43 Vict. c. 49), conferring on any person aggrieved the right to appeal by special case, applied to this case, notwithstanding the express provision of the private Act; and (2) that the effect of enlarging the ambit of the borough was to increase the number of freemen to be benefited by the Act of 1845, and that the respondent, as a freeman resident within the "added area," was entitled to the allotment for which he had applied.—Deputies of the Freemen of the Borough of Leicester v. Lewitt, Q.B.D.—62 L. J. M. C. 51; 68 L. T. 201.

5. Case stated—Vagrancy—"Behaving in riotous or indecent manner"—Acquittal by quarter sessions—Right of appeal to High Court by case stated—Question of fact—Vagrant Act (5 Geo. 4, c. 83), s. 3.—Section 3 of the Vagrant Act (5 Geo. 4, c. 83) enables a justice of the peace to impose a term of imprisonment upon (amongst others) every common prostitute wandering in the public streets and "behaving in a riotous or indecent manner."

Held, that the question whether a person has been guilty of behaving in a riotous or indecent manner within the meaning of this section is a question of fact for the justice or justices to determine, and from such determination no appeal lies to the High Court by case stated.—Bonner v. Lushington, Q.B.D.—68 L. T. 91.

6. Conviction—Following a person with a view to compel him to abstain from doing acts which he has a legal right to do—Defective statement of offence in summons and conviction—Certiorari—Conspiracy and Protection of Property Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 86), s. 7—Bias of justices—Remote interest.—A summons and conviction under section 7 of the Conspiracy and Protection of Property Act, 1875, for following a person with a view to compel him to abstain from doing any act which he has a legal right to do, ought to state what was the act which the defendant, by following the informant, endeavoured to compel him to abstain from doing.

A conviction which did not contain such a statement held to be bad, and an amendment refused, it not appearing that evidence was given at the trial before the justices as to what was the act which the informant was prevented by the conduct of the defendant from doing.—Reg. v. Mackenzie and others, Q.B.D. 144—[1892] 2 Q. B. 519; 61 L. J. M. C. 181; 67 L. T. 201.

LAND SOCIETY:—

Rules—Construction.—A land society was formed for the purchase of an estate to be sold in lots to the members, each of whom covenanted to abide by the rules of the society. The estate was purchased by trustees for the society, and the purchase-money was secured by mortgages, on which the trustees were liable. The estate was divided into numbered allotments, and a price set opposite each number to be paid by monthly instalments, and such allotments were to be allotted at that price unless previously sold by auction. By rule 35 members were required, in addition to the price of their allotments, to pay a proportionate part of the price, expenses, and interest payable in respect of allotments held from time to time by the trustees. The rules further provided for the forfeiture of allotments in case of default, and declared that the rights of the defaulting member in respect of such allotments should absolutely cease; they empowered the trustees to sell such forfeited allotments, and required them in the event of a sale, after deducting all moneys payable under the rules by the defaulting member, to pay him the surplus of the proceeds.

Held, that unallotted and forfeited allotments were allotments held from time to time by the trustees within rule 35, and that members were liable for contributions in respect thereof.—Hill v. Crank, C.A.—62 L. J. Q. B. 145; 68 L. T. 551.

LANDED ESTATES COURT (IRELAND):—

1. Conversion—Petition for sale by owner—Married woman—Incumbered and unincumbered estate.—Upon the petition for sale of an unincumbered estate by a feme coverte owner a conversion of realty into personalty is not worked by (a) the presentation of the petition, (b) the consent of the feme coverte under rule 12, or (c) a conditional order for sale where the feme coverte dies before the order is made absolute, nothwithstanding that an actual sale is subsequently had on the petition. For such purpose the absolute order for sale does not relate back to the conditional order.

An absolute order for sale made on the petition of the owner of an incumbered estate works a conversion when from the circumstances of the estate (e.g., a small fee-farm rent) it must be assumed that the petitioning owner intended the whole estate to be sold.

2. Practice—Petition for sale by incumbrancer—Persons wrongly described as owners—Landed Estates Court (Ireland) Act, 1858 (21 & 22 Vict. c. 72), s. 1.—A. appointed two persons trustees of his will, and D. executrix thereof. He thereby devised certain lands to the trustees upon trust to permit D. to receive the rents and profits thereof during her life, and after her decease to them "absolutely to sell and dispose of the same at their discretion." He also appointed D. residuary devisee and legatee. One of the trustees died before the testator, and the other disclaimed the trust. D. survived and appointed by her will E. and F. as her executors. After D.'s death an action was brought in the Chancery Division to administer the estate of A. An incumbrancer filed a petition in the Land Judge's Court for the sale of the lands so devised, naming therein E. and F. as owners. On motion to dismiss the petition as against E. and F.,

Held, that E. and F. were neither trustees for sale nor owners within the meaning of section 1 of the Landed Estates Court (Ireland) Act, 1858.

Semble, the course for the incumbrancer to adopt would be to apply in the administration action for the appointment of new trustees of the will of A.—In re Weir's Estate, L.J. (Ir.)—29 L. R. Ir. 381.

3. Practice—Receiver over tenant's interest—Application by landlord for leave to commence action to recover possession for non-payment of rent—Jurisdiction to impose terms — Disobedience — Contempt of court.—Where a receiver has been appointed over lands held at a rent, the landlord must obtain the leave of the court before he can commence an action to recover possession for non-payment of rent; and in granting such application the court has jurisdiction to impose terms, such as that the proceedings shall not be commenced for a specified time.

In disposing of such applications the court will be slow to interfere with the rights of the landlord, and will only impose conditions when necessary for the benefit of the estate for sale, and not likely to occasion the landlord appreciable injury.

The disobedience of an order, even though improvidently made, is a contempt of court.—In re Battersby's Estate, L.J. (Ir.)—31 L. R. Ir. 73.

4. Sale—Tithe rent-charge—Rental and conditions—Compensation.—Notwithstanding the gradual extinction of tithe rent-charge since the Irish Church Act, 1869, the court, adhering to the practice uniformly followed since the decision in In re Barnewall's Estate, Ir. R. 1 Eq. 304, declined to give compensation to a purchaser at a sale in May, 1890, on a rental published in 1889 for tithe rent-charge, of which no mention was made in the rental or conditions of sale, and of the existence of which the purchaser was ignorant when purchasing. In future, where sales take place on rentals in which the particulars of tithe rent-charge are not specifically stated, and where the purchaser is not, by such rental, debarred from claiming compensation, the court will entertain a claim for compensation by the purchaser in respect of tithe rent-charge unknown to him at the date of his purchase. In re Bailie's Estate, L.J. (Ir.)—31 L. R. Ir. 98.

5. Sale at a sacrifice—Jurisdiction to postpone sale—Right to have estate offered for sale.—Although the court, in analogy to its undoubted power to refuse to sell at a sacrifice, has jurisdiction to postpone offering an incumbered estate for sale, such jurisdiction should be only exercised under very peculiar circumstances, and in general the court will recognize the right of an incumbrancer to insist upon having the property put up at least once to public competition, unless the owner or incumbrancers, disapproving of an attempted sale, are willing to pay him off.

Semble, a judgment for administration before the filing of a petition is not in itself sufficient cause against a conditional order for sale.—In re Irvine's Estate, L.J. (Ir.)—31 L. R. Ir. 168.

6. Sale of hotel and restaurant in possession of receiver—Delay in completing purchase—Premises vacant—Duties as to preservation of licence—Compensation.—Premises, including an hotel and restaurant, were sold in July, 1891, the particulars stating that a retail spirit licence was attached, that the premises were in the possession of a receiver, and that the licence would be handed to the purchaser. The purchase-money was not lodged till March, 1892, and the conveyance was not taken out till May, 1892. The purchasers in the meantime failed to let the hotel and restaurant, which remained vacant. The receiver informed the purchasers that he had no funds to pay the duty for the licence at the October sessions, 1891, but offered to advance it, if necessary, to keep the licence alive. In consequence, however, of a statement by the local officer of Inland Revenue that it would be time enough to pay the duty when a tenant was obtained, it was not paid in October, and no renewal was obtained. An application by the purchasers for a new licence in September, 1892, was refused, on the ground that the premises still remained unoccupied.

Held, that there was no failure of duty on the part of the receiver, and that the purchasers could not sustain a claim for compensation for the loss of the licence.

Semble, either on making a letting to a suitable tenant, or undertaking to carry on the business themselves, the purchasers would be entitled to obtain a licence.—In re Hoy's Estate, L.J. (Ir.)—31 L. R. Ir. 66.

LANDLORD and TENANT:—

1. Agreement for lease—"Usual" covenants—Public-house—Covenant against assignment without consent—Proviso for re-entry—Date of commencement of term—Parol evidence—Option to renew—Specific performance—Vendor and Purchaser Act, 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 78), s. 9.—An agreement for the lease of a public-house, dated the 1st of April, provided for a term of three years, with an option to renew for another seven years, and for possession to be given, "within one month from this date," but contained no reference as to the covenants to be inserted in the lease. The lessor insisted upon covenants by the lessee (1) to reside on the premises and personally conduct the business; (2) not to assign without consent, and that the proviso for re-entry should extend to the breach of any covenant. The lessee objected that these were not "usual" clauses.

Held, that covenants (1) and (2) could not be insisted upon as usual covenants; and on this point the fact that the subject-matter of the lease was a public-house made no difference, and that the proviso for re-entry must be limited to the case of non-payment of rent.

Henderson v. Hay, 3 Bro. C. C. 632, followed.

Held, also, that the commencement of the term could be collected from the agreement as a whole, and that the day possession was given—a fact on which evidence was admitted—was the date from which the lease was to commence, and consequently that there was a valid contract.

Marshall v. Berridge, 19 Ch. D. 233, discussed and applied.

Where, on a summons under the Vendor and Purchaser Act, 1874, objection is taken that the contract, if valid, is not one of which specific performance can be obtained, the court will express an opinion upon the construction of the contract, and will decide any question raised at the hearing of the summons which, if left undecided, could be raised again in an action for damages.

Quære, whether there is any difference between a lease for three years, with an option to renew for another seven years, and a lease for ten years, with an option to determine at the end of the first three. —In re Lander and Bagley's Contract, CH.D. CHI., J. —[1892] 3 Ch. 41; 61 L. J. Ch. 707; 67 L. T. 521.

2. Covenant not to assign without consent—Breach —Measure of damages.—A lease contained a covenant that the lessee would not assign or sublet the premises without the consent in writing of the lessor, such consent not to be unreasonably withheld to a responsible assignee or sub-tenant. The lessee, without asking the lessor's consent, sublet the premises to a person who, he knew, was going to use them as a distillery. The premises were burnt down by a fire arising from the use of the premises as a distillery. In an action for breach of covenant.

Held, that the loss caused by the fire was the natural consequence of the breach, and was recoverable as damages in the action.—Lepla v. Rogers, Q.B.D.—[1893] 1 Q. B. 31; 68 L. T. 584.

3. Covenant to pay charges—Nuisance arising from condition of drains—"Charges charged on the lessor in respect of the premises"—Public Health (London) Act, 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 76).—In the lease of a house by the plaintiff to the defendant, the defendant covenanted to "pay, bear, and discharge all land tax, sewers rate, main drainage rate, and all other rates, taxes, assessments, charges, or impositions whatever, parliamentary, parochial, or otherwise, which now are, or at any time during the continuance of this demise may be, taxed, charged, assessed, or imposed upon the said demised premises or any part thereof, or on the said yearly rent hereby reserved, or any part thereof, or on the lessor, his executors, administrators, and assigns for or in respect of the said premises."

The plaintiff, having incurred expenses under the Public Health (London) Act, 1891, in remedying a nuisance arising from an escape of sewer gas from the drains of the house into the basement, brought an action against the defendant to recover these expenses from him under the foregoing covenant.

Held, that the action was maintainable.—Smith v. Robinson, Q.B.D. 588—[1893] 2 Q. B. 53.

4. Covenant to repair—Breach of covenants to keep premises in repair and deliver up in repair—Actions by landlord during continuance of term and at end of term—Method of assessing damages in second action.—Two years before the determination of a lease a landlord brought an action against his tenant for breach of covenant to keep the premises in repair. The tenant denied liability, but paid a sum into court, which the landlord accepted in satisfaction of his claim, and the action was stayed. After the determination of the lease the landlord brought another action for breach of covenant to keep the premises in repair and for breach of covenant to deliver up in repair. No repairs were done to the premises between the date of the first action and the end of the lease, and the particulars in the second action included all matters which had been claimed for in the first action as well as some additional items of non-repair. The official referee, in assessing the damages, ascertained what sum was required to put the premises into repair, from which he deducted the sum paid into court and accepted in the first action, and gave judgment for the plaintiff for the balance.

Held, that the official referee had assessed the damages in the right manner.—Henderson v. Thorn, Q.B.D. 509—[1893] 2 Q. B. 164.

5. Covenant to repair—Defects due to age and character of demised premises.—In determining whether there has been a breach of a covenant to repair, regard must be had to the age and character of the demised premises; and if the premises through their own inherent defects fall in the course of time into a particular condition, the results of their being in that condition are not breaches of a covenant to repair.—Lister v. Lane & Nesham, C.A. 626—[1893] 2 Q. B. 212.

6. Distress—Breaking open outer door—Main door of warehouse within demised premises—Right of distrainer being lawfully within demised premises to break door of warehouse.—A landlord's broker entered upon demised premises to distrain for rent. Being already peaceably and lawfully in a courtyard which formed part of the demised premises, he then broke the main and outer door of a warehouse abutting on the courtyard, also part of the demised premises, and there distrained upon certain goods. In an action by the plaintiff, who was the tenant and occupier of the courtyard and warehouse, for trespass for breaking the door of the warehouse,

Held (by Bowen, L.J.), and affirmed by the Court of Appeal, that the door of the warehouse was an "outer door" within the meaning of the principle that outer doors may not be broken, and that the fact that the broker was already lawfully within the demised premises did not give him the right to break open the door of the warehouse.—American Concentrated Must Co. v. Hendry, C.A.—62 L. J. Q. B. 388; 68 L. T. 742.

7. Distress—Rent payable in advance if required—Reasonable notice of demand.—The effect of the words "rent payable quarterly, and always, if required, a quarter in advance," in an agreement of tenancy is to make the rent payable a quarter in advance throughout, and the landlord is entitled to payment, or, in default, to distrain for the rent of the current quarter at any time during the currency of the quarter on giving reasonable notice of his demand. The question of the reasonableness of the notice is one of fact, and must depend upon the particular circumstances of the case.—London and Westminster Loan Co. v. London and North-Western Railway Co., Q.B.D. 670—[1893] 2 Q. B. 49; 62 L. J. Q. B. 370

8. Distress—Want of title in lessor—Estoppel—Right to distrain goods of stranger.—Although a tenant who has been let into possession of land by a lessor is estopped from disputing his lessor's title, third persons, not claiming possession of the land under the tenant, are not so estopped.

A person, therefore, who lets premises to which he has no title to a tenant cannot distrain for arrears of rent due from the tenant the goods of a third person which have been brought upon the premises by the tenant's licence.—Tadman v. Henman, Q.B.D. —[1893] 2 Q. B. 168.

9. Forfeiture—Breach of covenant—Notice to remedy breach—Compensation—Application for relief —Originating summons—Conveyancing and Law of Property Act, 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 41), s. 14, sub-sections 1, 2.—An application by a lessee, under section 14, sub-section 2, of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, for relief against forfeiture by reason of a breach of covenant cannot be made by originating summons. If must be made either in the lessor's action to enforce the forfeiture, or in an action brought by the lessee.

A notice by the lessor under section 14, sub-section 1, specifying the breach complained of, and requiring the lessee to remedy it, is not invalid because it does not contain a claim for compensation in money for the breach.

10. Forfeiture—Relief against forfeiture after judgment in ejectment action—Application by mortgagee by sub-demise—Parties—Original lessee—23 & 24 Vict. c. 126 (Common Law Procedure Act, 1860), s. 1.—In an application under section 1 of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1860, made (after judgment in an action of ejectment for non-payment of rent) by a mortgagee of land by sub-demise, for relief against forfeiture of the lease, the original lessee must be made a party to the proceedings.

Semble (per Collins, J.), that such an application may be made by an underlessee.

11. Forfeiture—Relief against forfeiture—Bankruptcy of lessee—Application by underlessee for vesting order—Mode of application—Defence and counterclaim in lessor's action of ejectment—Conveyancing and Law of Property Acts, 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 41), ss. 14, 69, and 1892 (55 & 56 Vict. c. 13), ss. 2, 4.—Where a lessor has brought an action against the lessee and his underlessees claiming possession of the demised premises under a proviso for re-entry upon the bankruptcy of the lessee, it is competent for the underlessees to set up by way of defence and counterclaim in that action a claim for an order vesting in them the property in question for the remainder of their lease under section 4 of the Conveyancing and Law of Property Act, 1892. It is not necessary that the application for such an order should be made by summons at chambers.—Warden and Governors of Highgate School v. Sewell, Q.B.D. 637—[1893] 2 Q. B. 254.

12. Holding over—Lease for a year—Tenant remaining in possession at end of year—Consent—Tenant from year to year—Terms of original lease—Implication of law.—Where, on the expiration of a lease for a year, the tenant remains in possession with the consent of the landlord, and nothing is said or done inconsistent with his holding on under the terms of the lease, the implication of law is that a tenancy from year to year has been created on the same terms in so far as they are not inconsistent with a tenancy from year to year.—Dougal v. McCarthy, C.A. 484—[1893] 1 Q. B. 736; 68 L. T. 512.

13. Notice to determine tenancy—Surrender by operation of law—Settled Estates Act, 1877 (40 & 41 Vict. c. 18), s. 56—Settled Land Act, 1882—Licence of lord.—A testator, being entitled to a customary freehold held of a manor, according to the custom of which tenants could not grant leases longer than a year and a day without the licence of the lord, devised the tenement by will to trustees upon trust for his widow for life, with remainder to his son. The testator died in December, 1877, having on the 15th of June, 1877, with the licence of the lord, let the premises in question to the two defendants, T. P. and T. S. P., on a repairing lease for twenty-one years from the 25th of December, 1876, at a yearly rent of £130, determinable at the end of fourteen years by one year's notice to the lessor, his representatives or assigns, expiring with that year.

On the 21st of December, 1889, T. S. P., one of the defendants, gave the testator's widow, who had been permitted by the trustees to receive the rents directly, notice of the defendant's intention to quit the premises on the 25th of December, 1890; and on the 13th of August, 1890, the widow purported to lease the premises for a term of seven years to the defendants, but without the licence of the lord, at a rent of £100, and with less onerous covenants. The widow died, and the trustees of the will brought this action, claiming that the original lease of the 15th of June, 1877, had never been duly determined, and that the new lease of the 13th of August, 1890, was inoperative.

Held, that the notice of the 21st of December, 1889, was bad, not having been served on the "representatives or assigns" of the lessor, and that the widow, the life tenant, had not in any way been constituted the agent of the trustees to receive such notice.

Held, also, that there had been no surrender of the old lease by operation of law by the purported grant of the new lease, the rule as to surrender not applying where the new lease is void or voidable; and that neither the Settled Estates Act, 1877, nor the Settled Land Act, 1882, applied, as no trustees had been appointed to perfect the transaction under the latter Act; and, lastly, that, in any event, section 56 of the Settled Estates Act rendered necessary the licence of the lord to the grant of a new lease.—Easton v. Penny, CH.D. ROM., J. 72—67 L. T. 290.

13a. Receipt for consideration moneys—Lease—Conveyancing Act, 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 41), s. 55.—A building lease was expressed to be granted "in consideration of the moneys which have been expended by the lessee in construction of the dwelling-house and erections hereby demised, and in consideration of the rent hereinafter reserved, and the covenants by the lessee hereinafter contained." The plaintiff contended that there was a sufficient receipt in the body of the lease to entitle him to the benefit of section 55 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881.

Held, that to constitute a receipt in the body of a deed within the meaning of section 55, after the statement of consideration, express words acknowledging the receipt of such consideration were necessary; that the lease did not contain such a receipt; and that, therefore, the plaintiff was not entitled to rely on the section.—Renner v. Tolley, CH.D. STI., J.—68 L. T. 815.

14. Sub-lease—Right of sub-lessee to inspect lessee's title Conveyancing and Law of Property Act, 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 41), ss. 3 (1), 13 (1).—On the grant of a sub-lease by a lessee, the intending sub-lessee has a right to inspect the lessee's lease.—Gosling v. Woolf, Q.B.D. 106—[1893] 1 Q. B. 39; 68 L. T. 39.

15. Surrender by act and operation of law—Change of possession—Statute of Frauds (29 Car. 2, c. 3), s. 3—Covenant for quiet enjoyment—Interesse termini—Action for damages.—There is no surrender by operation of law of a lease in possession on the grant of a new lease purporting to be a lease in possession, unless the old tenant gives up possession to the new tenant at or about the time of the grant of the new lease to which he assents.

The foundation of the doctrine that the acceptance of a new lease by an existing tenant operates as a surrender in law is estoppel by act in pais. The grant of a new lease to a stranger, with the tenant's assent, and change of possession preceding or following the lease, brings such a case within the scope of the same doctrine.

Secus, where there is mere oral assent of the tenant and no change of possession.

An interesse termini is not an interest that will support an action on a covenant for quiet enjoyment in a lease, the essence of a breach of such a covenant being a disturbance of the lessee's possession, nor will it support an action for trespass or for damages.

1. Assignment of lease—Clause against assigning—Executor—Rules of the Supreme Court (Ireland), 1891, ord. 3, r. 4.—A lease contained a clause rendering it unlawful for the lessee to assign, sublet, dispose of, or part with the possession of the demised premises, or any part thereof, during the term, or to devise or bequeath the same other than to two of his children without the previous licence or consent in writing of the lessor.

Held, that an assignment by deed to a child of the lessee without the consent of the lessor was void.

Held, that the lessee was not entitled to deduct half grand jury cess.

A lessee entitled to make such a deduction, if he voluntarily pays gales of rent without doing so, cannot deduct the half of the grand jury cess paid during the accrual of such gales from rent afterwards becoming due.

An owner, who had been in occupation prior to 1870 of part of his estate, over which a receiver was appointed, accepted after that year a lease from the receiver judge.

Held, that he did not become the occupier under the lease, and was not, therefore, within the terms of section 65 of the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1870.—In re Bradford's Estate, L.J. (Ir.)—31 L. R. Ir. 364.

The lessor having been compelled to pay grand jury cess in respect of half the rent,

Held, that the lessee was bound to recoup the lessor the grand jury cess so paid by him.

The provisions of the Drainage Acts relating thereto are not affected by section 5 of the Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1881, which enacts that a tenant shall not, during the continuance of a statutory term, be compelled to pay a higher rent than the rent payable at the commencement of such term.

6. Improvements—Compensation for disturbance—Decree of county court judge—Appeal—Execution—Landlord and Tenant (Ireland) Act, 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 46), s. 23—Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 49), s. 47.—Where a decree of a county court judge, awarding a sum of money to a tenant for compensation for improvements, has been simply affirmed by the Land Commission, the mode of recovering the amount awarded is by executing the original decree; and the costs of the appeal are obtained by a writ of fi. fa. from the Land Commission.—O'Brien v. Leader, LAND COM. (Ir.)—30 L. R. Ir. 531.

7. Quarrying — Right of landlord to enter for purpose of quarrying — Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 49), s. 5, sub-section 5.—Section 5, sub-section 5, of the Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1881, confers upon the landlord and his licensees the right during the continuance of a statutory term in a tenancy to enter upon the holding for the purposes enumerated in that section, including taking minerals, stone, &c., from mines or quarries, whether already open or then first worked, and whether such right was reserved to the landlord under the terms of the formerly subsisting contract of tenancy or not. The proviso that the landlord or his licensees shall make "reasonable amends and satisfaction for any damage to be done or occasioned thereby," is not a condition precedent to such right of entry.

8. Redemption of rent (Ireland) Act, 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 57)—"Adequacy of the security"—Dwelling-house in excess of requirements of holding—Redemption price — Advance. — The erection of a dwelling-house in excess of the requirements of a holding for merely farming purposes is not enough to deprive the holding of its original agricultural character.

In fixing the redemption price of a rent redeemed under the Redemption of Rent (Ireland) Act, 1891, the court may have regard to the circumstance that the possession of large real property by the lessee renders the remedy of the lessor under the covenant for payment of rent more secure, and so increases the saleable value of the rent.

The court will not sanction the advance of the whole of the redemption price unless it is satisfied that the security is sufficient, but will leave the tenant to make up the difference by a cash payment.—O'Donnell v. Chearnley, LAND COM. (Ir.)—32 L. R. Ir. 185.

9. Redemption of Rent (Ireland) Act, 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 57), ss. 1, 2—Amount of redemption price—"Full agricultural rent"—"Regard being had to the adequacy of the security."—The words "regard being had to the adequacy of the security" in the Redemption of Rent (Ireland) Act, 1891, s. 1, refer to the security for the rent, and not to security for an advance by the Land Commission; and the effect of the clause in section 1 is that, though the Land Commission are to determine the price in like manner as if it were a head rent under the Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1887, s. 16, they are not to treat it necessarily as a mere head rent, but are to see how far it is secured and to regulate the price accordingly.

If the rent to be redeemed is in excess of the full agricultural rent of the holding—i.e., its full letting value—it cannot be regarded as a perfectly well-secured rent.—Warren v. Richardson, LAND COM. (Ir.)—30 L. R. Ir. 639.

10. Redemption of Rent (Ireland) Act, 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 57)—Arrears of rent—Provisional sanction of advance—Rights of landlord—Practice—Proceedings in lieu of demurrer—Right to begin—Order 25. —Where no delay or wilful default about the completion of a sale in the Land Purchase Department of the Irish Land Commission is alleged against a tenant, and a reasonable time for the completion of the same has not elapsed, an order of the Land Purchase Commissioners provisionally sanctioning an advance operates to suspend the rights of the landlord to recover arrears of rent due at the date of the execution of the agreement to purchase, and to recover money as rent from the tenant in respect of any period subsequent to the execution of such agreement.

Semble, such rights are wholly released and discharged on the completion of the sale. They would be restored in the event of the proceedings for the sale proving abortive.—Vickery v. Deane, Q.B.D. (Ir.) —32 L. R. Ir. 36.

11. Redemption of Rent (Ireland) Act, 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 57)—Lands taken as adjunct to demesne—Holding not agricultural or pastoral.—Lands taken for a long term of years, not to make profit by farming, but as an adjunct to a demesne, are not agricultural or pastoral in their character, so as to entitle the lessee thereof to redeem his rent under the Redemption of Rent (Ireland) Act, 1891.—Allen v. Grogan, LAND COM. (Ir.)—32 L. R. Ir. 179.

12. Rent—Fair rent—Drainage improvement works—Additional rent imposed in respect thereof by Commissioners of Public Works—Power to fix judicial rent—Irish Drainage Acts—Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1881, s. 8.—Where the Commissioners of Public Works, under the Irish Drainage Acts, imposed an additional rent on a yearly tenant in respect of the improvement of his land effected by certain drainage works, and the tenant subsequently served an originating notice to have a fair rent fixed, the Land Commission reduced the existing aggregate rent, and declared that the fair rent was fixed on the basis of the drainage and maintenance charges being payable by the landlord without power to cast any on the tenant, Held, that the Land Commission had jurisdiction to make the reduction, as the reduced rent was not less than the increment imposed by the Commissioners of Public Works.—Gabbett v. M'Carthy, C.A. (Ir.)—30 L. R. Ir. 720.

13. Rent—Fair rent—Jurisdiction of Land Commission—Surrender by middleman.—Case in which it was held (1) that an order purporting to fix a fair rent as between C. and D. was void as against A., because C. had no interest in the premises, and the lease was not of an agricultural or pastoral holding; (2) that as no valid order fixing a fair rent had been made, the notice of surrender and the deed of surrender to A. was inoperative; and (3) that it was not necessary for A. to apply to the Land Commission under section 8 of the Land Act, 1887, to restrain the surrender, that sub-section being only applicable to cases where there is jurisdiction to fix a fair rent, but reasons exist to make it inequitable to permit the surrender to take place. —In re Todd-Thornton's Estate, L.J. (Ir.)—29 L. R. Ir. 453.

14. Rent—Fair rent—Allowance for lime and seed—Proviso in lease.—A lease for years at a yearly rent of £86 contained a proviso that the lessor would allow the lessee £3 yearly during the term out of the annual rent of £86, provided the lessee laid out on the land each year lime and seed for green crops of the value of £3. On the application of the lessee an order was made under the Land Law (Ireland) Acts, 1881, 1887, fixing the rent of the holding at £55 yearly.

Held, that the landlord was not bound to make the allowance out of the reduced rent.—Nettles v. Murphy, EX.D. (Ir.)—30 L. R. Ir. 564.

15. Rent—Fair rent—Lease by tenant for life in consideration of a premium—No power of leasing—Land Law (Ireland) Acts, 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 49), s. 21; 1887 (50 & 51 Vict. c. 33), s. 1.—A tenant for life under a will, which contained no power of leasing, in consideration of a fine, executed a lease for thirty-five years.

Held, that the lessor could not prevent the lessee from applying to have a fair rent fixed.—Looby v. Finch, C.A. (Ir.)—30 L. R. Ir. 568.

16. Rent—Fair rent—Holding let to be used mainly for purpose of pasture—Restrictions in lease as to tillage—Lessee not to break up more than two acres out of seventy-five.—In 1840 a farm of seventy-five acres in Meath was let for sixty-one years at a rent. The lease contained a covenant by the tenant not to break up more than two acres, but did not contain any covenant against meadowing, and hay could be produced on the holding; but with few exceptions the holding had been uniformly used for grazing. The farm consisted of grazing land in a grazing district. The sub-commissioners reported that the holding was a good grazing holding, and was being used in manner best suited to its productive power.

Held, reversing the decision of the Land Commission, that the farm was let to be used mainly for the purpose of pasture.—Byrne v. Hill, C.A. (Ir.)—30 L. R. Ir. 603.

17. Rent—Fair rent—Agricultural or pastoral land—Mill—Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1881.—By lease in 1866 sixty-two acres of land were demised for thirty-one years at a rent of £260. The premises consisted of a farm with dwelling-house, and a mill and kilns. The mill itself and the mill-race occupied but a small part of the holding, the rest being agricultural land. The lease contained a proviso that in case the mill was burnt the rent should be reduced by £80 a year until the mill was restored by the lessor.

Held, reversing the decision of the Land Commission, that, a substantial part of the premises being outside the provisions of the Land Law (Ireland) Act, a fair rent could not be fixed for the holding. —Boyle v. Foster, C.A. (Ir.)—30 L. R. Ir. 623.

18. Rent—Fair rent—Sale of tenancy under a fi. fa. for rent—Sale "in consequence of a breach of a statutory condition"—Right of purchaser to have fair rent fixed—Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 49), s. 20.—If a landlord recovers judgment against a tenant for rent, and the sheriff sells the tenancy under a fi. fa., this is not a sale "in consequence of a breach of a statutory condition," so as to debar the purchaser from applying to the court to fix a judicial rent. The sale contemplated by section 20 is a sale by the tenant pursuant to section 13, sub-section 1, where the landlord has brought an ejectment for non-payment of rent or upon notice to quit.—Reddy v. Elliott, LAND COM. (Ir.)—30 L. R. Ir. 653.

19. Rent—Fair rent—"Town park"—"Let and used as an ordinary agricultural farm"—Land Law (Ireland) Acts, 1881, s. 58; 1887, s. 9.—A., a stationer and mail cart proprietor, was tenant from year to year of lands adjoining a town in which he lived for the first twenty years of the tenancy. He subsequently removed to a house at a distance from the town, and continued to live there till his death, nine years afterwards. During all this A., in alternate years, cropped the land with wheat, and let them in conacre to persons living in the town, who took a potato crop out of the lands after manuring them. B., who was a solicitor residing near the town, subsequently acquired A.'s interest in the holding, and used the lands for sheep feeding.

Held, that neither A. nor B. had used the lands as an ordinary agricultural farm within the meaning of section 9 of the Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1887, so as to take the holding outside the definition of a town park in section 58 of the Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1881.—Macnamara v. Macnamara, C.A. (Ir.)—32 L. R. Ir. 1.

20. Rent—Fair rent—"Town park"—"Let and used as an ordinary agricultural farm"—Onus of proof—Land Law (Ireland) Acts, 1881, s. 58; 1887, s. 9.—In construing the words "let and used as an ordinary agricultural farm," the court is not limited to the user at any particular date, but must look to the substantial user of the lands during the whole term.

If the holding be within the definition of "town parks" in section 58 of the Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1881, the onus of proving that it comes within the exception created by section 9 of the Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1887, rests upon the tenant.—Daly v. Wright, C.A. (Ir.)—32 L. R. Ir. 9.

21. Rent—Fair rent—Letting for agricultural purposes—Power to resume portion of holding for building or other purposes—Land Law (Ireland) Acts, 1881, s. 58, sub-section 7; 1887, s. 1.—By lease, in 1874, seventy-two acres of agricultural land were demised for thirty-two years at a rent of £162. The lease contained a proviso for resumption of possession by the landlord during the lease of so much of the land as might be required for building or ornamental purposes, or for making a railway, road, or drain, fair compensation being made therefor. The landlord never resumed possession of any portion of the lands.

Held, that the tenant was entitled to serve an originating notice to fix a fair rent.—Hughes v. Doyne, LAND COM. (Ir.)—32 L. R. Ir. 31.

22. Rent—Fair rent—Demesne lands—Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1881, s. 58.—By lease a mansion-house, demesne, and farm, containing 152 acres, were let to a tenant. The lease contained covenants to repair the mansion-house, &c., but no covenants restrictive of cultivation, and the lands had been used as an agricultural holding. The lessor occupied a residence, which was surrounded by a large demesne, about one and a half miles away from the lands let.

Held (reversing the decision of the Land Commission), that the lands were demesne lands at the date of the lease, and had not ceased to retain that character.—Moore v. Batt, C.A. (Ir.)—32 L. R. Ir. 68.

23. Rent—Fair rent—Demesne lands—Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1881, s. 58.—It is not essential to the definition of demesne lands, within the meaning of the Land Law (Ireland) Acts, that they should be held in fee by the landlord.—Magner v. Hawkes, C.A. (Ir.)—32 L. R. Ir. 285.

24. Rent — Fair rent—Subletting — Consent of landlord—Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1881, s. 57.—Previous to 1860 R. had been tenant under a lease for a term of years then expired and the lives of R. and J. then in being. While tenant under this lease R. made two subleases of portions of the holding for the residue of his own term, and had created a yearly tenancy in another portion of the lands. In 1860 he was granted a new lease for three lives of the same lands. The new lease contained a covenant against subletting, and the lands were described in it as being lately in possession of R. and his undertenants. Prior to the execution of the new lease the lessor executed an agreement in writing that the covenant against subletting should only take effect as to the parts of the demised premises then in the occupation of subtenants from the death of R. and J. After the death of R., who survived J., the person entitled to R.'s interest in the new lease served an originating notice, claiming to fix a fair rent of the holding. There were then on the lands three subtenants, two of whom held the portions demised by the two subleases made by R., and one of whom held the portion of the lands comprised in the yearly tenancy. All the subtenants had acquired their title prior to 1860.

Held, that the form of the lease and the collateral agreement did not prove that the landlord had consented to the sublettings.

Flannery v. Nolan, 20 L. R. Ir. 537, discussed.—Thomson v. Lord Rosemore, C.A. (Ir.)—32 L. R. Ir. 431.

25. Resumption of holding by landlord—Lessee—Notice to fix a fair rent—Land Law (Ireland) Acts, 1881, s. 21; 1887, s. 1.—Where a lessee serves an originating notice to fix a fair rent under the Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1887, s. 1, the landlord cannot resume possession under that section until the end of fifteen years after the lessee has so become a present tenant.—Connolly v Tyrrell, C.A. (Ir.)—32 L. R. Ir. 97.

26. Sale of holding—Lessee—Notice to fix fair rent—Agreement to sell holding—Status of tenant—Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1887, s. 1.—By a lease in December, 1871, the lessor demised a farm to S. for twenty-one years. S. died in 1891, having by his will appointed his sons executors, and having left them the farm. In July, 1891, the sons served notice on the lessor that it was their intention to sell the tenancy. In August, 1891, the sons served notice on the lessor to have a fair rent fixed under section 1 of the Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1887. On the 1st of September, 1891, the sons agreed to sell the tenancy to D., without having obtained the lessor's consent, and served the lessor with notice thereof. The lessor objected, and upon a case stated by the Land Commission, Held, that the tenants had not acquired the status of present tenants by the mere service of an originating notice to fix a fair rent prior to an adjudication by the Land Commission thereon.—Smyth v. Moore, C.A. (Ir.)—32 L. R. Ir. 129.

27. Subletting—Covenant against—Landlord's consent—Presumption of lost deed—Trivial sublettings—Subletting Act (7 Geo. 4, c. 29)—Land Law (Ireland) Acts, 1881, ss. 2, 5, 15, 21, 57; 1887, s. 4.—The interest in a lease comprising fifty-four acres, made in 1828, was assigned to the tenant in 1878 by a deed describing the premises as "now in possession of W. (the assignor) and his undertenants." At this date portions of the holding were sublet to A., B., C., D., E., and F. The landlord's agent indorsed on the deed his assent to this assignment.

Held, that there was evidence of a consent by the landlord to the sublettings in existence at the date of the assignment.

The tenant subsequently got the portions of land held by A., B., and C. into his hands, and relet them to X., Y., and Z. without any fresh consent on the part of the landlord. The tenant also made a new subletting to G. of two acres.

Held, that these several sublettings should be taken together, and were not trivial.

The landlord's predecessor had authorized the lessee to make sublettings, and neither the landlord's predecessor nor the landlord had ever availed themselves of a condition in the lease giving a penalty for subletting, nor of the provisions of the Subletting Act, though it was proved that they knew of the sublettings.

Held, that the court would not presume a lost deed waiving the benefit of the Subletting Act.—Robinson v. Wakefield, C.A. (Ir.)—30 L. R. Ir. 547.

28. Tithe rent-charge—Lessee liable to pay—Determination of liability by fixing fair rent—Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1887.—Where a lessee, who from the nature of his tenure was liable to tithe rent-charge, has a fair rent fixed under the Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1887, his liability to tithe rent-charge ceases.—Moroney v. Ambrose, EX.D. (Ir.)—32 L. R. Ir. 63.

29. Turf-bog on holding—Right of landlord to enter and take turf—Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 49), ss. 5 (5), 8.—The decision of the Vice-Chancellor (29 L. R. Ir. 243), granting an injunction to restrain the defendant from cutting and taking turf and mould from the lands in the occupation of the defendant as tenant to the plaintiff, affirmed.—Townshend v. Cotter, C.A. (Ir.)—31 L. R. Ir. 86.

30. Writ of restitution—Ejectment for non-payment of rent—Tender—Lodgment in court.—Case in which it was held that there had been neither tender by the tenant to the landlord nor lodgment in court of the amount due under a judgment for recovery of the land for non-payment of rent, the last day for redeeming having passed, and that the defendant was not entitled to a writ of restitution.

Quære, whether tender of the rent due, without acceptance by the landlord, is equivalent to payment within section 71 of the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1860.

Holmes v. Flaherty, 18 L. R. Ir. 310, questioned.

LANDS CLAUSES ACTS:—

1. Compensation—Compulsory taking of land—Notice to treat—No steps taken under notice—Possession taken—Tenant's interest in land taken—At what date interest is to be calculated—Lands Clauses Act, 1845 (8 & 9 Vict. c. 18), s. 121.—A notice to treat was given by a railway company for a strip of land which formed part of lands held by the tenant under a lease. Nothing was done under this notice to treat, but about a year afterwards the company required and took possession of the strip under section 85 of the Lands Clauses Act, 1845. At the time the notice to treat was given the tenant had an interest for more than a year, but at the time the strip was taken he had an interest for less than a year in the strip taken. The tenant claimed compensation for the strip taken, and for severance damage.

Held, that the time at which the tenant's interest was to be considered was the time when the strip was taken under section 85, and not the time when notice to treat was given, under which nothing was done, and as at the former time the tenant had an interest in the strip of land less than for a year, a magistrate had jurisdiction to assess the compensation under section 121 of the Lands Clauses Act, 1845.—Reg. v. Kennedy, Q.B.D. 380—[1893] 1 Q. B. 533; 68 L. T. 454.

2. Compensation—Reversionary interest in licensed premises—Admissibility of evidence to prove the present market value of the claimant's interest in the premises as licensed premises. — In estimating the amount of compensation under the Lands Clauses Acts to be paid to the reversioner of licensed premises, let on lease with twenty-six years unexpired, required by a public body under compulsory powers, the arbitrator ought to admit evidence to prove the present market value of the claimant's reversionary interest in the premises as licensed premises, and need not confine the evidence to the estimated rental value of the premises as a house and shop apart from the question of whether, when the reversion falls in, they would then be licensed premises.—Belton v. London County Council, C.A. 315—62 L. J. Q. B. 222; 68 L. T. 411.

3. Costs—Order for payment of dividends to tenant for life — Person absolutely entitled — Subsequent motion for payment of corpus out of court—Lands Clauses Act, 1845, ss. 69, 80.—Notwithstanding previous orders for payment to a tenant for life of dividends on purchase-money of lands compulsorily taken, the costs of which have been borne by the company, the court will order the company to pay the costs of an application by the tenant for life for payment out of court of the corpus to trustees under the provisions of the Settled Land Act, 1882.

Secus, where the applicant was absolutely entitled to the fund at the time when the application for payment of dividends only was made.

Ex parte Richards, 25 L. R. Ir. 175, not followed.—In re Belfast Corporation, Ex parte Harkerton, V.C. (Ir.)—31 L. R. Ir. 258.

4. Costs—Payment of money into court—Admini- tration obtained for purpose of making title to same.—Money was paid into court by a railway company under the Land Clauses Act, 1845, in respect of leasehold premises. Persons claiming under the marriage settlement of their father, then deceased, applied for payment, but the court decided that other children, then dead, and of whom there were no personal representatives, had taken vested interests, and declined to pay out the fund until administration had been taken out to their estates. One of the applicants thereupon took out administration to the deceased children, and obtained payment of the fund.

Held, that the company should pay the costs of obtaining these administrations.—Ex parte Kelly, V.C. (Ir.)—31 L. R. Ir. 137.

5. Inclosure Act—Commonable lands purchased by railway company—Rights of turbary—Allotment of waste lands to lord of manor in trust—Trust for benefit of occupiers of cottages—Rights of lord of manor as owner of the soil.—Prior to 1802 the occupiers of certain cottages were accustomed to cut turf on large tracts of commonable and waste lands of a manor. In that year an Inclosure Act was passed by which commissioners were empowered to allot to the lord in trust for the occupiers of the cottages, in lieu of their rights or pretended rights of cutting turf, portions of the waste for a turf common, to be managed as the lord and the churchwardens and overseers should order, and not to be depastured. The commissioners by their award, made in 1806, allotted to the lord, in trust for the occupiers for the time being of the cottages, several acres of waste for a turf common.

A railway company took for the purposes of their undertaking part of the land allotted as a turf common, and the purchase-money was paid into court. On a petition as to the distribution of the fund,

Held, affirming the decision of the Court of Appeal (38 Ch. D. 520), that upon the true construction of the Act the lord of the manor was not deprived of his rights as owner of the soil in the turf common, but was entitled to so much of the purchase-money as represented the value of those rights.—Attorney-General v. Meyrick, H.L. (E.)—[1893] A. C. 1; 62 L. J. Ch. 313; 68 L. T. 174.

6. Notice to treat—Two tenements—Lands Clauses Act, 1845 (8 & 9 Vict. c. 18), s. 92.

Held, by Mathew, J., that under the circumstances there was only one notice to treat, and that the plaintiff was not entitled to treat the notice as two notices applicable to one tenement and to part of the other; and that the award (which had been made ex parte) was not binding on the defendants.—Thompson v. Tottenham and Forest Gate Railway Co., Q.B.D.—67 L. T. 416.

LICENSING ACTS:—

1. Club—Proprietary club—Sale of intoxicating liquors to members without a licence—6 Geo. 4. c. 81, s. 26; 4 & 5 Will. 4, c. 85, s. 17; 23 & 24 Vict. c. 27, s. 19; 35 & 36 Vict. c. 94, s. 3.—The respondents, a registered company, were the proprietors of a club. The appellant applied to become a member of the club, and, having paid a subscription, was elected an honorary member pending inquiries, and was then supplied with spirits, &c., for which he paid. The respondents did not hold any licence for the sale of intoxicating liquors.

Held, that the respondents might be convicted for selling spirits, &c., without a licence.—Bowyer v. Percy Supper Club, Q.B.D.—[1893] 2 Q. B. 154.

2. Licence—Beerhouse—Application for certificate of justices—Notice—Time, computation of—Wine and Beerhouse Act, 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 27), s. 7—Licensing Act, 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. c. 94), ss. 40, 43, 50.—By section 7 of the Wine and Beerhouse Act, 1869, "every person intending to apply to the justices for a certificate under this Act shall, twenty-one days at least before he applies, give notice in writing of his intention to one of the overseers of the parish," &c.

Held, that the twenty-one days are to be computed, not from the first day of the general annual licensing meeting at which the application is made, but from the day upon which the application is actually heard.—Reg. v. Pownall, Q.B.D.—[1893] 2 Q. B. 158.

3. Licence—Beerhouse licensed on May 1st, 1869—Lapsed licence — Discretion of justices to refuse transfer—Licensing Act, 1828 (9 Geo. 4, c. 61), s. 14—Wine and Beerhouse Act, 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 27), ss. 8, 19—Wine and Beerhouse Act Amendment Act, 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 29), s. 7.—At the general annual licensing meeting in August, 1891, the justices refused to renew the licence of the tenant of a beerhouse on account of his having been convicted for permitting drunkenness on the premises. The beerhouse had been continuously licensed for the sale of beer to be consumed on the premises from a date prior to the 1st of May, 1869. In consequence of the refusal to renew, the licence expired on the 10th of October, 1891. On the 5th of October, 1891, the tenant gave up possession of the house to the respondent, who applied, on the 17th of November, 1891, to the justices in special sessions for a transfer of the licence.

Held (reversing the decision of Pollock, B., and Vaughan Williams, J.), that at the date of the application by the respondent the licence was not in force within the meaning of section 19 of the Wine and Beerhouse Act, 1869, and that the justices' power of refusing the transfer was, therefore, not limited to the four grounds mentioned in section 8 of that Act.—Murray v. Freer, C.A. 450—[1893] 1 Q. B. 635; 62 L. J. M. C. 100; 68 L. T. 507.

4. Licence—Notice of intention to oppose—Temporary authority — "Licensed person" — Licensing Act, 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. c. 94), s. 42—5 & 6 Vict. c. 44, s. 1—9 Geo. 4, c. 61, s. 14—Special case stated by licensing justices—Respondent—Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879 (42 & 43 Vict. c. 49), s. 33—20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, s. 2.—The occupier of certain licensed premises being about to leave them, the appellant obtained a temporary authority under 5 & 6 Vict. c. 44, s. 1, to carry on the business until the next special session for transfer of licences. Such session and the general annual licensing meeting being held simultaneously, the appellant applied for a transfer of the licence under 9 Geo. 4, c. 61, s. 14, and also for a renewal of the licence. Both applications were refused by the justices, because the appellant did not produce satisfactory evidence of good character. Notice of intention to oppose the renewal of the licence had been served on the former occupier, but not upon the appellant.

Held, that the appellant was not a "licensed person" applying for a renewal of "his licence" within the meaning of section 42 of the Licensing Act, 1872, and, therefore, was not entitled to notice of opposition to the renewal of the licence.

The superintendent of police of the division appeared to oppose the licence before the justices, and notice in writing of the appeal was given him by the appellant in accordance with 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, s. 2.

Held, that, the case being stated under section 33 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, the superintendent of police was rightly made respondent.—Price v. James, C.A. 57—[1892] 2 Q. B. 428; 61 L. J. M. C. 203; 67 L. T. 543.

5. Licence—Renewal—Change of occupation—Refusal of renewal to new tenant—Expiration of licence—Subsequent application for licence by second new tenant—Jurisdiction of justices—9 Geo. 4, c. 61, s. 14.—By 9 Geo. 4, c. 61, s. 14, "If any person duly licensed under this Act shall, before the expiration of such licence, . . . remove from or yield up the possession of the house specified in such licence; or if the occupier of any such house, being about to quit the same, shall have wilfully omitted or shall have neglected to apply at the general annual licensing meeting or at any adjournment thereof for a licence to continue to sell excisable liquors by retail, to be drunk or consumed in such house, it shall be lawful for the justices assembled as aforesaid at a special session . . . to grant to . . . any new tenant or occupier of any house having so become unoccupied . . . a licence to sell excisable liquors by retail."

The licence-holder of an inn yielded up possession of the premises in December, 1890; at a special session in May, 1891, a new tenant unsuccessfully applied for a transfer of the licence; at the adjourned general annual licensing meeting in September, 1891, another new tenant unsuccessfully applied for a renewal of the licence; neither of the applicants appealed to quarter sessions. The then current licence expired on the 10th of October, 1891. In March, 1892, the appellant, who had become tenant of the house, applied, under 9 Geo. 4, c. 61, s. 14, for a licence.

Held, that the justices had jurisdiction to grant the application.

6. Licence—Renewal—Grounds of objection—"Disorderly character"—Evidence—Justices' discretion—Licensing Acts, 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. c. 94), s. 42; and 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 49), s. 26.—Upon an application for the renewal of a licence, the notice of objection pursuant to section 26 of the Licensing Act, 1874, stated three grounds of objection, one of which was, "That your house is of a disorderly character." Upon the hearing of the application the justices admitted evidence of three convictions against previous holders of the licence, but it was admitted that the applicant bore a good character.

Held, that the evidence was properly admitted, inasmuch as it was not necessary that evidence directed to the disorderly character of a licensed house should be confined to such matters only as affected the personal character of the applicant by showing that he himself had contributed to the disorderly character of the house.—Reg. v. Justices of Miskin Higher, Q.B.D. 252—[1893] 1 Q. B. 275; 67 L. T. 680.

7. Licence—Renewal—Refusal to renew—Appeal to quarter sessions—Notice of appeal—Service on "the other party"—Superintendent of police opposing renewal—Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879 (42 & 42 Vict. c. 49), s. 31.—Where a superintendent of police has served notice of opposition to the renewal of a licence, and has appeared before the licensing justices in support of his opposition, he is "the other party" to the proceedings within the meaning of section 31 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, and a person aggrieved by the refusal of the justices to renew the licence must, as a condition precedent to the hearing of his appeal to quarter sessions, serve upon the superintendent notice of his intention to appeal.

8. Offence — "Illegally dealing in intoxicating liquor"—Penalty—Licensing Act, 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 49), s. 17.—The provision in section 17 of the Licensing Act, 1874, that persons found upon suspected premises entered by a constable in pursuance of a warrant to search for liquors sold or kept for sale contrary to law shall be presumed to be guilty of "illegally dealing in intoxicating liquor" until the contrary be shown, is not confined to a seller, but applies also to a buyer, of such liquors.—McKenzie v. Day, Q.B.D. 384—[1893] 1 Q. B. 289; 62 L. J. M. C. 49; 68 L. T. 345.

9. Offence—Sale during prohibited hours—"Bonâ fide traveller"—Licensing Act, 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 49), s. 10.—A man left his home on a Sunday morning and walked three-quarters of a mile to a railway station, and thence took the train to another station about two and a half miles off, where he was employed as a porter. He afterwards left the station and walked to certain licensed premises, where he was served with beer. The licensed premises were less than a mile from the station where he was employed, but more than three miles from his residence.

Held, that he was a bonâ fide traveller within section 10 of the Licensing Act, 1874.—Cowap v. Atherton, Q.B.D. 158—[1893] 1 Q. B. 49; 68 L. T. 88.

10. Offence—Sale during prohibited hours—"Bonâ fide traveller"—Licensing Act, 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 49), s. 9.—The appellant, a licensed victualler, was charged with permitting his licensed premises to be open for the sale of refreshment during prohibited hours—namely, on a Sunday morning before 12.30 p.m. The justices found that many of the persons served by the appellant were residents in, and had come from, a neighbouring town a little more than three miles distant, in order to obtain beer at the appellant's premises; that they were not bonâ fide travellers within section 9 of the Licensing Act, 1874, and that the appellant did not truly believe them be bonâ fide travellers; and the appellant was convicted and fined.

Held, by Lord Coleridge, C.J., and Hawkins, Day, and Collins, JJ. (Cave, J., dissenting), that, on the evidence in the case, the conviction was right.—Penn v. Alexander, Q.B.D. 392—[1893] 1 Q. B. 522; 62 L. J. M. C. 65; 68 L. T. 355.

LICENSING ACTS (IRELAND):—

1. Beer licence and spirit grocer's licence—Composite application to licensing justices—Mandamus to hear application for spirit grocer's licence.—M. applied at petty sessions for a magistrate's certificate for a beer retailer's licence and a spirit grocer's licence. The application was refused, and the refusal affirmed at quarter sessions. M. then applied for a mandamus to enable him to obtain a spirit grocer's licence.

Held, that, as M. had not severed the two branches of his composite application when it was before the justices, a mandamus should not issue commanding them to do what they had never been asked to do, and had not, in fact, refused to do.

Quære, is "suitability of the premises" structural suitability merely, or does it include suitability of situation?—Reg. v. Justices of Tyrone, C.A. (Ir.)—32 L. R. Ir. 201.

2. Notice of appeal—Services on justices' clerk—Licensing Act, 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. c. 94), s. 52—Petty Sessions Act, 1851 (14 & 15 Vict. c. 93).—A licensed person was convicted at petty sessions of an offence under the Licensing Act, 1872, and served notice of appeal from such conviction by delivering to the clerk of the petty sessions court a notice of appeal addressed to each of the convicting justices by name.

Held (Gibson, J., diss.), that the service was sufficient.

LIFE INSURANCE.—See INSURANCE (LIFE).

LIGHT:—

1. Implied grant—Right to extraordinary amount of light—Injunction.—Where the owner of land grants part of the land with a house upon it, which is to be used for business purposes, the intention to be imputed to the parties, in the absence of a special bargain, is that the house is to be granted with light sufficient for all ordinary purposes of business in the locality.

In considering the effect of such a grant the court must look back to the time when the contract between the parties was entered into, and cannot impute an intention that the premises should be used for a special purpose not shown to be in the mind of either of the parties at that time.

Held, applying the above principles, that the lessees of a building used for business purposes in the City of London were not entitled to an injunction to restrain the defendant, who claimed under a subsequent conveyance of the adjoining land from the same owner, from erecting a building which would interfere with the use of their rooms for wool-sorting purposes (which required a strong light), but which would leave the rooms in the enjoyment of a good and sufficient light for all the ordinary purposes of business, the court not being able to impute to the parties to the lease an intention that the demised building should be used for wool-sorting purposes.—Corbett v. Jonas, CH.D. KEK., J.—[1892] 3 Ch. 137; 62 L. J. Ch. 43; 67 L. T. 191.

2. Prescription—Enjoyment against lessee of the Crown—Surrender of lease—New lease—Presumption of lost grant—Inference of enjoyment from time immemorial—Limited easement for residue of term—"Absolute and indefeasible"—Prescription Act (2 & 3 Will. 4, c. 71), ss. 2, 3.—Section 2 of the Prescription Act does not apply to easements of light, which are governed by section 3 and the subsequent sections, which have to be read with it.

The Crown, not being named in section 3, is not bound by it.

Limited and qualified easements are not within the scope of the Prescription Act; accordingly, an easement of light cannot arise under section 3 as against a lessee of the Crown, to exist only during the continuance of the lease.

M., being assignee of a lease of Crown land for a term of ninety-nine years from 1815, surrendered it in 1892 and agreed to take a new lease, under which agreement he proceeded to erect a building so as to interfere with the access of light which W. had enjoyed to a house on contiguous land without interruption ever since 1852, when such house was built. In 1893 W. commenced an action to restrain M. from so building.

Held, that there was no ground for presuming a lost grant, or for inferring immemorial prescription, in favour of W.; that no easement of light had arisen under the Prescription Act, and that W.'s claim therefore failed.

Decision of Kekewich, J., reversed.

Principle of Bright v. Walker, 1 C. M. & R. 211, followed.

Perry v. Eames, 39 W. R. 602, [1891] 1 Ch. 658, approved.—Wheaton v. Maple & Co., C.A. 677.

3. Prescription—Landlord and tenant—Same landlord—Adjoining tenements—Prescription Act (2 & 3 Will. 4, c. 71), s. 3.—Plaintiff, having obtained the assignment of a twenty-one years' lease, which had been granted in 1862, of certain houses, just before its expiration, in 1882, agreed with his landlord for a further lease of twelve years, under which he was in possession, no formal lease having been executed. In 1887 the same landlord granted a lease of adjoining premises, which was assigned to the defendant. On motion to restrain interference by the defendant with the plaintiff's lights,

Held, that the fact that the plaintiff's houses had not been continuously occupied by the same tenant was immaterial, and that an absolute and indefeasible right to light had attached to the houses in 1882 by virtue of the Prescription Act, s. 3.

Held, also, that the fact that the plaintiff was in possession under agreement only was not material. —Robson v. Edwardes, CH.D. NOR., J. 569—[1893] 2 Ch. 146; 62 L. J. Ch. 378; 68 L. T. 195.

4. Prescription—User for more than nineteen and less than twenty years—Inchoate right—Injunction—Prescription Act (2 & 3 Will. 4, c. 71), s. 3.—The plaintiffs were owners and lessees of buildings having windows the access of light to which over adjoining land was claimed to have been enjoyed for more than nineteen and less than twenty years. The defendants, the owners of the adjoining land, were proceeding to erect thereon buildings of a permanent character, which, if completed, would obstruct the plaintiffs' light.

The plaintiffs brought this action, and now moved to restrain the further erection of the defendants' building. They contended that they were entitled to an injunction by way of protection to their inchoate right, which in a few months would, under section 3 of the Prescription Act, ripen into an absolute and indefeasible right.

Held, that, there being no precedent for granting such an injunction, and the case not being one in which the property would be destroyed if an injunction was not granted, the motion must be refused.

Held, that, if the defendants ran up their buildings, these at the end of twenty years would constitute an interference with the plaintiffs' ancient lights, and would be amenable to the jurisdiction of the court, but the court would not intervene to protect this inchoate right.—Governors of Bridewell Hospital v. Ward, Lock, & Co., CH.D. KEK., J.—62 L. J. Ch. 270; 68 L. T. 212.

LIMITATION of ACTION.—See HIGHWAY, 5.

LIMITATIONS, STATUTE of:—

1. Administration action—Incumbrancer—Arrears of interest—Petition for sale in Landed Estates Court. —Where an incumbrancer, who has proved his demand in an administration action, presents a petition for sale in pursuance of the judgment in that action, and carries on the proceedings to a sale, the Statute of Limitations does not run against his demand after the commencement of the administration action.—In re Ebbs' Estate, L.J. 2. Concealed fraud—Continuous adverse possession— 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27, s. 26—Practice—Pleadings—

Striking out — Frivolous and vexatious action — R. S. C., 1883, ord. 25, r. 4.—The plaintiff, by his statement of claim in an action of ejectment brought in 1892, alleged that he was the heir-at-law of W. J., who died intestate in 1798, and that, on the death of W. J., his real estate was wrongfully taken possession of by the mother of G. C., in the name of G. C., as the heir-at-law—as the mother falsely alleged—of W. J.; that G. C. died an infant in 1805, whereupon G. C.'s mother continued to hold possession in the name of a supposititious child, R. C., on the false pretence that such child was a brother of G. C., and as such was heir-at-law of W. J.; that both R. C., and afterwards the defendant, who claimed as a volunteer under R. C., remained in possession knowing the above facts, and fraudulently concealed the same from the true heir of W. J.; that the plaintiff and his predecessors had been deprived of the estate by the said concealed fraud, which had not, and could not with reasonable diligence have, been discovered until 1879; and that the plaintiff, at the time of such discovery, was an infant, and only attained twenty-one in 1887. The defendant moved to have the statement of claim struck out and the action dismissed as frivolous or vexatious; and, in support of his application, adduced evidence to show that the allegation that R. C. was a supposititious child had been publicly made in 1853, and had been the foundation of other actions of ejectment against the defendant and his predecessors by other claimants, and that such actions had all been dismissed.

Held (affirming Kekewich, J.), (1) that the allegations in the statement of claim as to the entry in 1798 on behalf of G. C. did not show a case of concealed fraud within section 26 of 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27, but only a wrongful entry under a false claim as heir-at-law; (2) that the statute began to run as against the plaintiff and his predecessors in 1790, and that, as possession adverse to the plaintiff and his predecessors had been held ever since, the operation of the statute was not suspended by what was alleged to have been done in 1805; (3) that the plaintiff or his predecessors knew, or might with reasonable diligence have known, the alleged concealed fraud more than twelve years before action brought; and, accordingly, that the action should be dismissed as frivolous or vexatious.

4. Husband and wife—Separate property—Mortgage—Trustee—Same hand to pay and to receive—Statute of Limitations (3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27), s. 40.—Where a married woman was under a will entitled for life for her separate use to the income of a sum of money which the trustee of the will had lent to the husband on the security of a mortgage of two freehold houses, and the husband and wife had lived together in amity for a period of more than twenty years after the date of the mortgage, and during that time the husband had never paid any interest on the mortgage debt, or given any written acknowledgment of the mortgage to the mortgagee-trustee for the wife,

Held, that the husband retained the interest as a gift from the wife; that it was the same hand to pay and to receive; that, therefore, no payment over was requisite; and, consequently, that the Statute of Limitations did not run, and the mortgage was still subsisting.—In re Hawes, In re Burchell, Burchell v. Hawes, CH.D. B. 189; 62 L. J. Q. B. 128.

6. Lease—Lessee out of possession—Title of lessee extinguished—Transfer of title to person in possession—Rent paid to landlord—Liability on covenant in lease—3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27, s. 34.—The plaintiff's predecessor in title in 1802 granted a lease of a house for eighty-nine years, containing the usual covenant by the lessee to repair. In 1836 G. entered into possession without any acknowledgment to the lessee, who disappeared at that date, and continued in possession for forty years paying the rent to the lessor. G., in 1876, assigned all his estate and interest to the defendant, who continued in possession, paying the rent to the lessor, until the expiration of the term in 1891. The plaintiff then sued the defendant for breach of the covenant to repair.

Held, that the rights and obligations of the lessee under the lease were not, by section 34 of 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27, transferred to G., and that, therefore, the defendant, who was the assignee of G., was not liable on the covenants in the lease.—Tickborne v. Weir, C.A.—67 L. T. 735.

7. Lease for lives—Sublease—Surrender of lease—Renewal of lease—Ecclesiastical Commissioners—Recovery of possession — Real Property Limitation Act, 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 57), s. 2—Interesse termini—4 Geo. 2, c. 28, s. 6.—C., the owner in fee and predecessor in title of the plaintiffs, in 1805 granted a freehold lease of land for three lives. The lessees in 1807 sub-demised part of the land for a term determinable on the dropping of the last of the three lives, which occurred in 1874. The lessees in 1832 surrendered their lease, and on the next day took a new lease for lives, the last of which dropped in 1891. This lease was by common law demise, and bore an indorsement of livery of seisin. The defendant, claiming through the sub-lessees, had been, since 1874, when the sublease expired, in actual possession of the lands comprised therein without title. In an action to recover possession, Held, that the lease of 1832, being a valid lease by virtue of 4 Geo. 2, c. 28, s. 6, operated to pass an estate to the lessees; and therefore the plaintiffs' reversionary estate did not become an estate in possession within the meaning of the Real Property Limitation Act, 1874, until 1891, when the last life in the lease dropped; and, therefore, that the plaintiffs' right to recover was not barred under that Act, and the plaintiffs were entitled to recover.

The expression "interesse termini" is never used with regard to a freehold lease, to which it has no application.

9. Mortgage — Covenant — Principal and surety — Joint and several covenant by mortgagor and surety—Payment on demand—Present debt—Collateral sum—3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 42, s. 3.—Where there is a present debt and a promise to pay on demand, the demand is not considered to be a condition precedent to the bringing of an action.

Secus, where there is a promise to pay a collateral sum on request.

Where a mortgage contained joint and several covenants by J. B. and the mortgagor to pay the mortgage debt and interest "on demand," and that they would "in the meantime from the date" of the deed pay interest half-yearly until payment of the principal, and a proviso for redemption if the mortgagor should "on demand" pay the debt and interest.

Held, on the construction of the covenants, that there was intended to be a demand precedent to the bringing of any action thereon, and that no right of action accrued against J. B. until demand made.—In re Brown's Estate, Brown v. Brown, CH.D. CHI., J. 440—[1893] 2 Ch. 300; 62 L. J. Ch. 695; 69 L. T. 12.

10. Petition for sale by incumbrancer—3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27, s. 40—37 & 38 Vict. c. 57, s. 8.—The filing of a petition for sale in the Chancery Division (land judges) by an incumbrancer on land is a proceeding to recover money charged on the land within the meaning of section 8 of 37 & 38 Vict. c. 57, and prevents the statute from running from that date against the petitioner until such petition has been dismissed.—In re Stinson's Estate, L.J. (Ir.)—29 L. R. Ir. 490.

11. Soil under highway—Vesting—Tunnel—Easement or hereditament—Prescription Act (2 & 3 Will. 4, c. 71)—Statute of Limitations (37 & 38 Vict. c. 57).—By a deed of the 12th of July, 1871, the trustees of a highway, in exercise of rights and powers given to them under Acts of Geo. 3 and Geo. 4, and for valuable consideration, granted a licence to the predecessor in title of the defendant company to excavate, construct, and use a tunnel under the highway. The rights and powers of the trustees came to an end on the 1st of November, 1871, when the Highways Act (33 & 34 Vict. c. 73) was passed. The tunnel in question was completed in 1872, and remained, without any substantial alteration, in the exclusive possession and occupation of the defendant company, or their predecessors in title, until the commencement of the action in August, 1891. The tunnel was many feet beneath the surface; it was bricked at either end, and was used to carry chalk and soil from one part of the defendants' property to another. The plaintiff was owner of the land abutting on the highway on one side, and, at one place, on both sides; and he alleged that he was owner of the soil under the highway. By his action he claimed an injunction to restrain the trespass upon his land.

Held, that, even assuming that the plaintiff had a sufficient title to the soil under the highway, apart from the Statute of Limitations, the action was barred by that statute, inasmuch as the defendant company had enjoyed no mere easement, but the exclusive occupation and possession of the tunnel for more than the required twelve years.—Bevan v. London Portland Cement Co., CH.D. LIVERPOOL COURT of PASSAGE:—

Admiralty jurisdiction—Rule empowering registrar to give summary judgment—Invalidity—Prohibition—County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act, 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 71), ss. 10, 13, 23, 25, 35—County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Amendment Act, 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 51), ss. 1, 6.—Under section 6 of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Amendment Act, 1869, the assessor of the Court of Passage, Liverpool, has power to make general rules and orders for regulating the practice and procedure of the admiralty jurisdiction of that court.

Held, that a rule conferring on the registrar of the court a power of summary judgment similar to that exercised under order 14 of the R. S. C., 1883, was invalid.—Fellows v. Owners of the Lord Stanley, Q.B.D. 253—[1893] 1 Q. B. 98; 67 L. T. 857.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT:—

1. Building — Bye-law — Sanitary authority — Deviation from plan.—A bye-law of a sanitary authority, made under section 157 of the Public Health Act, 1875, required that a plan showing the dimensions of the several parts of any proposed building should be sent to, and approved by, the sanitary authority before the work of building was commenced.

The respondent sent in plans of a proposed building, which were approved by the sanitary authority. In the course of building he deviated from the plans sent in by altering the height of the floors of the building.

Held, that the respondent had committed a breach of the bye-law.—James v. Master, Q.B.D. 174—[1893] 1 Q. B. 355; 67 L. T. 855.

2. Building—Bye-law— Validity — Dwellings for servants of railway company—Not "buildings" used for purposes of such "railway"—38 & 39 Vict. c. 55 (Public Health Act, 1875), s. 157.—The appellants erected dwelling-houses, for their servants whose duties required them to live upon the spot, on vacant land, acquired and held by them under certain Acts of Parliament, near to but not forming part of one of their stations, nor used for the purposes of their railway. The appellants were convicted and fined at petty sessions for not having given the respondents, who were the rural sanitary authority, notice in writing of their intention to erect the buildings as required by one of the bye-laws, then in force, made by the respondents for the regulation of new streets and buildings under sections 157 and 276 of the Public Health Act, 1875, and allowed by the Local Government Board.

Section 157 contains a proviso that the section is not to apply to "buildings belonging to any railway company, and used for the purposes of such railway under any Act of Parliament."

Held, that the bye-law was valid, and that the buildings in question were not within the proviso. Conviction affirmed. — Manchester, Sheffield, and Lincolnshire Railway Co. v. Barnsley Union, Q.B.D. —67 L. T. 119.

3. "Building"—Meaning of term—Jurisdiction of magistrates—Jurisdiction of High Court—Public Health (Buildings in Streets) Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 52), s. 3.—In a proceeding before justices under section 3 of the Public Health (Buildings in Streets) Act, 1888, for erecting a building in any street beyond the front main wall of the house or building on either side thereof in the same street, the question whether the thing erected is a "building" within the meaning of the section is a question of fact to be determined by the justices, provided the thing erected is of such a nature that it is capable of being a building, and in such a case the High Court has no jurisdiction to review their decision.

A photographer erected a wooden structure, 9 feet 6 inches long, 3 feet wide, and 7 feet high. It was roofed over, and had a glass front and a door to enter by at one end. It was fastened into the ground by four posts, forming part of the structure, and let into the ground to the depth of nine to twelve inches. It was used for the purpose of exhibiting photographs therein, but there was no approach to it for the public.

Held, that the structure was of such a nature that it was capable of being a building.

The justices having decided that the structure was a building within the meaning of section 3 of the Public Health (Buildings in Streets) Act, 1888, Held, by Hawkins, J., that the court had no jurisdiction to review their decision.—Mayor, &c., of Leicester v. Brown, Q.B.D. 78—62 L. J. M. C. 22; 67 L. T. 686.

3a. Building—Street—Prescribed line—Injunction —Laches—Public Health Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), ss. 155, 159.—About the month of February, 1893, a house in a street of a borough was taken down by the defendant in order to be rebuilt or altered. On the 1st of March, 1893, the council of the borough at a meeting prescribed a certain line of building, and on the 2nd of March gave the defendant notice that they had prescribed a line. The plaintiffs complained that the defendant had begun to erect, and threatened and intended to continue and complete the erection of a building ten feet beyond the prescribed line. The plaintiffs tendered compensation, which was not accepted, and were ready to pay such compensation as might be settled by arbitration. They claimed an injunction. The defendant had pulled down the front and back of the house in question, leaving the top story resting upon the side walls and a bressummer. It appeared that the alterations were commenced on the 2nd of January, 1893, and early in February the front and back of the house were removed, the alterations being nearly completed on the 25th of February. Negotiations were entered into between the plaintiffs and the defendant, but on the 18th of February the defendant by letter informed the plaintiffs that he intended to proceed with the alterations.

On motion for an injunction, to be treated as the trial of the action,

Held, that the house or building had been taken down in order to be rebuilt or altered within the terms of section 155 of the Public Health Act, 1875, and the power of the plaintiffs to prescribe a line then arose;

That under section 159 of the Act, if only the upper part of a house were pulled down and the ground floor left, that would not be a "taking down" within section 155;

That it was implied by the words of section 155 that the local authority cannot exercise their power when the house had been built up or altered;

And that, the notice having been given after the alterations had been made, which the notice was intended to prevent, the notice was too late.

Injunction refused with costs.—Attorney-General v. Hatch, CH.D. KEK., J.—68 L. T. 854.

4. County council—Main roads—Counties divided into hundreds—Expenses of repair of main roads—Highways and Locomotives (Amendment) Act, 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 77), s. 20—Local Government Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 41), ss. 11, 23, 68.—The county authority of a county divided into hundreds made an order, under section 20 of the Highways and Locomotives Act, 1878, declaring every main road in each hundred to be repairable by that hundred, and one-half of the expense of repairing the same to be payable out of a separate rate levied on the hundred.

Held, that the maintenance and repair of main roads in the hundreds were "general county purposes" within the meaning of sections 11, 23, and 68 of the Local Government Act, 1888, so that the county council were entitled to apply moneys taken from the Exchequer Contribution Account in recouping the General County Fund so much of the costs of such maintenance and repair as was not provided for by the special rates on the hundreds. —Reg. v. Dolby (No. 2), Q.B D.—[1892] 2 Q. B. 736; 61 L. J. Q. B. 826; 67 L. T. 619.

5. Fire brigade—Right to control of premises on fire—Exclusion of public—Justices—Jurisdiction—Towns Police Clauses Act, 1847 (10 & 11 Vict. c. 89), s. 32—Public Health Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), s. 171.—The effect of section 171 of the Public Health Act, 1875, incorporating the provisions of the Towns Police Clauses Act, 1847, which, by section 32, provides that the urban authority "may employ a proper number of persons to act as firemen, and may make such rules for their regulation as they think proper," is to give the brigade provided by such local authority a right to do all necessary acts to maintain control over premises upon which they are lawfully engaged in extinguishing a fire.

The appellant, a member of a volunteer brigade in uniform, attempted to enter premises upon which the brigade provided by the local board were engaged in putting out a fire. Being refused admission by the respondent, a member of the local board brigade, who was in uniform and was directed by his foreman to exclude people from the premises, the appellant attempted to force his way in, but used no unnecessary violence; the appellant was convicted by the justices of an assault upon the respondent.

Held, that the respondent was justified in excluding the appellant, who could not justify his attempt to force an entrance, and that the conviction was right.—Carter v. Thomas, Q.B.D. 510—[1893] 1 Q. B. 673; 62 L. J. M. C. 104.

6. Hospital — "Noxious business" — Smallpox hospital—Local authority—Adjoining district—Consent—Public Health Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), ss. 112, 131, 285.—A hospital is not within the provisions of section 112 of the Public Health Act, 1875.

The powers conferred by section 131, exercisable by a local authority, are not limited for their exercise to the district of the particular local authority which exercises them.

Section 285 does not apply to the powers conferred by section 131 so as to require for their exercise in an adjoining district the consent of the local authority of such adjoining district.

Decision of Chitty, J., affirmed.—Withington Local Board v. Mayor, &c., of Manchester, C.A. 306—[1893] 2 Ch. 19; 62 L. J. Ch. 393; 68 L. T. 330.

7. Paving expenses — Apportionment — "Owner" of houses—Mortgagee in possession—Public Health Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), s. 4.—By a private Act a local board were empowered to execute works of sewering and paving in streets, and to apportion the estimated expenses among the owners of adjoining premises. The defendant was the second mortgagee of houses adjoining a street, and from April, 1891, to June, 1892, was in possession, collecting the rents, which he applied in keeping down outgoings and the interest on the first mortgage. No surplus remained after these payments. In June, 1891, the local board apportioned the estimated expenses of sewering and paving the street among the defendant and others. The first mortgagee entered into possession in June, 1892, and the works were not completed till July following.

Held, that the defendant was "owner" of the houses within the interpretation clause (section 4) of the Public Health Act, 1875, which was incorporated in the private Act, and was, therefore, liable for the estimated expenses apportioned in respect of them. — Tottenham Local Board v. Williamson, Q.B.D.—62 L. J. Q. B. 322; 69 L. T. 51.

8. Paving expenses—Apportionment on frontage—Dispute—Action to enforce payment—Jurisdiction of High Court—Arbitration—Public Health Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), ss. 150, 257, 268.—The plaintiffs, as urban sanitary authority, brought an action against the defendant, as owner, within the meaning of sections 150 and 257 of the Public Health Act, 1875, of certain houses and premises fronting on one of two streets within their district. In 1883 the plaintiffs considered it necessary to have those streets paved and metalled, and served the owners and occupiers with notice as required by the Act of 1875. None of the owners or occupiers having complied with the notice, the plaintiffs subsequently executed the works themselves, which were completed in 1884. The expenses thus incurred by the plaintiffs were apportioned by their surveyor between the different owners according to the frontage of their respective premises. In February, 1885, due notice of such apportionment was served on the defendant. In March, 1885, the defendant wrote to the plaintiffs' clerk giving notice of his objection to the "account rendered," and calling attention to the same. The defendant stated that the cost was greatly in excess of the cost per foot as given to him previously to the work being done; and that he found that in other cases a smaller charge had been made. No further steps were taken in the matter until May, 1891, when a demand for payment was sent to the defendant, but the money was not paid. The question was raised at the trial of the action whether the matter in dispute should not have been submitted to arbitration.

Held, that the defendant had not disputed the apportionment, but only the prime cost, he having disputed the "account rendered," explaining in his letter that he considered that the cost was excessive; and that, consequently, arbitration was not the proper procedure to be resorted to.

9. Rates — Assessment — Collection — Poor rate—County rate—Parish in two counties—County Rates Act, 1852 (15 & 16 Vict. c. 81), ss. 21, 26, 31, 32, 33, 34.—Before the passing of a local Act in 1856 certain lands were extra parochial, and for secular purposes were situate partly in H. and partly in K. By the Act of 1856 these lands were constituted a parish, and it was thereby provided by section 52 that such parish should be deemed to be altogether in H., and that the laws in force for the relief of the poor in England should be enforced therein in like manner as in other parishes. To the section was added a proviso, that the county rate then payable in respect of the lands comprised in the parish should continue to be paid and payable to the respective treasurers of the rates for K. and H., within which such lands were situate. The parish is included in the Spalding Union, and it has been the custom of the county authorities of H. and K. to address precepts in respect of county rates to the guardians of the union. The guardians have then addressed a precept to the overseers and churchwardens of the parish to levy and pay from the poor rates of the entire parish a sum as their contribution to the common fund of the union. In this sum has been included the sums required to satisfy the county rates of both H. and K.

Held, that the proviso to section 52 of the Act of 1856 by implication reserved to the rating authorities of H. and K. their power of assessing and making county rates; that by that section the County Rates Act, 1852, was imported into the Act of 1856; that under section 34 of the Act of 1852 the overseers and churchwardens of the parish were entitled to pay out of any moneys in their possession the amount required by the guardians to pay the county rates of H. and K.; that the overseers and churchwardens ought to reimburse any sum paid out of the poor rates of the parish to satisfy the county rate of H. by a rate to be levied on the occupiers of land in H., and any sum paid out of such poor rates to satisfy the county rate of K. by a rate to be levied on the occupiers of land in K.—Attorney-General v. Churchwardens and Overseers of Deeping St. Nicholas, CH.D. STI., J.—62 L. J. Ch. 188; 68 L. T. 278.

10. Rates—Lighting rate—Distress warrant, application for—Ministerial duty—Lighting and Watching Act, 1833 (3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 90).—Upon an application for a distress warrant for arrears of a lighting rate imposed under the provisions of the Lighting and Watching Act, 1833, the overseers produced evidence of the existence of the rate, and of the amount due and the demand for the same. The justices refused to issue a distress warrant on the ground that evidence was not produced that all provisions for the adoption of the Act had been duly carried out.

Held, that upon proof by the overseers of their being required to levy the rate by the inspectors purporting to be appointed under the Act, and of the fact of the rate being in arrear, the duty of the justices was ministerial, and that a mandamus to issue the distress warrant must go.—Reg. v. Reynolds, Q.B.D.—[1893] 2 Q. B. 75; 62 L. J. M. C. 120.

11. Sewer—Vesting in local authority—Private street, sewer in—Acceptance by local authority of in- complete sewer—Public Health Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), ss. 13, 15, 150.—The owners of a building estate, who were the predecessors in title of the defendant, deposited plans, which were approved by the local authority, showing a road running down the slope of a hill and crossing the New River at the foot, with a sewer running the whole length of the road and crossing the New River to join another sewer on the farther side. An agreement was made by the New River Co. with the estate owners to divert the New River so as to enable the sewer to be laid across the old bed of the stream. In 1885 the sewer was made as far as the New River, where it stopped, the river not having then been diverted; it had no outfall, and was never, in fact, used as a sewer; but the work was from time to time inspected by a servant of the local authority, who authorized the covering in of the various sections, and made reports to the local authority, who never expressed dissatisfaction with the work. Nothing more was done to the sewer, which became out of repair and ruinous; and in 1890 the local authority gave to the frontagers in the road notice, under section 150 of the Public Health Act, 1875, to sewer the road down to the New River; on their default the local authority themselves constructed a new sewer, which they carried across the bed of the New River and connected with the sewer on the other side, the diversion of the river having been completed during the execution of the works by the local authority. The local authority having sought to charge the frontagers with the expenses of making the new sewer, the question of the amount to be paid by the defendant was referred to arbitration, and in an action on the award the jury found that the local authority had accepted the old sewer as a satisfactory sewer.

Held, that the local authority had power to accept the original sewer, although it had no outfall, and was at the time of acceptance incapable of being used as a sewer; and that, the road having once been sewered to the satisfaction of the local authority, the expenses of constructing the new sewer were not chargeable on the frontagers.—Hornsey Local Board v. Davis, C.A.—[1893] 1 Q. B. 756; 62 L. J. Q. B. 427; 68 L. T. 503.

12. Sewer—Vesting in local authority—Sewer not made by a person for his own profit—Public Health Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), s. 13—Pollution of stream—Rivers Pollution Act, 1876 (39 & 40 Vict. c. 75), s. 3.—The defendants, who were not the local sanitary authority, made a sewer into which, by means of house drains, the ordinary sewage of sixty-nine cottages belonging to the defendants was, with the sanction of the sanitary authority, conveyed and discharged into a stream. The plaintiff, the owner of land on both sides of the stream below the outfall from the sewer, brought an action against the defendants for an injunction to restrain them from polluting the stream.

Held, that the sewer, being made for the ordinary purpose of draining the cottages, was not a sewer made by any person for his own profit, or by any company for the profit of the shareholders, within the meaning of section 13 of the Public Health Act, 1875; that it was, under that section, therefore, vested in and under the control of the local authority; and that the defendants were not liable.

Per curiam.—Assuming that the value of the premises was enhanced to the owners by the construction by them of the sewer, that was not the kind of "profit" contemplated by the exception in section 13.—Ferrand v. Hallas Land and Building Co., C.A. 580—[1893] 2 Q. B. 135; 69 L. T. 8.

13. Unsound meat—Seizure—Refusal of magistrate to condemn—Compensation to owner—Measure of damages—Costs of attendance before magistrate on application to condemn—Power of magistrate to hear owner—Right of owner to refuse tender of the meat—Public Health Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), ss. 116, 117, 308.—Where meat has been seized by the officer of a local authority under section 116 of the Public Health Act, 1875, as being unwholesome, and taken before a magistrate for the purpose of being condemned, the attendance of the owner, though he has not been summoned, with his witnesses before the magistrate to give evidence as to the condition of the meat, is a natural consequence of the seizure; and, therefore, where the power of seizure has been wrongly exercised, and the magistrate refuses to condemn the meat, the owner is entitled to include in the amount of "full compensation" recoverable by him from the local authority under section 308 of the Act the costs incurred through his attendance before the magistrate.

So held by the Court of Appeal, affirming the decision of the Queen's Bench Division.

Held, also, by the Queen's Bench Division, that, when the meat which has been seized, and which the magistrate has refused to condemn, has been tendered by the local authority to the owner, he is not entitled to decline to receive it back, and the value of the meat at the time when it was tendered must be taken into consideration in assessing the amount of the compensation payable to the owner.—In re An Arbitration between Bater and Mayor, &c., of Birkenhead, C.A. 513—[1893] 2 Q. B. 77; 62 L. J. M. C. 107.

14. Water supply—Landowner—Private road—"Street"—Entry and digging up without consent of owner—Injunction—Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847 (10 & 11 Vict. c. 17), ss. 28, 29—Public Health Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), ss. 4, 16, 54, 57.—Although a private road is a "street" within section 4 of the Public Health Act, 1875, the wide powers given to a local authority by sections 16 and 54 to carry water mains through any "street" in their district for the supply of water within the district are controlled by section 57, incorporating section 29 of the Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847, which prohibits any private land being entered upon and broken up for the purpose of laying mains without the consent of the owner; and the court will therefore grant an injunction at the instance of the owner of any private road entered upon by the local authority for the purpose without his consent. Hill v. Wallasey Local Board, CH.D. KEK., J.—[1892] 3 Ch. 117; 62 L. J. Ch. 132; 67 L. T. 49.

15. Water supply—Entry on land without district—Notice required—Consent of adjoining authority—Public Health Act. 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), ss. 16, 32, 54, 285.—A joint board duly constituted as a local authority within the Public Health Act for the purpose of supplying their united district with water gave notice under the Public Health Act, s. 16, to a landowner whose lands lay without their district of their intention to enter his lands to lay water mains; but they did not comply with the requirements of section 32 as to giving notice of the intended work by advertisement, and serving a copy of such notice on the owners and occupiers of the land on which the work was to be made. The defendant board had, however, obtained leave under section 285 from the adjoining local authority, in whose district the said lands were situate, to lay the mains. The board had not yet actually supplied any water. On motion to restrain the board from entering the said lands,

Held, by North, J., that the board were "a local authority supplying water within their district" within the meaning of the Public Health Act, s. 54; and that, therefore, by virtue of sections 54 and 16 read together, the board had the same rights and duties with respect to the laying of water mains without their district as they had with respect to sewage.

Held, by the Court of Appeal (affirming North, J.), that, as the board had not given the notices required by section 32, they must be restrained from entering on the plaintiff's lands; and that the fact of the leave of the adjoining local authority having been obtained under section 285 did not dispense with the necessity of giving the notices required by section 32.—Jones v. Conway and Colwyn Bay Joint Water Supply Board, C.A. 616—[1893] 2 Ch. 603.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT (IRELAND):—

1. Election—Town commissioners—Ordinary and casual vacancies—Co-optation.—Election of town commissioners at Nenagh, Held, partly good and partly bad.—Reg. v. Ryan, Q.B.D. (Ir.)—30 L. R. Ir. 533.

2. Rates—Military barracks—Exemption—General assessment—Liability of lessor to rates in respect of half rent issuing out of premises—Exempt from rate—17 & 18 Vict. c. 8, s. 2—Towns Improvement Act, 1854, s. 60.—Premises used as military barracks in Tralee were exempt from rates under 17 & 18 Vict. c. 8, s. 2. The premises were demised by the plaintiff for a term still unexpired, and the plaintiff was assessed under section 60 of the Towns Improvement Act, 1854, as liable to rates for half the rent received by him.

Held, that a lessor assessed in respect of half rent under 17 & 18 Vict. c. 8 should be dealt with as an occupier, and is therefore liable to the general assessment under the Towns Improvement Act, 1854.—O'Connell v. Tralee Town Commissioners, Q.B.D. (Ir.)—32 L. R. Ir. 198.

3. Rates—Sanitary rate—Railway company—Partial exemption—City of Dublin—Public Health (Ireland) Act, 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 52), s. 226.—By the Dublin Improvement Act, 1849, s. 115, the corporation were empowered to assess and levy an improvement rate for defraying the expenses of carrying out the Act, which contained certain sanitary provisions, but no power of levying a separate sanitary rate. By the Public Health (Ireland) Act, 1874, Ireland was divided into urban and rural sanitary districts, and the City of Dublin was made an urban sanitary district, and the corporation the urban sanitary authority. This latter Act was repealed by the Public Health (Ireland) Act, 1878, which by section 226 enacted that all expenses incurred or payable by an urban sanitary authority in the execution of this Act, and not otherwise provided for, should be defrayed out of the borough fund or borough rate, and "where any such rate shall be made and levied by any corporation becoming at any time after the passing of this Act an urban sanitary authority, all land used as . . . a railway . . . for public conveyance shall be assessed and liable in proportion of one-fourth only of the net annual value of such lands respectively."

Held (reversing the decision of the Queen's Bench Division) that the Dublin Town Council had not become an urban sanitary authority after the passing of the Public Health (Ireland) Act, 1878, and therefore the lands of the defendant railway company, used as a railway, were liable to the rates leviable under the Dublin Improvement Act, 1849, including the portion required to defray sanitary expenses, and were not assessable, as regards sanitary expenses, in the proportion of one-fourth part only of the net annual value of such lands.—Kennedy v. Great Southern and Western Railway Co., C.A. 2. Contract — Contract to keep road in repair — Subsequent lunacy of contractor—Liability of surety—Right of indemnity—Grand Jury (Ireland) Act (6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 116).—A., with B. as surety, entered into a recognizance for the due execution by A. of a contract with a grand jury to keep a portion of a road in repair for three years. Before the completion of the contract A. became of unsound mind, and was afterwards found a lunatic by inquisition. B., having been required by the county surveyor to do so, completed the contract.

Held, that the contract was not terminated by the lunacy of the contractor, and that B. was entitled to recover the amount expended by him in executing the contract from A. sued by his committee.—Tracey v. M'Cabe, EX.D. (Ir.)—32 L. R. Ir. 21.

The interview took place in private, and the medical practitioner stated the result of his examination in the form of a letter addressed to the solicitors of the petitioner.

Held, (1) that under section 26 of the Lunacy Act, 1891, there was no obligation on the medical practitioner to make any report whatever; and (2) that the report which he did make was in the nature of the proof of a witness to be called upon behalf of the petitioner at the hearing, and that the respondent was not entitled to see or to have a copy of it before the trial of the inquiry.

If the medical practitioner had been so appointed as to occupy the position of an officer of the court, or in order to report to the court, then his report ought not to be produced to either party before the trial without the leave of the court.—In re B. (an alleged Lunatic), LUN.—[1892] 3 Ch. 194; 61 L. 4. Practice — Costs — Inquiry — Verdict of sanity —Discretion of judge in lunacy—Appeal—Order charging costs on stock belonging to alleged lunatic—Power to order sale or transfer of stock—Lunacy Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 5), s. 109—Ord. 46, r. 1—Judicature Act, 1873, ss. 18 (5), 49—Judicature Act, 1884 (47 & 48 Vict. c. 61), s. 14.—Where the result of a lunacy inquiry is that the person who was alleged to be a lunatic is found to be of sound mind, the judge in lunacy, in exercising his discretion over the costs of the inquiry under section 109 of the Lunacy Act, 1890, may, if the application for the inquiry seems to him to have been prompted by a desire to protect the person and property of the alleged lunatic, and to have been made on reasonable grounds and in a reasonable manner, order the costs of the applicant to be paid by the person who was alleged to be a lunatic.

If an order made under this section charges the amount of such costs on stock standing in the name of the alleged lunatic, this does not constitute a charging order within the meaning of ord. 46, r. 1; and therefore the procedure laid down in 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110 is not applicable. Such order may further direct the alleged lunatic to transfer an amount of such stock sufficient to satisfy the said costs. If the alleged lunatic fails to comply with this direction, an order may be made, under section 14 of the Judicature Act, 1884, directing the official solicitor to make the necessary transfer.

An appeal lies to the Court of Appeal from an order of the Lords Justices dealing with the costs of a lunacy inquiry under section 109 of the Lunacy Act, 1890.

T. 702) for a sale of the lunatic's interest in the funds (without prejudice to any question which might arise in the event of an appointment by her in favour of remoter issue should she ultimately recover), coupled with a declaration that the lunatic's interest should be charged with recouping to the trustees, to be held upon the trusts of the settlement, all sums raised and paid under the order, with interest and costs.—In re Hirst, LUN.—68 L. After her confinement the husband refused to allow her to return to cohabitation with him or to contribute towards her maintenance, and she remained at her mother's house.

Held, that the husband had deserted his wife, and that the justices in Devonshire had jurisdiction under section 1 of the Married Women (Maintenance in Case of Desertion) Act, 1886, to order the husband to contribute towards her maintenance.

2. Joint tenancy—Tenancy by entireties—Divorce—Married Women's Property Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 75), ss. 1, 5.—A husband and wife purchased real property, some of which was conveyed to them jointly before the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, and some after it. The husband and wife were subsequently divorced.

Held, that the decree absolute in the divorce proceedings rendered them joint tenants as regards property conveyed to them before the said Act, even though before it they were tenants by entireties; that, as regards property conveyed to them as joint tenants since the Act, the wife's share belonged to her for her separate use; and that she was entitled to an account of the rents and profits.—Thornley v. Thornley, CH.D. She subsequently mortgaged her life interest, and the mortgagee obtained judgment against her in an action on her covenant to pay the mortgage debt.

Held, that, notwithstanding sections 21 and 26 of the Divorce and Matrimonial Causes Act, the restraint on anticipation still attached, and therefore a receiver of the rents and profits of the leasehold property could not be appointed by way of equitable execution.—Hill v. Cooper, C.A. 500—[1893] 2 Q. B. 85; 62 L. J. Q. B. 423.

5. Separate estate—Restraint on anticipation — Ante-nuptial debts—Settlement made by stranger—Married Women's Property Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 75), ss. 13, 19.—A clause restraining alienation in a settlement made upon a feme sole by another person of property settled to her separate use will not, on the clause becoming operative by her marriage after the passing of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, protect such property from the claims of her ante-nuptial creditors.—Kirk v. Murphy, EX.D. 6. Separate estate—Settlement by husband and wife —Infancy of wife—Subsequent repudiation—Married Women's Property Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 75), ss. 2, 19.—The 19th section of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, enacts that nothing in the Act shall interfere with or affect any settlement or agreement for a settlement respecting a married woman's property.

Any property of a woman married after the commencement of the Act which would have been bound, apart from the Act, by an assignment of the husband alone in a settlement, is still bound by such assignment in virtue of the 19th section, notwithstanding the 2nd section of the Act, which makes the property of a woman married after the Act her separate property.

MASTER and SERVANT:—

1. Apprentice—Infant—Stipulation in apprenticeship deed not for benefit of infant—Validity—Employers and Workmen Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 90), s. 6.—An apprenticeship deed contained a stipulation that the master should not be liable to pay any wages to the apprentice, an infant, so long as his business should be interrupted or impeded by or in consequence of any turn out; and that the apprentice might employ himself in any other manner or with any other person for his own benefit during any such turn out, and for such reasonable time thereafter as might be necessary to enable him to determine such employment.

Held, that this stipulation was unfair to the infant, and rendered the contract as a whole unfair as against him; and that, therefore, the apprenticeship deed was invalid.

2. Employers' Liability Act, 1880 (43 & 44 Vict. c. 42), s. 1, sub-sections 1, 4—Defect in condition of machinery—Reasonable fitness—Absence of sufficient safeguard.—A defect in the condition of machinery within section 1, sub-section 1, of the Employers' Liability Act, 1880, means the absence of reasonable fitness to secure safety in the operation for which it is intended.

An employer who uses machinery, not in itself defective, the handling of which he knows is intrusted to such men as stevedores' labourers, is not entitled to have excluded from the consideration of its reasonable fitness an obvious chance of danger through their want of care.

The absence of any sufficient safeguard against danger arising from an ordinary and probable occurrence, as a slip in the management of a winch, is a defect.—Stanton v. Scrutton & Sons, Q.B.D.—62 L. J. Q. B. 405.

3. Employers' Liability Act, 1880 (43 & 44 Vict. c. 42), s. 1, sub-sections 1, 4—Defect in condition of machinery — Negligence — Dangerous employment.—Machinery could be worked by the servant employed in a reasonable manner without danger to himself. No instructions were given to him to work it in a mode which would endanger his safety. The safe mode, as well as the dangerous mode, of working was known to him, the danger of the latter being apparent. In an action against the employers to recover damages for the death of the servant, caused by working the machine in a dangerous way,

Held, that there was no evidence of negligence on the part of the defendants.—Noonan v. Dublin Distillery Co., EX.D. (Ir.)—32 L. R. Ir. 399.

4. Negligence—Master's liability—Employment of servant by third party—Negligence of servant while so employed.—The defendants entered into an agreement with a wharfinger, who was engaged in loading and unloading barges at a wharf, to let him have the use of a steam crane and a man who was engaged and paid by the defendants to work it whenever he required the same, for £50 a year. While the wharfinger was engaged in loading a barge at the wharf, one of his men was injured by the negligent act of the man working the crane in the course of the loading.

Held (affirming the judgment of Pollock, B.), that, though the man who was working the crane was the general servant of the defendants, the defendants were not liable, for, at the time of the accident, the man working the crane was employed under the orders and control of the wharfinger, and for that particular employment he must be regarded as the servant of the wharfinger, and not as the servant of the defendants.—Donovan v. Laing, Wharton, and Down Construction Syndicate (Limited), C.A. 455—[1893] 1 Q. B. 629; 68 L. T. 512.

5. Negligence—Common employment—Stevedore and servant.—To an action to recover damages for injury caused by the defendants' servant, the defence of common employment is not applicable, unless the plaintiff was, at the time of the injury, in the defendants' actual employment in the relationship of master and servant.

Where the defendants were stevedores, the plaintiff a servant of the shipmaster on whose ship the injury was caused, and the person whose negligence caused the injury was a servant of the stevedores,

Held, that the defence of common employment was not available.

6. Wages—Payment otherwise than in current coin —Deductions—Truck Act, 1831 (1 & 2 Will. 4, c. 37),

s. 23.—The plaintiff, upon entering the employment of the defendants, signed an agreement to conform to all the rules of the defendants' works. One of the rules provided that the employés were to become members of the sick and accident club connected with the works, and were to contribute weekly to its funds according to the amount of wages received by each. The amount of the plaintiff's contribution was deducted weekly from her wages and paid over to the sick and accident fund. In an action by the plaintiff to recover as arrears of wages the deductions so made, except those in respect of medicine and medical attendance, Held, that the agreement under which the deductions were made was illegal under the Truck Act, and therefore could not justify the deductions being made, nor could it be vouched as an authority by the plaintiff to the defendants to pay the contributions for her to the fund; but that the plaintiff, by her conduct and acquiescence, had precluded herself from recovering the amount so paid. —Hewlett v. Allen & Sons, C.A. 197—[1892] 2 Q. B. 662; 62 L. J. Q. B. 9; 67 L. T. 457.

7. "Workman"—Person employed on ship engaged in traffic in rivers and estuaries—"Seagoing ship"—Employers and Workmen Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 90)—Merchant Shipping Act, 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104), ss. 109, 243.—A ship engaged in carrying cargo upon rivers and their estuaries, although it may be capable of going to sea, is not a "seagoing ship" within the meaning of section 109 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854. Therefore the provisions of section 243 of that Act for the punishment of offences by seamen do not apply to a man who is employed upon such a ship, and he may be dealt with under the Employers and Workmen Act, 1875.—Salt Union v. Wood, Q.B.D. 301—[1893] 1 Q. MAYOR'S COURT:—

Removal of action — Certiorari — Discretion of judge—Borough and Local Courts of Record Act, 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. c. 86), schedule, clause 12.—By clause 12 in the schedule to the Borough and Local Courts of Record Act, 1872, which has been applied by Order in Council to the Mayor's Court, "No action entered in the court shall before judgment be removed or removable from the court into any superior court by any writ or process, except by leave of a judge of one of the superior courts in cases which shall appear to such judge fit to be tried in one of the superior courts."

Held, that the question whether an action was fit to be tried in the superior court was a matter of opinion for the judge, and that he had a discretion in all cases as to whether an action should be removed into the superior court.

Per Lord Esher, M.R., and A. L. Smith, L.JJ. —The words "fit to be tried" mean "ought to be tried" in the superior court.—Banks v. Hollingsworth, C.A. 225—[1893] 1 Q. B. 442; 62 L. J. Q. B. 239; 68 L. T. 477.

MEDICAL PRACTITIONER:—

Faculty of Physicians—Faculty of Surgeons—Right of College of Physicians to hold examinations and grant diplomas in surgery as well as medicine—32 Hen. 8, c. 40, s. 3—Medical Acts, 1858, and 1886 (21 & 22 Vict. c. 90; 49 & 50 Vict. c. 48).—The plaintiffs claimed a declaration that they were, at the passing of the Medical Act, 1886, a medical corporation legally qualified to grant diplomas conferring the right of registration under the Medical Acts then in force in respect of medicine and surgery, and were entitled independently, and without acting in combination with any other medical corporation or body, to hold such qualifying examinations in medicine, surgery, and midwifery as mentioned in the Act of 1886, and to confer by their single diplomas on their members and licentiates who had passed such qualifying examinations the right of registration under the Medical Acts at present in force.

The plaintiffs were a corporation incorporated by Royal Charter by King Henry VIII. in 1518.

The charter was ratified and confirmed by various subsequent Acts of Parliament, and the powers of the plaintiffs were enlarged by section 3 of 32 Hen. 8, c. 40.

The defendants were established by the Medical Act, 1858, and were directed to publish annually a medical register.

The defendants did not dispute that the plaintiffs were legally qualified to independently hold examinations and grant diplomas in respect of medicine, but they contended that the plaintiffs could not grant diplomas in respect of surgery.

Held, that the provisions of section 3 of 32 Hen. 8, c. 40 embraced the general art of healing, whether by drugs or surgery, and were not confined to healing by drugs; that the plaintiffs were, at the date of the passing of the Medical Act, 1886, a corporation legally qualified to grant diplomas in respect of medicine and surgery; and that they were, therefore, the persons designated by the statute to hold examinations. — Royal College of Physicians of London v. General Medical Council, Q.B.D.—62 L. MERCHANDISE MARKS ACT:—

"False trade description"—Place of manufacture and production—Merchandise Marks Act, 1887 (50 & 51 Vict. c. 28), ss. 2, 3.—At his establishment in Ireland the appellant, Lipton, sold under the descriptions (a) "Lipton's prime mild cured," and (b) "Finest quality smoked ham, own cure at Lipton's market," hams which had been manufactured and cured by him in America.

Held, that neither of the descriptions was a "false trade description" within section 2 of the Merchandise Marks Act, 1887.

The appellant also sold hams under the description "Tracey's Mild Cure," Tracey being the name of his foreman curer.

Held, that the appellant was rightly convicted of an offence under section 3, sub-section 3, of the Act.—Reg. v. Lipton, Q.B.D. (Ir.)—32 L. R. Ir. 113.

METROPOLIS:—

1. Building—Notice by district surveyor—Alteration after building completed—Metropolitan Building Act, 1855 (18 & 19 Vict. c. 122), ss. 45, 46, 105.—Under section 45 of the Metropolitan Building Act, 1855, a district surveyor has power to give to a builder engaged in erecting a building notice requiring alterations to be made in the work, and by section 46 a justice of the peace may order a builder to comply with the requisitions of the notice.

Held, that, where the notice is not served on the builder until after the building is completed, the builder cannot be ordered to comply with the notice.—Smith v. Legg, Q.B.D. 464—[1893] 1 Q. B. 398; 68 L. T. 347.

2. Building—Notice to district surveyor—Commencement of new building—Building "used for the purposes of" a canal — Exemption — Metropolitan Building Act, 1855 (18 & 19 Vict. c. 122), ss. 6, 38. —By section 38 of the Metropolitan Building Act, 1855, two days before any building is commenced notice in writing, stating certain particulars, is required to be given by the builder to the district surveyor.

By section 6, "buildings belonging to any canal, dock, or railway company, and used for the purposes of such canal, dock, or railway under the provisions of any Act of Parliament," are exempt from the operation of the first part of the Act (including section 38.

A canal company, under their statutory powers, erected a building upon one of their wharves and let it to tenants who used it, in the course of their business, as a place for chopping up firewood. The company were not carriers, but received tolls in respect of the passage of barges over their canal; and it was arranged between them and the tenants that all the wood to be chopped in the building should be carried to the wharf in barges along the canal.

Held, that, the building was not "used for the purposes of the canal" within the meaning of section 6 of the Metropolitan Building Act, 1855, and that it was the duty of the builder to give notice to the district surveyor before commencing to build.—Coole v. Lovegrove, Q.B.D. 570—[1893] 2 Q. B. 44; 69 L. T. 19.

2a. Building—Height—"Erected on the side of any new street"—Metropolis Local Management Amendment Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 102), s. 85.—Section 85 of the Metropolis Local Management Amendment Act, 1862, provides that no building shall be erected on the side of any new street which shall exceed the height specified in the section.

A building was erected at the corner of two streets, one being a new street within the Act, and the other not such a street. The main entrance to the building was from the old street, but there was a small tradesmen's entrance from the area at the side of the building in the new street.

Held, that the building was erected on the side of the new street within the meaning of the section.—London County Council v. Lawrance & Sons, Q.B.D. 688—[1893] 2 Q. B. 228.

3. Building—Street—Addition to old buildings — Extension of boundary fence — Distance from centre of road — "Existing street" — Metropolis Management and Building Acts Amendment Act, 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 32), s. 6.—It is provided by 41 & 42 Vict. c. 32, s. 6, that from and after the passing of that Act no house or building shall be extended in such manner that the external wall or front of any such house or building, or if there be a forecourt or other space left in front of any such house or building, the external fence or boundary of such forecourt or other space shall be at a distance less than the prescribed distance from the centre of the roadway, provided the construction or extension of any house or building in or abutting upon any street existing at the time of the passing of the Act may be begun and completed in like manner in every respect as if the preceding provision of this section had not been made.

The appellant was the owner of a house and garden abutting upon an old public carriageway. The house of the appellant, as well as several others, were erected on either side of the road prior to the passing of the above-mentioned Act. In 1889, the appellant pulled down the wall which separated his garden from the road, and erected a new fence a few feet further back from the road. He subsequently commenced to build shops upon the site of the garden, and extended his boundary fence to its original position, which was less than the prescribed distance from the centre of the roadway. The respondents required him to set back his boundary fence.

Held, that the road was an "existing street" at the time of the passing of the above-mentioned Act, and that therefore the appellant could not be required to set back his boundary fence.—Ellis v. London County Council, Q.B.D.—67 L. T. 558.

4. Building line—"Building, structure, or erection"—Boundary wall or fence—Forecourts or spaces —Metropolis Local Management Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 102), s. 75.—Section 75 of the Metropolis Management Act, 1862, is not intended, under the conditions specified in the section, to prevent an owner erecting such a wall or fence as would be a reasonable ascertainment of, and protection to, his property; and it must be left to the good sense and discretion of the magistrate to say in each case whether a wall or fence is so, or whether, by not being bonâ fide confined to that object, it becomes a "building, structure, or erection" within the meaning of the section.—Ellis v. Plumstead Board of Works, Q.B.D. 496—68 L. T. 291.

5. Nuisance—Repair of drain—Drain repaired so as to be a nuisance—Builder employed by owner to do repair—Liability of builder in first instance for the nuisance—Public Health (London) Act, 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 76), s. 42.—A builder who is employed by the owner of a dwelling-house to repair a drain, and who repairs it so as to be a nuisance and injurious to health, is "the person who undertook or executed the repair" of the drain within the meaning of the 42nd section of the Public Health (London) Act, 1891, and may be proceeded against under that section in the first instance, although the owner is not summoned.—Young v. Fosten, Q.B.D. 589.

6. Obstruction in street—Exposure of goods for sale in street—Costermongers—Inconsistent enactments—Implied repeal—57 Geo. 3, c. xxix., s. 65—Metropolitan Streets Acts, 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 134), s. 6, and 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 5), s. 1—Metropolis Police Act, 1839 (2 & 3 Vict. c. 47), s. 74.—The provisions contained in the Metropolitan Streets Acts, 1867 (section 6) and 1868 (section 1), as to the deposit of goods in streets and for the regulation of the business of costermongers and itinerant traders, are inconsistent with the powers given to metropolitan local authorities by section 65 of 57 Geo. 3, c. xxix. (Michael Angelo Taylor's Act) to order the removal of goods, barrows, &c., from carriageways and footways; that section is therefore impliedly repealed so far as it affects costermongers, and a conviction of a costermonger for an offence under it cannot be sustained.—Summers v. Holborn District Board of Works, Q.B.D. 445—[1893] 1 Q. B. 612; 62 L. J. M. C. 81; 68 L. T. 226.

7. *Police Acts—Magistrate—Jurisdiction—Penalty —Imprisonment in default of payment of—Street musician—*2 & 3 Vict. c. 47, s. 77—27 & 28 Vict. c. 55, s. 1.—By 2 & 3 Vict. c. 47, s. 57, a street musician who played on a musical instrument in a thoroughfare near any house, after being required by the householder for reasonable cause to depart, was made liable to a penalty of forty shillings. By section 77 of the same Act a magistrate is empowered, in case of the non-payment of a pecuniary penalty under the Act, to commit the offender to prison for not more than one month.

By 27 & 28 Vict. c. 55, s. 1: "Section 57 of 2 & 3 Vict. c. 47 is hereby repealed, and in lieu thereof the following provision shall take effect"; the section then proceeds to re-enact the offence under the repealed section, and provides that "the offender shall be liable to a penalty of not more than forty shillings, or, in the discretion of the magistrate before whom he shall be convicted, may be imprisoned for any time not more than three days."

A. was charged with an offence under the last-mentioned section before a metropolitan police magistrate. He was convicted and fined forty shillings, and, in default of payment of the fine, was committed to prison for one month. Upon a rule nisi for a certiorari to quash the conviction, Held, discharging the rule, that section 77 of 2 & 3 Vict. c. 47 was not, by the provisions of section 1 of 27 & 28 Vict. c. 55, rendered inapplicable to the enforcement by imprisonment of a penalty under that section, and that the conviction was good.—Reg. v. Hopkins, Q.B.D. 431—[1893] 1 Q. B. 621; 62 L. J. M. C. 57; 68 L. T. 292.

8. Refuse — Neglect to remove — Contract with scavengers — Liability of local authority shifted—Metropolis Local Management Act, 1855 (18 & 19 Vict. c. 120), ss. 125-129.—The duty imposed on vestries and district boards by section 125 of the Metropolis Local Management Act, 1855, as to the removal of house refuse within their parish or district is discharged by their entering into a bonâ fide contract with scavengers to execute and perform the work; and such vestries and district boards cannot, in such cases, be made liable in damages for the scavengers' neglect to properly carry out their contract.

9. Sky signs—Control by County Council—London Sky Signs Act, 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. lxxviii.), ss. 5, 13. —The defendant had erected previous to the enactment of the London Sky Signs Act, 1891, and retained subsequent to that enactment without the licence of the London County Council, a structure of the following kind:—The structure consisted of a tower fifty feet high upon the top of the defendant's business premises, in the shape of a windmill, upon the fantails of which were painted the words, "Carwardine wheatmeal, oatmeal, flour." Half way up the tower was a gallery, with an open balustrade, consisting of iron letters, spelling the name "Carwardine." The letters were affixed to an iron rod. The whole structure was formed of baulks of timber braced together by iron rods, and the lower end was securely tied down to girders supporting the top floor of the defendant's premises. Upon a summons before the magistrate for retaining the said structure as an advertisement without the licence of the County Council, contrary to the provisions of the London Sky Signs Act, 1891, the magistrate found that the structure, taken as a whole, was a bonâ fide windmill, used for hoisting and driving purposes, and only incidentally for purposes of advertisement, and dismissed the summons, subject to a special case being stated.

Held, that the structure came within the definition given in section 5 of the Sky Signs Act, 1891, on the ground that, so long as it had the words and letters upon it as above-mentioned, it was "a sign, device, or representation in the nature of an advertisement," and that it was immaterial whether the structure was wholly or only in part erected or used for purposes of advertisement.—London County Council v. Carwardine, Q.B.D.—62 L. J. M. C. 40; 68 L. T. 761.

9a. Valuation—Valuation list—Appeals—Time for hearing appeals—Whether assessment sessions has jurisdiction to hear appeals after the 31st of March in each year—Valuation of Property (Metropolis) Act, 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 67), s. 42, sub-section 13.—Section 42 of the Valuation of Property (Metropolis) Act, 1869, provides:—"With respect to the times within which proceedings under this Act and the Acts incorporated herewith are to be done, the following provisions shall have effect—that is to say: (13) The justices may hold the assessment sessions at any time after the 1st of February in the same year, which will enable them to determine all appeals (except where a valuation list or valuation is ordered) before the ensuing 31st of March."

Held, that the provisions in this sub-section as to the time of hearing of appeals are imperative, and not directory; so that the court has no jurisdiction to hear the year's appeals after the 31st of March in each year.—Reg. v. Justices of London and the London County Council, Q.B.D. 668.

10. Water supply—Metropolis—Cutting off water supply—Temporary stoppage by water company to stop leakage—Whether this is a "cutting off"—Notice to vestry—Public Health (London) Act, 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 76), s. 49.—A water company, which supplied a certain dwelling-house with water, turned off the water by turning down the stopcock in the service pipe, and this was done solely to prevent waste of water through a certain leak in the service pipe. The stopcock and service pipe were the property of the landlord of the house, and, when the leak was repaired by the landlord, he turned on the water again by opening the stopcock.

Held, that, upon the facts, a magistrate was justified in coming to the conclusion that there was no "cutting off" of the water supply by the company within the meaning of section 49 of the Public Health (London) Act, 1891, and, therefore, no necessity for the water company to give notice under that section to the sanitary authority.—Young v. Southwark and Vauxhall Water Co., Q.B.D. 622.

MINE:—

1. Fencing—Working discontinued—Mine abandoned—Securely fencing side entrance—Metalliferous Mines Regulation Act, 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. c. 77), s. 13.—After the passing of the Metalliferous Mines Regulation Act, 1872, a copper mine was abandoned and the working thereof discontined. There was a side entrance into the mine, which was, for the purposes of the arguments and judgment, assumed not to be dangerous. The only fence round or about the side entrance was a stone wall erected many years previously to the mine being abandoned. The wall enclosed an area of about ten acres, and within this area the mine and side entrance were situated.

Held, that the side entrance was not securely fenced within the meaning of section 13 of the Act. —Foster v. Owen, Q.B.D. 240—62 L. J. M. C. 7; 67 L. T. 712.

2. Licence to work—Tenant for life—Revocable licence.—A tenant for life of real estate having under a power in a will agreed with the plaintiff that the latter should take from her certain bog ore for three years, and after the three years he should be entitled to continue raising the ore on payment of a royalty. After the expiration of the three years the tenant for life commenced raising ore. In an action for an injunction to restrain her (1) from raising the ore and from carrying away the ore already raised, and (2) from impeding the plaintiff in raising and removing the ore, and for damages,

Held, that after the expiration of the three years the licence was revocable, and that the plaintiff was not entitled to the injunction, but that he was entitled to damages for the removal of the ore already raised by him.—Stanley v. Riky, C.A. (Ir.)—31 L. R. Ir. 196.

3. Offence—Use of naked lights in coal mine—"Owner, agent, and manager" each liable—Managing director appointing a certificated manager—Liability of managing director as "agent"—Reasonable precautions by publishing rules—Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1887 (50 & 51 Vict. c. 58), ss. 49 (r. 8), 50.—Section 50 of the Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1887, provides that, "in the event of any contravention or non-compliance with any of the general rules . . . by any person whomsoever, the owner, agent, and manager shall each be guilty of an offence against this Act, unless he proves that he had taken all reasonable means, by publishing and to the best of his power enforcing the said rules as regulations for the working of the mine, &c."

A limited company were the owners of a coal mine of which the respondent was the managing director; but the respondent did not interfere with the actual management of the mine underground, which was left in the hands of a duly certificated manager, under the Coal Mines Regulation Act, who was the manager of the colliery, and was in charge thereof. The respondent, as managing director, occasionally visited the mine, but he had in no way interfered with the manager in his duties, though he had authorized all necessary expenditure for the safety and conduct of the mine, and had duly published at the mine the rules under the Mines Act and the abstract of the Act itself. An offence having been committed by the use of naked lights in the mine on a day when the respondent was not at the mine,

Held, (1) that the respondent, as managing director, was "agent" of the mine within the meaning of the Act, and was legally responsible as such; but (2) that he had, by publishing and to the best of his power enforcing the rules as regulations for the working of the mine, taken all reasonable means, within section 50 of the Act, to prevent such contravention of the rules, and was therefore not liable to be convicted for the offence.—Stokes v. Checkland, Q.B.D.—68 L. T. 457.

4. Wages—Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1887 (50 & 51 Vict. c. 58), s. 12—Payment by weight—Deductions—Fines—Contract of employment—Agreement for allowance of fines—Validity of contract.—According to the true construction of section 12 of the Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1887, which provides for the payment of miners by weight, subject to the right of masters and men to agree upon certain deductions, the "deductions" therein mentioned are deductions from weight, not from wages. That from which the deduction is to be made is the whole amount of material which is sent up in tubs from the mine. That which is to be deducted is the foreign substance which is sent up in the tubs with the coal, or the slack or coal dust with which the tubs are improperly filled. Any other mode of making deductions is in contravention of the statute.

The appellant entered into a contract of employment with the respondents, who were the owners of a colliery, by which he agreed not to leave his employment without giving fourteen days' notice, and further agreed that deductions might be made from his wages in respect of (inter alia) "fines for dirt." A system of fines and forfeitures was in force at the colliery in respect of dirt sent up with the coal, under which, if a collier sent up a tub containing more than 35lb. of dirt, he was to receive no payment in respect of such tub; if a tub contained between 25lb. and 35lb. of dirt, he was to receive half payment; and if a tub contained less than 25lb. of dirt, he was to receive full payment.

The appellant having left his employment without giving notice, and having justified on the ground that the above system was unlawful, and therefore the contract of employment was illegal,

Held, that such fines and forfeitures were not deductions within the meaning of section 12 of the Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1887, and that the system adopted was in contravention thereof; but that the contract of employment was not thereby rendered illegal, and the appellant was liable in damages to the respondents.

MORTGAGE:—

1. Accounts—Mortgage of life estate—Second mortgage—Mortgage of the fee—Conveyancing Act, 1881, ss. 19, 24.—In 1866 A., who was mortgagee of the estate of the tenant for life in lands, appointed by deed a receiver under section 19 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881. The deed provided that the receiver should apply all moneys received by him in manner directed by section 24 of that Act, save that, in priority to all other charges except rent, rates, and taxes specified in section 24, sub-section 8 (1), he should pay any reasonable costs or charges incurred by A. An absolute order for sale was made in 1890, and on A.'s application a receiver was appointed by the court. On settling the schedule of priorities, on which prior and puisne incumbrancers appeared, it was referred to an examiner to take an account of what was due on A.'s mortgage, and A. showed in detail by affidavit the amount which had accrued due for interest and premiums on policies, and the sums which he had received on account through B. or otherwise.

Held, that incumbrancers on the fee and puisne incumbrancers on the life estate were not entitled to an order directing a further affidavit to be filed, accounting for the rents and profits received by B. from the date of his appointment before the inquiry should be further proceeded with.—In re Della Rocella's Estate, L.J. (Ir.)—29 L. R. Ir. 464.

2. Conveyance for value without reference to mortgage—Covenant for further assurance—Indemnity against mortgage debt—Partition—Expenditure by one tenant in common in improvements—Contribution.—The owner of an estate mortgaged, and afterwards sold, an undivided moiety of it. The conveyance to the purchaser did not mention the mortgage, but it contained a covenant by the vendor for further assurance. The two moieties afterwards devolved upon different persons. In a partition action,

Held, that, as between the owners of the two moieties, the unsold moiety must bear the mortgage debt.

The owner of one moiety of a property, who was also tenant for life of the whole, borrowed money on mortgage, which was, with other moneys, expended in permanently improving the property. In an action after her death for the partition of the property,

Held, that the present value of the improvements (but not exceeding the sum originally borrowed on mortgage) must be borne rateably by the owners of both moieties.

3. Costs of transfer—Charge on estate—Tenant for life.—F. devised real estate to trustees for a term of 2,000 years, upon trust to raise moneys in aid of his personal estate, and subject thereto in strict settlement. Large sums of money were raised under this trust, and amongst others a sum of £10,000 was raised by a mortgage, dated the 2nd of November, 1882, of a mansion-house and premises to M. and M. In 1890 M. and M. wished to call in their mortgage. At this time the estate of the tenant for life under the will had been assigned to the Law Life Assurance Society; the tenant in tail in remainder was an infant. The solicitors for the infant tenant in tail arranged for a transfer of the mortgage for £10,000, a small part of the security being released, and applied to the surviving trustee of the term to transfer the mortgage, and raise the costs of the transfer by a mortgage of the part so released for the residue of the term. The trustee refused to act without the direction of the court, as actions were pending relating to the testator's estate. An order was then made on a summons taken out by the infant tenant in tail (by his next friend), to which the trustee of the term was the only defendant, that the trustee should be at liberty to raise the sum of £10,000, which M. and M. had called in, by way of transfer of the hereditaments comprised in the said mortgage, except a small portion thereof, and that the costs of all parties should be raised by a further mortgage of the hereditaments comprised in the said term. The costs, £345, were raised by a mortgage by the trustee of the excepted portion, and the mortgagee now took out a summons for foreclosure and a receiver. The Law Life Assurance Society were made defendants, and opposed.

Held, that the trustee of the term had discharged his duties when the money to be raised under the said term was raised; that he had no duty to procure a transfer when the mortgage was called in, and had acted as a volunteer merely in so doing, and could not charge the costs of the transfer on the estate under the trusts of the term, and the mortgage was therefore not binding upon the tenant for life or his assignees, and that they were not bound by the order made on a summons to which they were not parties.—Sewell v. Bishopp, CH.D. NOR., J.—62 L. J. Ch. 615; 68 L. T. 323. [Reversed 69 L. T. 68.

4. Foreclosure—Claim for possession after decree absolute—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 18, r. 2.—In a foreclosure action the plaintiff did not ask for possession in his originating summons. An order for foreclosure absolute having been made, the plaintiff applied for delivery of possession.

Held, that after foreclosure absolute the court could make such order.—Jenkins v. Ridgley, CH.D. NOR., J. 585—68 L. T. 671.

5. Foreclosure — Parties — Trustees representing cestuis que trust—Ord. 16, r. 8.—L., by a memorandum dated the 25th of March, 1879, made an equitable mortgage of certain property to B. and J. L. died in 1886, having by his will given all his real and personal estate to trustees upon trust for sale and conversion, and in the events which happened to set aside the sum of £700, and stand possessed thereof upon trust to pay the income to his son, J. S. L., until the youngest child of his son should attain twenty-one, and then, if his said son's children should not receive £700 to which they would then be entitled under a certain settlement, upon trust for the said children, and subject thereto he gave all his real and personal estate in trust for his said son J. S. L. He appointed J. S. L. and others trustees and executors of his will; but, owing to their death or disclaimer, J. S. L. became the sole trustee of, and alone proved, the will. In 1890 the equitable mortgagees, B. and T., commenced a foreclosure action, making J. S. L. and his eldest daughter (the only one of his children who had attained twenty-one) and a second mortgagee defendants. An order for foreclosure absolute was made on the 20th of March, 1891, and on the 1st of August, 1891, B. and T. entered into a contract for sale of the mortgaged property as absolute owners. The purchaser objected that the infant children of J. S. L. ought to have been parties to the foreclosure action; that they were not foreclosed, and must join in the conveyance. The vendor declined to make them parties.

Held, that, as J. S. L. was executor as well as trustee of L.'s will, his infant children were sufficiently represented by him, and that the requisition was sufficiently answered.—In re Booth and Kettlewell, CH.D. NOR., J.—62 L. J. Ch. 40; 67 L. T. 550.

6. Foreclosure—Personal judgment on the covenant—Second action for interest—Vexatious action—Practice—Receiver—Interest claimed as liquidated sum—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 3, r. 6; ord. 14.—While an action by mortgagee for foreclosure and for personal judgment against the mortgagor on the covenant was pending, the mortgagee brought a second action against the mortgagor for payment of the interest on the mortgage down to the date of the second action.

Held (reversing Kekewich, J.), that the second action should be stayed as vexatious, because the interest claimed in the second action was recoverable in the first action according to the form of order settled by the Court of Appeal in Farrer v. Lacy, Hartland, & Co., 33 W. R. 265, 28 Ch. D. 482.

Where there is a receiver of mortgage hereditaments, although the rents be insufficient to keep down the interest on the mortgage debt, no liquidated sum can be claimed in respect of the interest, and therefore the mortgagee cannot issue a specially-indorsed writ claiming payment of a specific sum in respect of the interest.—Earl Poulett v. Lord Hill, C.A. 503—[1893] 1 Ch. 277; 62 L. J. Ch. 466; 68 L. T. 476.

7. Foreclosure—Receiver—Personal order for payment against mortgagor—Form of judgment.—In a foreclosure action, a receiver having been appointed, upon judgment, in default of appearance, for a personal order for payment against the mortgagor, and for foreclosure, the plaintiff must produce an affidavit to the registrar that since filing his statement of claim nothing has been received on account of principal or interest. As there were no special circumstances in this case, a proviso to the effect that "any person redeeming, or the plaintiff in event of foreclosure, might apply in chambers for transfer of any money in court to the credit of the action or in the hands of the receiver," was not allowed to be inserted.—Cheston v. Wells, CH.D. NOR., J. 374—[1893] 2 Ch. 151; 62 L. J. Ch. 468; 68 L. T. 197.

8. Foreclosure—Sale instead of foreclosure—Conveyancing and Law of Property Act, 1881 (44 & 45

Vict. c. 41), s. 25.—This was a foreclosure action, brought by a first mortgagee against second mortgagees, the representatives of the mortgagee's wife (who claimed a charge in respect of certain premiums paid by her upon policies of assurance on the mortgagor's life included in both mortgages) and the trustees in liquidation of the mortgagor. The mortgagor died pending the action, and the proceeds of the policies were applied in reduction of the amount due on the first mortgage. The property remaining subject to the mortgages consisted of eight pieces of property in different places, one being a residential estate, and the others plots of building land. At the hearing the second mortgagees and the representatives of the mortgagor's wife applied for a sale instead of a foreclosure. The first mortgagee opposed on the ground that the property could not be sold in one lot, and if it were put up in lots, the first mortgagee could not be protected by a reserve price, for the most valuable part of the property would probably be sold, and only a worthless part left as security for the balance of his debt. The trustees of the mortgagor also objected to a sale, on the ground that they believed the property would improve in value, and wished to redeem. In answer to the mortgagee's objection, it was suggested that the property might be put up for sale under conditions that no lot should be sold unless all were disposed of. There had been a previous application in chambers for a sale which had been refused.

Held, that the court was not bound by the refusal of the application in chambers, but no fresh evidence having been produced, and the court being of opinion that an attempt to sell under the conditions suggested would depreciate the value of the property, declined to exercise its discretion by ordering a sale.

Semble, the fact that a mortgaged property can only be sold in lots is a reason for refusing a sale if the first mortgagee objects. — Provident Clerks' Mutual Life Assurance Association v. Lewis, CH.D. NOR., J.—62 L. J. Ch. 89; 67 L. T. 644.

9. Priority—Executors—Negligence of one of legal mortgagee's executors—Subsequent equitable mortgage—Recovery of title deeds.—A mortgagee of leasehold property died, having by his will appointed his widow and his son executrix and executor, and he left all his estate to his widow for her life, with remainder to his son, and also gave to them, as joint tenants, his trust and mortgage estates. The widow and son duly proved the will. The widow took possession of the title deeds, and pressed for repayment of the mortgage debt. The mortgagor replied that he could only pay by raising a fresh loan, and that for that purpose he should require the title deeds. The widow sent the deeds to the mortgagor, who, being unable to borrow the money, purported to return them in a paper parcel. The widow died, and shortly afterwards the mortgagor also died. The son found only the mortgage deed in the parcel, the other deeds being missing; and it then appeared that the mortgagor had, in the lifetime of the widow, but without giving any notice of the existing mortgage, mortgaged the leasehold property to a bank, and had deposited the title deeds with them, but he had never paid off any part of either of the mortgages.

The son, who denied that he had any knowledge of the deeds having been sent to the mortgagor, claimed to be entitled to his security in priority to the bank, and asked that the bank should be ordered to deliver up the deeds to him as owner of the legal estate.

Held, that, whatever might have been the rights of the bank as against the widow, the son had not been guilty of fraud or of any such negligence as would postpone him to the bank; that he was entitled to priority, and that the deeds should be delivered to him.

The acts of one of several executors cannot bind their testator's estate so as to preclude other persons interested in that estate from relying on their legal title, unless the legal owner himself, or some predecessor of his in title, has personally either been guilty of misconduct or conferred on the mortgagor an apparent authority to deal with the mortgaged property as if it were unincumbered.—In re Ingham, Jones v. Ingham, CH.D. STI., J. 235—[1893] 1 Ch. 352; 62 L. J. Ch. 100; 68 L. T. 152.

10. Priority—Tacking.—In November, 1862, the S. trustees mortgaged certain lands, including the piece in question, to L., but by some accident the title deeds of the piece remained with the S. trustees. In January, 1883, the survivor of the S. trustees, together with the tenant for life, conveyed this piece to T., and he received the title deeds.

T., in February, 1883, mortgaged this piece of land to the appellants, but the title which he purported to show was a forgery.

In October, 1887, T. mortgaged the same piece of land to R., showing in his abstract the real title, and handing over the real title deeds.

R., having afterwards discovered that there was an outstanding mortgage in the representatives of L., asked them to release the piece of land from the mortgage debt secured by the indenture of November, 1862, and to convey the legal estate to the S. trustees discharged from the mortgage debt, upon the express condition that they should thereupon convey the legal estate to R. This was carried out.

Held, that R., thus getting in the legal estate, was not to be postponed to the prior equitable mortgagee.

Decision of the Court of Appeal (reported 39 W. R. 81, [1891] 1 Ch. 8) affirmed.—Taylor v. Russell, H.L. (E.) 43—[1892] A. C. 244; 66 L. T. 565.

11. Redemption—Mortgage of two properties—Release of one—Right to redeem both—Priorities—Apportionment.—On the 26th of October, 1876, P. mortgaged certain paper mills to H. to secure £6,000; and by a deed of even date he mortgaged a reversionary interest to H. as a further security for the £6,000.

On the 15th of May, 1882, P. mortgaged the same reversionary interest and paper mills to F. to secure £5,000, and on the 30th of April, 1884, P. mortgaged the paper mills to F. to secure £2,500.

On the 3rd of February, 1885, P. mortgaged the reversionary interest and paper mills to M. to secure £1,700. On the 15th of December, 1885, M. assigned the £1,700 due on the security of the 3rd of February, 1885, to certain transferees. By an indenture of the 30th of October, 1885, between F., P., and H., the sum of £2,500 secured by the mortgage of the 30th of April, 1884, was assigned to H. in consideration of the payment of £2,500 by H. to F., and in consideration of £4,000 advanced by H. to P. the paper mills were assured to H. in fee simple discharged from all principal money secured by the indenture of the 15th of May, 1882, and freed from all equity of redemption by virtue of the indenture of the 30th of April, 1884; and the reversionary interest was assigned to H. to further secure the £6,500. The effect of this was to make H. first and second mortgagee of the paper mills.

In March, 1889, F. brought a redemption and foreclosure action against the mortgagees and the mortgagor in respect of the reversionary interest comprised in the mortgage of the 15th of May, 1882, and obtained an order for foreclosure absolute. In May, 1890, the transferees of M. brought a redemption action against H. and others in respect of the mortgage of the 3rd of February, 1885, and obtained judgment, but without prejudice to the rights of F. as owner of the equity of redemption in the reversionary interest. This interest had fallen into possession, and the amount had been paid into court. In an action by F. against H., the transferees of M., P., and the trustees of the reversionary interest, F. claimed to redeem both the mortgages of the 26th of October, 1876.

Held, that F. was entitled to redeem the mortgages of the 26th of October, 1876, as to both properties, notwithstanding that he was a party to the deed of the 30th of October, 1885, and that he was also absolute owner of the reversionary interest; but that, if F. did redeem, there must be an apportionment of the amount to be borne by the paper mills and reversionary interest respectively.—Flint v. Howard, C.A.—[1893] 2 Ch. 54; 68 L. T. 390.

12. Redemption—Sale with option of repurchase—Personal option—Second mortgagee.—By an indenture, dated the 12th of March, 1888, A., in consideration of £2,000 paid to him by a life assurance company, covenanted, if he should survive his father, to pay to the company an annuity of £1,400 during his life; and A., as beneficial owner, conveyed to the company all the dividends, interest, and annual income of the proceeds of the sale of certain freehold, copyhold, and leasehold property, or of the property itself until sale, to have and to hold the same unto and to the use of the company and their assigns, "by way of security for the said annuity of £1,400." Under clause 4 of the deed A. might, upon giving to the company or their assigns one calendar month's notice of his intention to do so, and upon paying to the company or their assigns, on or before the 12th of March, 1890, the sum of £3,000, together with the amount of any additional premiums payable as thereinafter mentioned, and all costs and expenses, and all arrears (if any) of the said annuity of £1,400 up to the day of repurchase, repurchase the annuity, and the premises thereinbefore conveyed by him should upon such repurchase be reconveyed on his request and at his expense. By clause 8 it was provided that the deed should "be deemed to be a mortgage within the meaning of sections 19 to 24 inclusive of the Conveyancing and Law of Property Act, 1891"; and that the powers thereby conferred on mortgagees should be incorporated therein. By clause 10 the company had power to consolidate the deed with any other charge or mortgage. By an indenture dated the 31st of December, 1889, in consideration of £8,500, A., as beneficial owner, assigned to B. all his reversionary interest in the hereditaments before mentioned subject to the deed of the 12th of March, 1888. On the 11th of March, 1890, B., in pursuance of the 4th clause of the deed of the 12th of March, 1888, gave notice to the company of his intention to redeem the securities and repurchase the annuity. The money was tendered to the company first on behalf of B. then on behalf of A. The company refused the tender. An action was accordingly brought against the company by A. and B. claiming that they were entitled to redeem the property comprised in the deed of the 12th of March, 1888, and to have a reconveyance thereof.

Held, that the deed was a mortgage, and that the right of repurchase under clause 4 thereof was not a personal privilege, but one capable of assignment; and that, therefore, B. had the right to redeem the property.

Decision of Kekewich, J., affirmed.—Secretary of State for India v. British Empire Mutual Assurance Co., C.A.—67 L. T. 434.

13. Reversionary lease by mortgagor subsequent to date of mortgage—Sale in chancery at suit of judgment creditor—Impugning lease.—W. mortgaged certain land in 1789, and in 1793 he granted to the defendants' predecessor a reversionary lease of the land for 999 years to commence in 1884 for valuable consideration, and registered. In 1812, in a chancery suit by judgment creditors, holding judgments dated 1782 and 1788 respectively, to administer the real and personal estate of W., a decree was granted for the sale of the land, reserving leave to the plaintiffs therein to impeach the validity of any deeds made by W. subsequent to the date of their judgments. In 1815 the land was sold in court, and in 1817 was conveyed to the plaintiffs' predecessor. The mortgagees joined in the deed for the purpose of exonerating the land from their incumbrances merely. In an ejectment action by the representatives of the purchaser against the representatives of the lessee of the reversion,

Held, that all that the Court of Chancery could sell in such suit, and all that the purchaser in 1817 took, was, not the interest of the mortgagees in the land, but the interest of the mortgagor discharged from those mortgages; that, therefore, the representatives of the purchaser could not claim to stand in the place of such mortgagees, so as to impugn the subsequent reversionary lease; and that the action must fail.—Hassard v. Fowler, Q.B.D. (Ir.)—32 L. R. Ir. 49.

14. Sale—Proceeds of sale—Negligence—Payment of interest by agent—Trustee Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 59), s. 8.—The defendants were first mortgagees and the plaintiff second mortgagee of a property called "The Nest." The defendants in 1878 sold the property under their power of sale, the purchase-money being received by one J. S., a solicitor, who acted usually for the plaintiff and also for the defendants in any legal business. He gave the defendants a receipt for the balance of the purchase-money after payment of the sum due to them, the receipt stating that the balance was due to the plaintiff. J. S. never handed over the balance to the plaintiff, but continued to pay him interest as if from the defendants down to the year 1891, when he became bankrupt, and it was then discovered he had applied the surplus of the sale moneys to his own use.

Held, that the defendants were not liable to the plaintiff for the balance of the sale moneys, since, even if they had been guilty of negligence in not seeing that J. S. had authority from the plaintiff to receive the money for him, and in not seeing that J. S. paid it to him, section 8 of the Trustee Act, 1888, barred the claim, and the payment of interest by J. S. until 1891 did not keep the right of action alive against the defendants.—Thorne v. Heard, CH.D. ROM., J. 636—68 L. T. 791.

15. Sale—Irregularity—Purchaser without notice—Conveyancing Act, 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 41), s. 21, sub-section 2; Conveyancing Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 39), s. 3, sub-section 1.—Section 21, sub-section 2, of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, providing that where a conveyance is made in professed exercise of the power of sale conferred by the Act, the title of the purchaser shall not be impeachable on the ground that the power was improperly exercised, extends only to cases where the purchaser has bought without notice of an impropriety.

C. J. mortgaged property to secure the payment of £6,000 and interest. The mortgagees transferred their securities to J. B. in consideration of £6,316 5s. 8d., the mortgage debt and interest. Two days later J. B., in professed exercise of the powers of sale conferred by the Conveyancing Act, 1881, conveyed the mortgaged property to H. M. in consideration of £6,316 5s. 8d. On the death of H. M. the property became vested in E. M., and E. M. sold the property to A. P. L.

Prior to the sale A. P. L. was shown a recent valuation which stated that the property was worth £8,700. An abstract of title was delivered, but no requisitions were made as to circumstances attending the sale by J. B. to H. M. In an action by incumbrancers of C. J.'s equity of redemption, the sale by J. B. was declared invalid, on the ground that the powers of sale had not been properly exercised. A. P. L. claimed that under section 21, sub-section 3, of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, he was entitled to the property free from redemption.

Held, that the not obtaining further information as to the circumstances under which the sale took place did not amount to culpable negligence; that consequently A. P. L. was not affected with notice of the impropriety, and was entitled to rely on the sub-section.—Bailey v. Barnes, CH.D. STI., J.—68 L. T. 818.

MUNICIPAL CORPORATION:—

Contract — Capacity to contract — Ultrà vires— Borough rates, misapplication of—Improvement rate—Surplus of borough fund—Agreement to make annual payments for use of bridge in borough for foot passengers, how far valid—Municipal Corporations Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 50), ss. 140, 143, 144.—A municipal corporation, which was subject to the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, and a Local Improvement Act, agreed with a railway company to pay the company a certain annual sum for fifteen years in consideration that the company would throw open the roadway of a bridge belonging to them within the borough for the use of foot passengers free from toll. The local Act authorized rates for certain purposes not including such a bridge as the agreement referred to, and provided that the money accruing from the general rate should be applied to certain specified purposes, "and subject thereto for the improvement or benefit of the borough in such manner as the corporation from time to time think fit in as full and ample a manner as any borough rate authorized by the Municipal Corporations Act is made applicable." An action having been brought by the Attorney-General, at the instance of relators against the corporation, claiming an injunction to restrain the corporation from making the said payments out of moneys derived from the rates, and a declaration that the agreement was ultrà vires and void, Held, affirming the decision of the Court of Appeal (23 Q. B. D. 492), that there must be a declaration that the corporation were not entitled to pay any moneys (which might become payable under the agreement) out of the borough fund, nor to make any borough rate nor any general or improvement rate under the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, or the local Act for the purpose of such payments; but that the agreement was not ultrà vires or void, and that the foregoing declaration was not to prevent the corporation from paying such moneys out of any surplus which there might be of the borough fund or of the aforesaid rates after applying the same respectively to the purposes for which they might respectively be made under the provisions of those Acts, with liberty to the plaintiff to apply for an injunction if necessary.—Mayor, &c., of Newcastle-upon-Tyne v. Attorney-General, H.L. (E.)—[1892] A. C. 568; 62 L. J. Q. B. 72; 67 L. T. 728.

MUNICIPAL CORPORATION (IRELAND):—

Franchise—Notice of objection—Burgess roll—Appellate jurisdiction of Queen's Bench Division—Proceedings in lieu of quo warranto—Acquiescence.—At the revision of the qualification lists of the burgess roll of a borough before the mayor and assessors under 3 & 4 Vict. c. 108, the mayor has no power to expunge a name from the list and roll unless due notice of objection under section 43 has been given.

Where no such objection was given, and where, accordingly, the mayor did not and could not adjudicate, the appellate jurisdiction of the Queen's Bench Division under section 50 cannot arise.—Riordan v. M'Namara, Q.B.D. (Ir.)—30 L. R. Ir. 495.

NATIONAL DEBT (CONVERSION) ACT:—

1. Rent-charge—Option to redeem by transfer of specified sum of £3 per Cent. Consols—National Debt (Conversion) Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 2), s. 21, sub-section 1; s. 25, sub-section 2—Deed executed before passing of Act—Right to redeem by New 2¾ per Cent. Annuities (Goschens).—The plaintiffs, by two deeds executed before the passing of the National Debt (Conversion) Act, 1888, created on their estates a perpetual rent-charge of £10,000 in favour of the defendant, with a right on their part to redeem the said rent-charge, or certain portions thereof, by a transfer of specified sums of £3 per Cent. Annuities.

Held, that, under section 25, sub-section 2, of the National Debt (Conversion) Act, 1888, the plaintiffs could redeem by a transfer of a similar amount of the New 2¾ per Cent. Stock (Goschens).—Duke of Northumberland v. Percy, CH.D. NOR., J. 597—[1893] 1 Ch. 298; 62 L. J. Ch. 331; 68 L. T. 45.

2. Stock mortgage — Redemption — National Debt (Conversion) Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 2), s. 21.—By a mortgage, dated in 1867, the mortgagor covenanted to transfer to the mortgagee a specified amount of New 3 per Cent. Stock, and the lands were conveyed subject to redemption on such transfer. The lands having been sold in this court, Held, that the mortgage was satisfied by the transfer of a like amount of New 2¾ per Cent. Stock. — In re Borough's Estates, L.J. (Ir.) — 31 L. R. Ir. 244.

NEGLIGENCE:—

1. Dangerous premises—Landlord and tenant—House let in flats—Staircase in occupation and control of landlord—No covenant to keep stairs in repair—Personal injury caused by stairs being out of repair—Liability of landlord.—The defendant, who was the owner of certain premises in the City of London, let the different floors as offices to separate tenants. The only mode of access to the offices was by means of a staircase, which was not let to the tenants, but which remained in the occupation and control of the defendant. The leases to the tenants contained no covenant by the defendant to keep the staircase in repair. The plaintiff went to the office occupied by one of the tenants on business, and, when coming down the stairs, fell and was injured owing to the stairs being out of repair.

Held, that there was a duty on the defendant, both towards the tenants and towards those persons who came to the premises on business with them, to keep the stairs in a reasonably safe state of repair; and that, therefore, the defendant was liable to the plaintiff.—Miller v. Hancock, C.A. 578. —[1893] 2 Q. B. 177.

2. Drunken man trying to enter tramcar—Right of conductor to prevent him—Injury.—The plaintiff, being drunk, tried to get into the defendants' tramcar while it was in motion. The conductor tried to prevent him, and pushed him off with no more force than was necessary. The plaintiff fell and was injured. In an action to recover damages for negligence the jury found a verdict for the plaintiff.

Held, by Lord Ashbourne, L.C., and FitzGibbon, L.J.; Barry, L.J., diss. (reversing the decision of the Exchequer Division), that the plaintiff was acting illegally and wrongfully in forcing his way, when drunk, into the tramcar while it was in motion; that by so doing he placed himself in a position of peril and the conductor in a position of difficulty; that, even assuming the conductor did not under the circumstances act with the most perfect presence of mind, it could not be said that he acted with such want of care and skill as to amount to evidence that it was his negligence that caused the accident, and that the verdict should be set aside and judgment entered for the defendants. —Delany v. Dublin United Tramways Co., C.A. (Ir.) —30 L. R. Ir. 725.

NEW SOUTH WALES, LAW of:—

1. Municipalities Act of 1867, s. 163—Construction —Practice as to raising a new point.—Where, by section 163 of New South Wales Municipalities Act of 1867, "land the property of her Majesty, and unoccupied or used or reserved, or vested in trustees for public purposes," was exempted from rateability.

Held, that on its true construction lands not the property of her Majesty, but occupied by a municipality for the purpose of water supply, were within the exemption.

It appearing that the point whether the land in question was in fact used for public purposes had not been raised in the court below or in argument before the full bench, held that it was too late to raise it before their lordships.—Council of the Borough of Randwick v. Australian Cities Investment Corporation, P.C.—[1893] A. C. 322; 68 L. T. 771.

2. New South Wales Lands Acts, 1861, 1875, 1880, and 1884—Reserved lands—Revocation of reserve—Rights of improver—Sale by appraisement.—Held, that although the Lands Act of 1880, s. 12, rendered improved lands conditionally purchasable, yet the proviso to that section on its true construction preserved as against claims by conditional purchasers the right of the governor, under section 2 of the Lands Acts Amendment Act, 1875, to sell by appraisement, and without competition to the improving tenant, any improved reserved land, the improvements on which were made before the reservation or before the 1st of July, 1876.

Where such application by the improver had been made while the lands were still reserved from sale, under the Act of 1861,

Held, that such application was valid (regard being had to section 3, sub-section 2, of the Crown Lands Act, 1884), and operated as a continuing offer until after the reserve was revoked on the 14th of December, 1889, and the governor, acting under section 2 of the Act of 1875, accepted such offer on the 4th of February, 1890.

Section 102 of the Act of 1884 does not apply to lands reserved from sale under the previous Acts, and therefore the acceptance of the governor of the appellants' offer was not valid, by reason of sixty days not having expired from the date of the reservation having been revoked.—Ricketson v. Barbour, P.C.—[1893] A. C. 194; 62 L. J. P. C. 55; 68 L. T. 543.

NEW ZEALAND, LAW of:—

1. Governor, power of—Supreme Court Judges Act, 1858, s. 2—Statutory limitation of power to appoint judges.—The 2nd section of the Supreme Court Judges Act, 1858, provides that "the Supreme Court of New Zealand shall consist of one judge, to be appointed in the name and on behalf of her Majesty, who shall be called the chief justice, and of such other judges as his excellency, in the name and on behalf of her Majesty, shall from time to time appoint."

Held, that this section can only be construed consistently with other parts of the Act (see section 6 especially) as vesting in the governor the appointment of judges to whom an ascertained salary is payable by law at the time of their appointment; and that the Act of 1882 did not affect this limitation of the governor's power of appointment.—Attorney-General of New Zealand v. Edwards, P.C. —[1892] A. C. 387; 61 L. J. P. C. 64; 66 L. T. 833.

2. Local legislature, powers of—Proceedings against absentees without service—15 & 16 Vict. c. 72.—Held, that 15 & 16 Vict. c. 72, on its true construction, empowers the Legislature of New Zealand to subject to its tribunals persons who are neither by themselves nor their agents present in the Colony.

Held, further, that a law of the local legislature authorizing the local courts in any case of contracts made or to be performed in the colony to decide whether they will or not proceed in the absence of the defendant is intrà vires and reasonable.

Whether a judgment against an absentee without service of the writ will be enforced by the courts of another country is a matter for those courts to determine, and does not affect the validity of the local law.—Ashbury v. Ellis, P.C.—[1893] A. C. 339.

NUISANCE.—

1. Crowds—Theatre—Collecting crowd in highway —Obstruction of access to plaintiff's premises.—The defendant was the lessee of a theatre at which a play was produced which caused people to assemble at the pit door about two hours before it was opened in order to get places, and the access to the plaintiff's house next door was seriously obstructed.

Held, that the defendant had committed a nuisance by holding a performance which caused crowds to assemble, though he had not in any way invited persons to come before the doors were open, and that the plaintiff was entitled to an injunction; but that as the nuisance had been abated since the action was brought, by the action of the police, the court held that an injunction was unnecessary.—Barber v. Penley, CH.D. NOR., J.—[1893] 2 Ch. 447; 62 L. J. Ch. 623; 68 L. T. 662.

2. Noise—Playing on musical instruments—Reasonable user of house—Injunction.—Case in which the giving of musical lessons in a house separated from the adjoining house by a party wall only, and occasional practising and singing, and in the evening musical performances, were held not to constitute a nuisance to restrain which an injunction would be granted. Injunction granted to restrain the adjoining occupier from making noises in his house to annoy the occupier of the other house, the court being of opinion that it was done maliciously.—Christie v. Davey, CH.D. NOR., J.—[1893] 1 Ch. 316; 62 L. J. Ch. 439.

3. Pollution of stream — Sanitary authority — Injunction—Public Health Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), ss. 13, 17, 21, 29, 332, 333.—An action was brought against a sanitary authority to restrain the pollution of a ditch running through the main street of a town past the plaintiff's lands into the sea. The ditch was covered over as it passed through the town, but was afterwards an open stream, and had been for many years seriously polluted. The plaintiff claimed an injunction to restrain the defendants, as the owners of the covered part of the ditch and as the sanitary authority of the district, from permitting any sewage or other noxious matter to come on to her lands or into her part of the ditch. In 1877 the attention of the defendants was called to the condition of the houses in two new streets, and they required the owners of those houses to improve their drains. The owners accordingly ran two drains down the two streets and made communications with the main sewer. These drains were made for the purpose of carrying off surface water, and were not connected with any privies, but in addition to the surface water the slops of the houses were allowed to be thrown down the drains. In 1885, in consequence of a complaint made to the defendants, notices were directed to be served upon the occupiers to divert all polluting matter from the sewer, and the inspector of nuisances was ordered to inspect all drains entering into the main sewer. The notices so served were all effective in causing an abatement of the nuisance except four. Subsequent directions of the defendants as to cleansing the sewer were duly carried out, the effect of which was to diminish the pollution of it to some extent. The defence was, that the defendants had done everything in their power to prevent any nuisance from being occasioned to the plaintiff or her property; and that they were not responsible for the nuisance.

Held, that the defendants had done all they could to abate the nuisance of which the plaintiff complained, and were not responsible for it; but that the plaintiff's remedy, if any, was against the persons who actually caused the nuisance.

Held, therefore, that the action could not be maintained.

Attorney-General v. Guardians of the Poor of Dorking, 20 Ch. D. 595, followed.—Ogilvie v. Bything Union Sanitary Authority, C.A.—67 L. T. 18.

4. Smallpox hospital—Quia timet action—Injunction.—An injunction will not be granted in a quia timet action unless the plaintiff makes out a strong case of probability that the apprehended mischief will in fact arise.

The site of a proposed smallpox hospital was 200, 240, and 450 years respectively from the three adjacent public roads, ninety yards from a much-frequented cemetery, and 256 yards from the nearest house, there being only fifteen houses within a half-mile radius. The medical evidence being conflicting,

Held, that, in the absence of strong medical evidence that the proposed hospital would be a nuisance, no injunction could be granted.

Quære, whether, in the case of a hospital, the health of the public at large may not be considered, to some extent, as against the merely local inconvenience.—Attorney-General v. Mayor, &c., of Manchester, CH.D. CHI., J. 459—[1893] 2 Ch. 87; 62 L. J. Ch. 459; 68 L. T. 608.

5. Tramway company—Statutory powers—Acquisition by company of undertakings of companies having special statutory powers—Authority to erect "works and conveniences"—Stables—Injunction.—A company incorporated under the Companies Acts, 1862 and 1867, acquired, under the authority of a special Act, the undertakings of two tramways companies, which had power under their special Acts to purchase land for the purposes of their undertakings. The company was subsequently authorized, by special Act, to construct and maintain three short extensions of their tramways, "with all proper rails, plates, works, and conveniences connected therewith." The company acquired land near one of such extensions, and erected stabling thereon for the accommodation of the horses employed on the tramway. In an action by a neighbouring owner against the company to restrain a nuisance caused by the smells arising from these stables,

Held, that the company could not claim to exercise the special powers conferred upon the companies whose undertakings they had acquired.

That the words "works and conveniences" did not extend to the stables of the company so as to authorize their erection.

And, that, in the absence of express words authorizing the acquisition of land for the purpose of the erection of stables, it must be presumed that it was the intention of the Legislature that the company should have such powers only as they possessed by reason of their constitution under the Companies Acts.

Held, therefore, that the company were liable for the nuisance caused by their stables.—Rapier v. London Tramways Co., CH.D. KEK., J.—68 L. T. 645.

1. Election—Costs—Charges of returning officer—Parliamentary Elections (Returning Officers) Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 84), s. 3, sub-section 6; s. 4.—It is the duty of a returning officer, whose account has been taxed under section 4 of the Parliamentary Elections (Returning Officers) Act, 1875, to return to each candidate out of his deposit a proportionate amount of any part of the account which has been disallowed, whether such candidate has or has not been a party to the taxation.—Martin v. Tomkinson, Q.B.D.—[1893] 2 Q. B. 121; 62 L. J. Q. B. 400.

2. Election petition—Amendment—Jurisdiction to grant leave to amend—Judge not upon the rota—Rules of Court—Corrupt and Illegal Practices Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 51), ss. 40, 56—Parliamentary Elections Act, 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 125), s. 25—Parliamentary Election Petition Rules, 1868, r. 44—Practice—Appeal—Judicature Act, 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 68), s. 14.—Section 40, sub-section 2, of the Corrupt and Illegal Practices Prevention Act, 1883, provides that an election petition may be amended with the leave of the High Court; and, by section 56, sub-section 1, "subject to any rules of court, any jurisdiction vested by this Act in the High Court may," except as to criminal matters, "be exercised by one of the judges for the time being on the rota for the trial of election petitions," or by a master, "in manner directed by and subject to an appeal to the said judges." Rule 44 of the rules made under the Parliamentary Elections Act, 1868, provides for the hearing of interlocutory matters by a judge on the rota "if practicable, and if not, then by any judge at chambers."

Held, by the Queen's Bench Division, that the rules made under the Act of 1868 do not apply to section 56 of the Act of 1883, and that a judge who is not on the rota for the trial of election petitions has no jurisdiction to make an order giving leave to amend an election petition.

Held, also, that such an order ought not to be made ex parte.

Held, upon appeal, that the decision of the Divisional Court was a decision upon a question of law within section 14 of the Judicature Act, 1881 —which provides that the jurisdiction of the High Court to decide questions of law, upon appeal or otherwise, under the Parliamentary Elections Act, 1868, or any Act amending it, shall be final and conclusive, unless special leave to appeal be given by the High Court—and that, therefore, no appeal lay without leave.—Shaw v. Reckitt, C.A. 497—[1893] 1 Q. B. 779; [1893] 2 Q. B. 59; 62 L. J. Q. B. 375; 68 L. T. 688.

3. Election petition — Particulars — Corrupt and illegal practices—Time for delivery of particulars—Extension of time—Special circumstances—Rules of Court for Trial of Election Petitions, 1868, rr. 6, 7.—The general rule of practice in election petitions, that particulars of corrupt and illegal practices will be ordered to be delivered seven days before trial of the petition, is not a hard and fast rule, and, in determining whether there are special circumstances upon which it will act in extending the time, the court will take into consideration the size and nature of the constituency, the population, and the number of voters, and also the number of witnesses whom it is proposed to call.

Where, in a parliamentary election petition claiming to void the election, and also claiming the seat upon a scrutiny, and relating to a division of a metropolitan borough which contained above 7,000 voters, 58,000 inhabitants, and in which some 170 witnesses were intended to be called by the petitioners, an order had been made for the delivery of particulars of alleged corrupt and illegal practices seven days before trial, the court made an order extending the time to ten days, the particulars being by consent limited to such as would not have the effect of anticipating the scrutiny list.—Rushmere v. Isaacson, Q.B.D. 124—[1893] 1 Q. B. 118.

4. Election petition—Scrutiny—Particulars—Parliamentary Election Petition Rules, 1868, rr. 6, 7.—The respondent in a parliamentary election petition, in which the petitioner claims the seat on grounds for a scrutiny, is not entitled to obtain particulars under rule 6 of the Parliamentary Election Petition Rules, 1868. Rule 7 applies exclusively to such a case.—Munro v. Balfour, Q.B.D. 143—[1893] 1 Q. B. 113; 67 L. T. 526.

5. Election petition—Trial of—Change of venue—Scrutiny—"Special circumstances"—Parliamentary Elections Act, 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 125), s. 11, sub-section 11.—The existence of "special circumstances" is, under section 11, sub-section 11, of the Parliamentary Elections Act, 1868, a condition precedent to the exercise by the court of the jurisdiction, under that sub-section, to order that an election petition shall be tried elsewhere than in the county or division where the election took place.

Where, therefore, an application was made to change the venue of an election petition, upon the grounds that the petition was limited to a scrutiny of certain ballot papers, involving the examination of a very small number of witnesses; that it would materially lessen the expense of the trial; and would otherwise be for the general convenience of the parties, who both concurred in the application,

Held, that the above circumstances did not amount to "special circumstances" within the meaning of the Act of Parliament, and that the court had, therefore, no power to make the order.—Lawson v. Master, Q.B.D. 221—[1893] 1 Q. B. 245; 62 L. J. Q. B. 231; 68 L. T. 60.

6. Franchise—Registration—County voter—Notice of objection—Description of objector—Place of abode—Sufficiency of—Registration Order, 1889, Forms 5 (A) and (B), and I., No. 2.—Where notices of objection to certain county voters were signed "John Budgery, Burnard's-terrace, on the register of electors for the township of Bodmin Borough," without stating that Burnard's-terrace was situated in Bodmin, and it was found by the revising barrister that nobody had been misled by the omission, Held, that the description of the objector's place of abode was sufficient to satisfy the Registration Order, 1889, Forms 5 (A) and (B).—Hicks v. Stokes, Q.B.D. 123—[1893] 1 Q. B. 124.

7. Franchise—Registration—Lodger—Description of qualification—Mistake—Power to amend—Parliamentary and Municipal Registration Act, 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 26), s. 28, sub-sections 2, 13.—Where, in a lodger claim, the character of the qualification is misdescribed, but the revising barrister is satisfied that the misdescription is the result of a mistake, and that the qualification, upon the facts, is sufficient, he may amend the claim under sub-section 2 of section 28 of the Registration Act of 1878; and sub-section 13 of the same section, which means that a person claiming in respect of one qualification may not prove for another and distinct qualification, does not apply to prevent the correction.—Reg. v. McKellar, Ex parte Baker, Q.B.D. 142 —[1893] 1 Q. B. 121; 62 L. J. Q. B. 97; 67 L. T. 527.

8. Franchise — Registration — Lodger — Servant lodging with master on premises where business carried on.—The appellant, an assistant to a wine merchant at weekly wages, resided on his employer's premises, occupying a room at a rent of 5s. a week, and having the sole use of it for the qualifying period.

Held (reversing the decision of the revising barrister), that he was duly qualified as a lodger voter. —Bennett v. Evans, Q.B.D.—68 L. T. 765.

9. Franchise—Registration—Lodger—Joint lodger —Alteration of claim and declaration.—A lodger with the exclusive use of one room under the annual value of £10 cannot qualify himself for the franchise by adding thereto any portion of the annual value of another room which he occupies jointly with other lodgers in the same house (Fitz-Gibbon, L.J., diss.).

A lodger claim and declaration cannot, without the knowledge and authority of the claimant, be altered after it is duly signed and attested.—Hay's case, C.A. (Ir.)—32 L. R. Ir. 166.

10. Franchise—Registration—Objection to name being on list of voters—Qualification of objector—Objector's name struck off list before objection heard— —6 & 7 Vict. c. 18, s. 17.—By section 17 of 6 & 7

Vict. c. 18: "Every person whose name shall have been inserted in any list of voters for any city or borough may object to any other person as not having been entitled on the (15th) day of July next preceding to have his name inserted in any list of voters for the same city or borough, and every person so objecting shall give notice of objection as therein prescribed."

Held, that, under this section, an objector is qualified for the purposes of his objection if his name was, at the time of service of notice of his objection, upon any of the lists of voters prepared by the overseers, even though before such objection is heard his name has been struck off such list by the revising barrister.—Pease v. Town Clerk of Middlesborough, Q.B.D.—[1893] 1 Q. B. 127; 62 L. J. Q. B. 94; 68 L. T. 766.

11. Franchise — Registration —Occupier—Borough vote—30 & 31 Vict. c. 102, s. 3, sub-section 2.—Two canons of a cathedral claimed to be entitled to borough votes in respect of their occupation of an official residence within the borough, which they and two other canons had during the qualifying year occupied for three months each. There was an agreement subsisting among the canons that each should occupy for three months in every year, but under certain circumstances each might occupy for a larger part, or for the whole of any year.

Held, that, by their agreement, the claimants had deprived themselves of the right to reside during the whole year, and that they had therefore not occupied as inhabitants during the qualifying year, as required by 30 & 31 Vict. c. 102, s. 3.—Rowland v. Pritchard, Q.B.D.—62 L. J. Q. B. 319; 68 L. T. 586.

12. Franchise—Registration—"Owner or tenant"—Trustee—Parochial house—Joint rated occupier.—The Roman Catholic bishop of the diocese, along with his administrator and two curates, occupied the parochial house for the qualifying period, each having separate rooms and using the rest in common. The house was held by trustees in trust for the parish. Among the trustees were the bishop, the administrator, and the curates. The trustees, who were in occupation, were jointly rated for the premises. The bishop had the power of removing or promoting the administrator and curates to another parish (which power he had not exercised), but he could not in any other way deprive them of their respective rooms in the house.

Held, that the bishop, the administrator, and the two curates occupied as tenants, and were entitled to the franchise as rated occupiers.—Hollands v. Chambers, C.A. (Ir.)—32 L. R. Ir. 156.

PARTITION ACTION:—

Costs—Incumbered shares—Discretion of court—Partition Act, 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 40), s. 10.—In partition actions, though the court has an absolute discretion as to costs, it will, as a general rule, allow only one set of costs out of the entire proceeds of sale in respect of each share of the property.

The chief clerk's certificate in a partition action found that the plaintiff was entitled to an unincumbered third share of the estate, that one of the defendants was entitled to another third share, subject to one mortgage, and that another defendant was entitled to the remaining third share, subject to two mortgages. The estate was sold and the money paid into court.

Held, that three sets of costs only—one in respect of each share of the property—were payable out of the entire proceeds.

PARTNERSHIP:—

1. Articles—Bankruptcy of some of the partners—Provision for retention of bankrupt partner's share—Validity—Receiver and manager—Right of trustee in bankruptcy to appointment of.—It was provided by articles of partnership entered into in August, 1891, that if any partner should become bankrupt, he should be deemed to have ceased to be a partner at the date of such bankruptcy; and that, upon any partner ceasing to be a partner from any cause, before the expiration of the partnership term (which was for fourteen years), the partnership should thereupon determine as to such partner, and his share in the capital of the partnership should remain as a loan, bearing interest, to the continuing partners for the residue of the term of fourteen years, or so long as the business should be carried on, and the repayment of the loan and interest should be secured by the joint and several bond, or the bond or covenant, of the continuing partners.

The partnership consisted of four persons, one of whom had provided the whole of the capital. This partner and two of the other three became bankrupt in June, 1892, and their trustees in bankruptcy brought an action against the defendant, the remaining solvent partner, for a declaration that the above provisions of the partnership articles were void as against the plaintiffs and the creditors of the bankrupts. On an application by the plaintiffs for the appointment of a receiver and manager of the partnership business, the defendant claimed the right, as solvent partner, to be appointed receiver and manager.

Held, that, in the absence of any explanation as as to the reason for the insertion of the above provisions in the partnership articles, the inference was that they were inserted in contemplation of bankruptcy, and that under the circumstances the plaintiffs were entitled to the protection of a receiver and manager, but that the defendant was entitled to be appointed receiver and manager; that he must give security, pass his accounts, furnish the plaintiffs with proper accounts, and give them reasonable access to the books; and that he must pay the balances in his hands when they reached an agreed amount, either into court, or to a joint banking account of himself and the plaintiffs.—Collins v. Barker, CH.D. STI., J. 442—[1893] 1 Ch. 578; 62 L. J. Ch. 316; 68 L. T. 572.

2. Assignment of business by debtor to creditor—Provision for reassignment—Joint interest—Construction of agreement.—By an agreement in writing W., a trader, who was insolvent, assigned all his machinery, stock, and book-debts to B., his largest creditor; B. agreed to carry on the business as before in W.'s name, to engage W. as manager at a weekly salary, to discharge the existing and future trade liabilities of W., and to find funds for carrying on the business; all profits made were to be placed to the credit of W., and as soon as the losses were made up B. was to resell the business to W. without any further responsibility on the part of B., or any consideration on the part of W. B. having become bankrupt, and W. having become bankrupt, a question arose as to the ownership of the business.

Held (affirming the judgment of the Queen's Bench Division), that, under the agreement, B. and W. took a joint interest in the business.

Price v. Groom, 2 Exch. 542, commented upon.—In re Whiteley, Ex parte Smith & Co., C.A.—67 L. T. 69.

3. Death of partner—Share of partner dying to be determined by last signed yearly account—Death after expiration of partnership year, but before taking of account for that year completed.—Under a deed of partnership it was provided that the partnership accounts should be taken and signed by the partners at the end of each partnership year, or as near thereto as conveniently might be, and that the share of a partner dying should be determined by reference to the last signed yearly account prior to his death. A partner died shortly after the expiration of a partnership year, but before the taking of the account for that year had been completed. The yearly accounts had been, according to the practice of the firm, taken somewhat later in the year than the date of his death.

Held, that the surviving partners were not entitled to have his share determined by reference to the last signed yearly account, but that the account for the partnership year immediately preceding his death must be taken, and his share determined thereby.

Semble, it would not have made any difference if, in fact, the taking of the accounts for the partnership year immediately preceding his death could not have been completed in his lifetime.—Hunter v. Dowling, CH.D. ROM., J. 390—[1893] 1 Ch. 391; 62 L. J. Ch. 380; 67 L. T. 826. [Affirmed: 62 L. J. Ch. 617; 68 L. T. 780.]

4. Real estate—Conversion.—Land was held by two persons under an agreement made between them for a common object. One of the parties having died,

Held, that the deceased's interest in the land devolved as real estate.

The effect of the existence of a partnership between the parties on the question of conversion considered.—In re Wilson, Wilson v. Holloway, CH.D. NOR., J. 684—[1893] 2 Ch. 340; 68 L. T. 785.

PATENT:—

1. Co-owners by purchase—One co-owner mortgagee of other co-owners' share—Patent worked by mortgagee co-owner—Profits received as mortgagee.—Where a patentee assigns to each of two persons a moiety of his patent rights, each assignee can work the patent without being liable to account to the other for profits; and none the less if one of the assignees be mortgagee of the others' moiety.

So held, affirming the decision of the Court of Appeal ([1892] 2 Ch. 13).

2. Infringement—Analogous use—Novelty—Utility.—The plaintiff patented an improvement in the "wet spinning for flax and like yarns," which consisted in the introduction of a thin flexible paper tube outside of a rigid tube, in substitution for rigid tubes of various kinds previously used, upon which the yarn was wound during the process of spinning, and to which it was claimed the yarn would adhere after being artificially dried. It was proved that similar paper tubes of various sizes had been used in cotton and woollen spinning for a number of years before the date of the patent. The purpose for which the tubes were used in cotton spinning was to form a base for the "cop," and keep the hole in it open. In flax spinning the yarn is passed through a trough of water for the purpose of dissolving gum from the yarn, of which it contains a large quantity, and when spun the flax yarn, which is an inelastic fibre, has to be artificially dried, consequent shrinking taking place. Cotton is an elastic fibre containing very little gum, and is spun dry, except that in the process known as "doubling" the cotton is damped to remove roughness from the surface of the yarn and to prevent shrinking.

Held, that the introduction of thin paper tubes into wet spinning was an application of a principle well known in the process of dry spinning to the achievement of a result not previously attained in wet spinning—namely, the adhesion of the yarn during the process of drying to that upon which it had been wound, and that the use of paper tubes in dry spinning was not so analogous to the use of them in wet spinning as to deprive the plaintiff's invention of the merit of novelty.—Pirrie v. Yorkstreet Flax Spinning Co., V.C. (Ir.)—31 L. R. Ir. 3.

3. Infringement—Prior publication—Prior public user.—The validity of a patent for making dynamo-electric machines was challenged on the ground of prior publication, founded upon a description in the specification in an earlier patent.

Held, that the question whether the specification of the earlier patent was sufficient to disclose the invention to the public did not turn upon the sufficiency or insufficiency of the specification for the guidance of a skilled workman, for the patent might be void for incomplete directions to a workman of ordinary skill, and yet sufficient to inform the public of the invention; but that the proper test was whether the description in the specification was sufficient to convey to men of science and employers of labour information which would enable them to understand the invention, and give a workman specific directions for the making of the machine; and that, applying that test, there had been prior publication.—Anglo-American Brush Electric Light Corporation v. King, Brown, & Co., H.L. (Sc.)—[1892] A. C. 367.

4. Practice—Interrogatories—Refusal to answer—Action for infringement—Validity of patent denied—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 31, r. 20.—In an action for infringement of a patent the plaintiffs administered interrogatories to the defendants, based on the statements in the plaintiffs' specification, asking the defendants if they used the processes therein described. The defendants denied the validity of the patent, and refused to answer certain of the interrogatories, on the ground (inter alia) that the discovery sought depended on the determination of a question in dispute—namely, the validity of the patent.

Held, that the discovery sought could not be postponed until after the validity of the patent had been established, and that the plaintiffs were entitled to specific answers to the interrogatories.—Benno Jaffe and Darmstaedter Lanolin Fabrik v. Richardson & Co., CH.D. NOR., J. 534—62 L. J. Ch. 710; 68 L. T. 404.

5. Threats by "circulars, advertisements, or otherwise"—Threats contained in letters—Answer to inquiries—Privileged communications—Patentee unable to bring action for infringement—Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 57), s. 32.—A "threat" within the meaning of section 32 of the Patents Act, 1883, may be contained in letters written bonâ fide in answer to inquiries made about a patent. Such a letter cannot be considered as a privileged communication.

The words "or otherwise" in the section are not to be classed as ejusdem generis with "circulars or advertisements": they are extended by the words which precede them, and not confined by them.

6. Validity—Provisional and complete specification—Patentable and non-patentable inventions.—In an action for infringement of a patent,

Held, that the plaintiffs' invention was novel; but that the patent as amended was invalid, upon the grounds (1) that the original patent was granted for an invention different from that for which he claimed protection after the disclaimers; (2) that it was not, when taken out, useful for its purpose; and (3) that the specification was insufficient to enable an electrician of that date to carry it out without further experiments and invention.

To make a patent valid the patentee must make some addition to previously known inventions, and must produce either a new and useful thing or result, or a new and useful method of producing an old thing or result.—Lane Fox v. Kensington and Knightsbridge Electric Lighting Co., C.A.—[1892] 3 Ch. 424; 67 L. T. 440.

7. Validity — Subject-matter — Nonconformity of provisional specification and complete specification—Prior publication—Anticipation—Patents, &c., Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 57), s. 5, sub-sections 3, 4; ss. 14, 46.—A patent for the mere new use of a known contrivance without any additional ingenuity in overcoming fresh difficulties is bad, and cannot be supported. If the new use involves no ingenuity, but is in manner and purpose analogous to the old use, although not quite the same, there is no invention, no manner of new manufacture within the meaning of the Statute of Monopolies (21 Jac. 1, c. 3). On the other hand, a patent for a new use of a known contrivance is good, and can be supported if the new use involves practical difficulties which the patentee has been the first to see and overcome by some ingenuity of his own. An improved thing produced by a new and ingenious application of a known contrivance to an old thing is a manner of new manufacture within the meaning of the statute.

A specification which discloses a principle and applies it to one thing will not necessarily invalidate a subsequent patent for the application of the same principle to another thing. It may or may not do so, and the question in each case must be decided on the same principles as those applicable to the question of subject-matter. In considering subject-matter novelty is assumed; the question is whether, assuming the invention to be new, it is one for which a patent can be granted. In considering novelty the invention is assumed to be one for which a patent can be granted if new, and the question is whether on that assumption it is new.

The patent in the present case held good.

Per Smith, L.J.—The evidence of experts as to the construction of specifications is inadmissible except as to the meaning of scientific terms when they occur, or as to the working of mechanical appliances, or as to what such working will bring about.—Gadd v. Mayor, &c., of Manchester, C.A.—67 L. T. 569.

PENALTY:—

1. Bond and interest—Judgment on bond—Penal sum—Interest beyond penal sum—Decree charging judgment on land "with interest until paid"—Sale of land under Incumbered Estates Court (Ireland)—Priorities of incumbrancers—Clerical mistake in judgment—Correction of error in judgment—Judicature Act (Ireland) (40 & 41 Vict. c. 57), s. 25—Rules of Court (Ireland), 1891, ord. 28, r. 11.—In 1842 a judgment was obtained by B. against a debtor upon a bond for £1,000 conditioned for payment of £500 and interest. A bill in equity having been filed by other judgment creditors, a decree was made in 1853 confirming the master's report that there was then due to B. under the judgment the sum of £500 with the interest then accrued, and declaring that that sum and the sums found by the master's report to be due to other creditors with interest "until paid" were well charged upon the debtor's lands. Part of the lands were sold in 1856 under an order of the Incumbered Estates Court (Ireland), but there were not sufficient funds to pay B. In 1891 moneys derived from the sale of lands being found in court to the credit of the cause, B.'s representative applied to have the principal and interest, then amounting to more than £1,000, paid out to him. The next incumbrancer objected that no more ought to be paid to the applicant than the penal sum, £1,000.

Held, that B.'s charge upon the lands ought not to have been extended beyond the penalty to the prejudice of a subsequent incumbrancer; that there was obviously in the decree of 1853 an error arising from an accidental omission, and that under order 28, r. 11, of the Rules of the Supreme Court (Ireland), 1891, the decree should, on a proper application, be corrected by inserting the words, "the principal sum and interest not to exceed the amount of the penalty on the bond."

The decision of the Irish Court of Appeal, 27 L. R. Ir. 512, affirmed.—Hatton v. Harris, H.L. (Ir.)—[1892] A. C. 547; 62 L. J. P. C. 24; 67 L. T. 722.

2. Liquidated damages — Deposit — Purchase and sale—Payment of purchase-money by instalments — Payment made before agreement—Breach of contract to pay instalments — Breach of other stipulations—Money paid by purchaser for machine—Default by purchaser — Contract rescinded by vendor—Right of vendor to retain sums paid as liquidated damages.—A written agreement for the sale of certain patent rights provided that the purchase-money should be £14,000, of which £1,400 was already paid at the date of the agreement, and the remainder was to be paid by instalments of £4,200 each on certain days, and it was a term of the agreement that the first two machines were to be furnished at net cost price, one half of such cost to be paid to the vendors when the machines were ordered, and the other half when they were ready for shipment. The agreement provided that if default should be made by the purchaser in the payment of any of the instalments at the stipulated times, or in case there should be a breach of any of the conditions mentioned in a clause of the agreement, then all payments made to the vendors should be absolutely forfeited to them as and by way of liquidated damages. The purchaser had paid the £1,400 as part of the purchase-money and also £450 for the machines, but, as he had made default in paying the first instalment, the vendors rescinded the contract and refused to supply the machines, and they claimed to retain the two sums paid to them as liquidated damages for breach of the contract.

Held, that, although the parties had used in their agreement the words "liquidated damages," the case came within the first class of cases mentioned by Jessel, M.R., in Wallis v. Smith, and was to be treated as a penalty only, and not as liquidated damages, and a reference was ordered as to the actual damage sustained by the vendors.—Barton v. Capewell Continental Patents Co., Q.B.D.—68 L. T. 857.

PHARMACY ACTS:—

Sale of poison—Compound or medicine containing "poison"—"Patent medicine"—Pharmacy Act, 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 121), ss. 1, 2, 15, 16.—By the Pharmacy Act, 1868, s. 2, certain articles specified in Part 2 of Schedule A to the Act, which include opium and all preparations of opium and chloroform, are deemed to be poisons within the meaning of the Act; and by sections 1 and 15 it is made unlawful for persons to keep open shop for the retailing, dispensing, or compounding poisons unless they are chemists or druggists, and duly registered under the Act, under a penalty of £5 for each offence. By section 16 nothing in the Act is to interfere with the dealing in "patent medicine."

The appellants, who were not qualified persons within the meaning of the Act, sold over the counter a half-ounce bottle of chlorodyne, a proprietary medicicine, which contained, amongst other ingredients, one grain of morphine, the active principle of opium, the evidence being that less than that quantity had been known to be fatal to an adult, but that, if taken according to the directions, the dose would not be so to an adult, but might be to an infant.

In an action against the appellants to recover a penalty under section 15 for a breach of the provisions of the Act,

Held, that, inasmuch as the article sold by them contained one of the scheduled poisons, it was a poison within the meaning of the Act, and it was immaterial that it did not consist, or was not compounded, of the scheduled poisons alone.

Held, also, that it was not a "patent" medicine within the exemption in section 16, which applied exclusively to medicines protected by the letters patent, and, therefore, that the appellants were liable to the penalty.—Pharmaceutical Society v. Piper & Co., Q.B.D. 447—[1893] 1 Q. B. 686; 62 L. J. Q. B. 305; 68 L. T. 490.

PLEDGE:—

Detinue—Tender—Waiver.—In an action in detinue for the return of certain goods, Y. alleged that he had pledged the goods with B. to secure an advance. He subsequently requested B. to return the goods, as he had a purchaser for them. B. refused, alleging on his part that the goods had been sold to him. Y. did not tender the amount due under the pledge.

Held, that, assuming the transaction to have been one of pledge, in the absence of a waiver, tender and refusal of the amount due upon the pledge was a condition precedent to the right of action; that B.'s conduct did not amount to a waiver of tender; that his special property in the goods was not, therefore, determined; and that the action would not lie.—Yungmann v. Briesmann, C.A. 148—67 L. T. 642.

POOR LAW:—

1. Settlement — Apprenticeship — Instrument not under seal—3 W. & M., c. 11, s. 8—31 Geo. 2, c. 11, s. 1.—In order to acquire a settlement by apprenticeship in the place where the pauper was bound apprentice, it is not necessary for such apprentice to have been bound under a deed of indenture, since, under the provisions of 31 Geo. 2, c. 11, s. 1, amending 3 W. & M., c. 11, s. 8, a settlement by apprenticeship can be acquired under any deed, writing, or contract not indented, provided such has been first duly stamped, and the apprentice has resided forty days in the place where he was so bound.—Guardians of Woodstock Union v. Guardians of Shipton-on-Stour, Q.B.D.—62 L. 2. Settlement — Derivative settlement — Child under sixteen—Second marriage of mother—Divided Parishes Act, 1876 (39 & 40 Vict. c. 61), s. 35.—Under section 35 of the Divided Parishes Act, 1876, as interpreted by the House of Lords in Guardians of Reigate Union v. Guardians of Croydon Union, 14 App. Cas. 465, the children under sixteen years of age of a first marriage do not follow the settlement derived by their mother from a second marriage.—Guardians of Llanelly Union v. Guardians of Neath Union, Q.B.D.—[1893] 2 Q. 3. Settlement — Irremovability — Residence apart from parent while under sixteen—11 & 12 Vict. c. 111—Divided Parishes and Poor Law Amendment Act, 1876 (39 & 40 Vict. c. 61), s. 34.—A pauper resided in domestic service from the age of fourteen to the age of eighteen in a parish in the appellant union. Her father was dead, and her mother never resided nor had a settlement in the appellant union.

Held, that the proviso in section 1 of 11 & 12 Vict. c. 111 only applied to prevent the separation of families, and therefore did not apply where the pauper was residing apart from her parent; that the pauper acquired a status of irremovability by such residence while under sixteen; and that, accordingly, the period of residence under sixteen could be added to the period of residence over sixteen, so as to confer a settlement upon her under section 34 of the Divided Parishes Act, 1876.—Guardians of West Ham Union v. Churchwardens, &c., of St. Matthew, Bethnal Green, C.A. 182—[1892] 2 Q. B. 676; 62 L. J. M. C. 9; 67 L. T. 465.

4. Treasurer to guardians—Services of treasurer gratuitous—Sum lost to guardians through failure of bank—Liability of treasurer for loss.—The defendant had been appointed, and for some years had acted, as the treasurer of the plaintiffs; his services were gratuitous, and his duty was to receive all moneys tendered to be paid to the guardians and to pay thereout all orders drawn on him in respect of the union, and for the faithful performance of his duties he had given a bond with sureties. The accounts of the union were kept alternately at one bank for a year, and at another bank for the next year, and the account was entitled "C. Union," and into this account were paid direct all moneys received for rates, &c., and receipts countersigned by the defendant were given by the bank to the overseers. In an action by the guardians against the defendant to recover a loss caused by the failure of the bank,

Held, on the authority of the Guardians of Halifax Union v. Wheelwright, L. R. 10 Ex. 183, that the defendant was not liable to pay to the guardians the amount lost through the failure of the bank, whether the account were the guardians' account—which was found as a fact to be the case—or the defendant's account; and that, moreover, apart from that authority, the position of an honorary treasurer is analogous to that of a trustee or receiver, and he would not be responsible for a loss incurred through no default of his own, but through the necessary employment of an ordinary mercantile agent.—Colchester Union v. Moy, Q.B.D.—68 L. T. 564.

POOR RATE:—

1. Appeal—Poor rate made by vestry under provisions of local Act—Necessity for notice to the union assessment committee and failure to obtain relief—6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 96, ss. 2 and 6—Union Assessment Committee Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 103), ss. 2, 14, 17, 24, 29—Union Assessment Committee Amendment Act, 1864 (27 & 28 Vict. c. 39), s. 1.—By 25 Geo. 3, c. xli. the vestry of Richmond were authorized and required to make rates for the relief of the poor, and in pursuance thereof they made a rate on the 5th of July, 1892, on a valuation in which the present applicant was assessed at £150 for each of two houses and shops which he occupied. In the valuation list prepared under the Union Assessment Committee Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 103), he was assessed at £102 only for each house and shop. He appealed against the vestry's rate to the magistrates at special sessions on the ground that he was over-rated.

The magistrates held that they had no jurisdiction to hear the appeal, as the appellant had not satisfied the requirements of section 1 of the Union Assessment Committee Amendment Act, 1864 (27 & 28 Vict. c. 39), which enacts that "after the first day of August next no person shall be empowered to appeal to any sessions against a poor rate made in conformity with the valuation list approved of by such committee, unless he shall have given to such committee notice of objection against the said list, and shall have failed to obtain such relief in the matter as he deems just."

A rule nisi directed to the justices and to the vestry and churchwardens, &c., of Richmond having been obtained for a mandamus to compel the justices to hear and determine the applicant's appeal, it was Held, that under the Act of 1836 (6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 96) an appeal lay from the vestry's rate to the justices at special sessions, which was in no way affected by section 1 of the Act of 1864 (27 & 28 Vict. c. 39), which applied only to valuations made under the Act of 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 103); and the rule for the mandamus therefore was made absolute.—Reg v. Price, Q.B.D.—62 L. J. M. C. 71; 68 L. T. 171.

2. Exemption—Crown property—Servants of the Crown—Occupation for Crown purposes—Volunteer corps—Storehouse for arms—Volunteer Act, 1863 (26 & 27 Vict. c. 65), s. 26.—Premises occupied by a volunteer corps for the purpose of the service of the corps, and being reasonably necessary for such service, are occupied by servants of the Crown for the purposes of the Crown, and therefore are exempt from rates.

Therefore premises occupied by the commanding officer of a volunteer corps for the purpose of the service of the corps, and being reasonably necessary for such service, are exempt from rates, including both such part of the premises as is a storehouse for the depositing and safe keeping of arms, ammunition, and stores, within the meaning of section 26 of the Volunteer Act, 1863, and, therefore, exempted from rates by that section, and all such other parts of the premises as are reasonably necessary for the service of the corps.—Pearson v. Assessment Committee of Holborn Union, Q.B.D.—[1893] 1 Q. B. 389; 62 L. J. M. C. 77; 68 L. T. 351.

3. Lunatic asylum—Rates charged by visiting committee on maintenance fund—Lunacy Act 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 5).—The visiting committee of a lunatic asylum paid the poor rates out of moneys in their hands and charged the amount to the maintenance fund. An order of the Local Government Board provided, in effect, for the payment of the rates out of the building and repair account. The auditor disallowed the payments, and surcharged the individuals who had made them.

Held, that the payment of rates was part of the expense of maintenance, and that the payment was not an illegal payment, and the surcharge was wrong.—Reg. v. Dolby, Q.B.D.—61 L. J. Q. B. 809; 67 L. T. 296.

4. Occupier—Arrears—Application for distress warrant—Evidence of non-occupation—Conclusiveness of rate-book.—A person summoned before justices to show cause why a warrant of distress should not issue for non-payment of a poor rate has a right to call evidence to show that, though his name appears on the rate-book as occupier of the premises rated, he is, in fact, a mere caretaker.—Reg. v. Simmonds, Q.B.D.—62 L. J. M. C. 106.

5. Rateability—Sewage works—Metropolis Management Act, 1855 (18 & 19 Vict. c. 120), ss. 135, 150.—The appellants were the owners of certain sewage works, consisting of deodorizing and outfall works, pumping engines and machinery, constructed under the Metropolis Management Act, 1885.

Held, that such works were, by section 135 of that Act, placed on the same footing as sewers, and therefore, on the authority of London County Council v. Churchwardens of West Ham, 40 W. R. 659, [1892] 2 Q. B. 44, the appellants were not liable to be assessed to the poor rate in respect of the sewage works.—London County Council v. Assessment Committee of Woolwich Union; Same v. Assessment Committee of St. George's Union, C.A. 227—[1893] 1 Q. B. 210; 62 L. J. M. C. 136; 68 L. T. 71.

6. Tenant for a term not exceeding three months—Rate made for period of a year—Claim to pay by instalments — Demand, sufficiency of — Poor Rate Assessment and Collection Act, 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 41), s. 2.—By the Poor Rate Assessment and Collection Act, 1869, "no such occupier"—that is, an occupier for a short term—"shall be compelled to pay to the overseers at one time or within four weeks a greater amount of the rate than would be due for one quarter of a year."

Held, that where any such occupier, after having been served with a demand in writing for the full amount of a rate, claims to pay under the section such rate by instalments, a distress warrant may be issued for non-payment of any such instalment upon proof that it was orally demanded by the overseers.—Overseers of Walton-on-the-Hill v. Jones, Q.B.D.—[1893] 2 Q. B. 175; 62 L. J. M. C. 123.

POWER of APPOINTMENT:—

1. Execution—Change of investment—Ademption of legacy—Breach of trust—Concurrence of married woman—Trustee Act, 1888, s. 6.—The decision of Porter, M.R. (29 L. R. Ir. 156), affirmed by the Court of Appeal.—Willett v. Finlay, C.A. (Ir.)—29 L. R. Ir. 497.

2. Execution—Covenant in marriage settlement that wife's power of appointment should be exercised only in favour of trustees—General testamentary power, exercise of—Specific performance—Damages—Liability of wife's executors.—A marriage settlement executed in 1867 contained covenants by the husband and wife that all the property which the wife, or her husband in her right, should at any time during the coverture become entitled to at law or in equity should be settled, and that any power or powers of appointment over any property whatsoever of which the wife might at any time during the coverture be the donee, under any settlement, will, or other instrument whatsoever, should, if executed by her, be executed only in favour of the trustees of the settlement. During the coverture the wife became, under the will of her father, who died in 1871, donee of a general testamentary power of appointment over a sum of stock. She died in June, 1892, having by her will, dated the 29th of March, 1889, executed the power, not in favour of the trustees of the settlement, but in favour, amongst others, of her husband, whom she appointed one of her executors, and who duly proved her will.

Held, that, although the cases showed that the court had gone a long way in enforcing, by way of specific performance, contracts to leave property by will, not one of them was a case of a contract to leave by will on the part of one who was merely donee of a testamentary power of appointment, and that specific performance ought not to be decreed in such a case; but that the trustees were entitled to recover, as damages against the wife's executors to the extent of her assets, the value of the property which would have come to the hands of the trustees if the covenant had been performed; and that the appointed fund was assets for the payment of her debts.—In re Parkin, Hill v. Schwarz, CH.D. STI., J. 120—[1892] 3 Ch. 510; 62 L. J. Ch. 55; 67 L. T. 77.

3. Execution—Exercise of power subject to condition—Excess of power—Fraud on power—Hotchpot clause—Intention.—A testator devised real estate on trust for sale and conversion, and directed a third of the proceeds of the sale to be held on trust for each of his daughters for her life, and after her death in trust for such of her children or their issue born in her lifetime as she should by will or deed appoint, and, failing any such appointment, in trust for all her children in equal shares. A general hotchpot clause followed. The testator then directed two other funds to be held by his trustees on the same trusts. One of the testator's daughters by will appointed part of the trust moneys to her two sons on condition that they should resign a benefit accruing to them under their father's will (whereby the residuary estate of the testatrix, which was given to a stranger, would be enlarged), and, failing their compliance with this condition, the testatrix appointed the fund to one of her daughters.

Held, that the appointment was a fraud on the power, and that the share must go as if unappointed.

Alexander v. Alexander, 2 Ves. sen. 640, discussed.

Held, also, that the testator's intention was not to create three funds, but one fund, and that, therefore, there was one general hotchpot clause applying to the whole share of the issue of testator's daughter in the moneys accruing to them under his will.—In re Perkins, Perkins v. Bagot, CH.D. NOR., J. 170—[1893] 1 Ch. 283; 62 L. J. Ch. 531; 67 L. T. 743.

3a. Execution—General power of appointment—Exercise by will—Ineffectual appointment—Residuary bequest—Wills Act (1 Vict. c. 26), s. 27.—By a settlement a general power of appointment over certain stocks, funds, and securities was given to P. W. E., and it was provided that in default of appointment the settled property should go to the next of kin of P. W. E. By his will, dated in 1866, P. W. E., after making an appointment of part of the property, appointed the residue to J. T. and R. S. upon trust to convert and pay certain legacies, and to pay the ultimate residue to E. T., if she should be living at the death of C. M. E., and he constituted H. J. E. S. his residuary legatee. E. T. survived P. W. E., but predeceased C. M. E.

Held, that H. J. E. S., the residuary legatee, was entitled to the ultimate residue of the settled property.

Easum v. Appleford, 5 My. & Cr. 56, distinguished.—In re Elen, Thomas v. McKechnie, CH.D. STI., J.—68 L. T. 816.

4. Married woman — Execution of power. — A married woman had by her marriage settlement a power to appoint to children and grandchildren a sum of £2,000. By a post-nuptial settlement she had power to appoint a sum of £3,000 to the like objects. Her will contained no reference to either power, or to the funds, but simply bequeathed to four of her children sums of money which amounted in all to £2,000. She had no property at the time of her death except a small sum.

Held, that the will was not an exercise of the power.

POWER of ATTORNEY:—

1. Agreement for sale—Sale of business under power of attorney—Partnership—Specific performances—Waiver by purchaser.—A., B., C., and D. traded under the firm of A. & Co. A., who lived abroad, gave a power of attorney to B., by which he authorized him to sell, or concur in selling, any of A.'s property by auction, or privately, upon such terms, subject to such conditions, and in such manner as B. should think fit. B., C., and D. agreed to sell the business as a going concern to H., B. signing as attorney for A. as well as on his own behalf. H. agreed to pay the debts of the business, which were estimated at £15,000; if they did not exceed that amount the vendors were to be entitled to a share of profits calculated on £5,000 "deferred capital"; if the debts exceeded £15,000, £5 for every £2 of the excess was to be deducted from the £5,000 deferred capital; the vendors might require H. to take over their deferred capital, paying in cash two-fifths of its nominal amount; if the concern was converted into a limited company, the vendors were to receive shares for their deferred capital; and if the debts were less than £15,000 H. was to pay the difference in cash at the end of two years. It was agreed that H. might carry on the business under the style of A. & Co., and that the vendors should not carry on any like business within fifty miles of K. H. brought an action for specific performance.

Held, by Romer, J., that the clause in restraint of trade was not authorized by the power of attorney; that the agreement, therefore, was not binding on A.; that this objection was not removed by H.'s offer to waive that clause; and that the action must be dismissed.

Held, on appeal, that the stipulations as to deferred capital did not constitute a partnership, but were only a mode of ascertaining the purchase money, and that the agreement, therefore, could not be held void as against A. on the ground that the power of attorney did not authorise an agreement for a partnership.

Held, further, that, assuming the licence to trade under the name of A. & Co. and the agreement by the vendors not to trade to be unauthorized by the power of attorney, they were stipulations for the benefit of H. which he might waive, and, he having waived them, that specific performance ought to be decreed.

Semble, that the agreement by the vendors not to trade was authorized by the power of attorney, inasmuch as a going concern could not be sold to advantage without such a stipulation.

Whether the giving an authority to the purchaser to trade in the name of A. & Co. was within the power, quære.—Hawksley v. Outram, C.A.—[1893] 3 Ch. 359; 62 L. J. Ch. 215; 67 L. T. 804.

2. Construction — Agent's authority — Bill of exchange.—Where an agent is authorized by power of attorney to enter into contracts for (1) the purchase or sale of goods, (2) the chartering of vessels, and (3) the employment of agents and servants; and, as incidental thereto, or consequential thereon, to do certain specified acts and other acts of the same kind as those specified, such an authority does not confer upon the agent powers at large, but only the necessary powers, in addition to those named, which are requisite to carry into effect the declared purposes of the power of attorney.

An agent, borrowing money on behalf of his principal under such a power, would exceed his powers.

But should the agent do any act which is in itself warranted by the terms of the power used, then such act is binding on the principal as to all persons dealing in good faith with the agent, and they are not bound to inquire into the facts aliunde.

An agent indorsing bills of exchange "per pro," and getting them discounted by a bank in the ordinary course of business, is within the powers conferred on him, when the power of attorney given him specifically mentions the drawing and indorsing of bills on behalf of the principal; and this is so as to bonâ fide holders for value, though the agent abuse his authority.—Bryant, Powis, & Bryant v. La Banque du Peuple, P.C. 600—[1893] A. C. 70; 62 L. J. P. C. 68; 68 L. T. 546.

3. Stock — Stockbroker — Payment on account by London stockbroker to country stockbroker— London stockbroker's liability to country customer—Foreign principal.—The plaintiff, who lived abroad, being the owner of a sum of New Consols, gave to the defendants, a firm of stockbrokers in London, a power of attorney appointing one of the defendants his attorney to sell the Consols. The power of attorney was sent originally to the plaintiff's brother in England, and by him to C., a country stockbroker. C. sent it to the defendants, who were his London agents. The defendants sold the stock and credited C. with it in his account with them, and the sum went in reduction of sums due to them by him, or sums paid to C. by them. C. subsequently became bankrupt, and the plaintiff sued the defendants for the proceeds of the sale of the Consols, less commission.

Held, that the defendants were liable to refund the moneys to the plaintiff, as the crediting it in their account with their country client, C., was not a payment to the plaintiff; and that, though the power of attorney to sell came to them through C., the defendants were not entitled to treat the plaintiff as a foreign principal, and so to act as if C. only were their principal.—Crossley v. Magniac, CH.D. ROM., J. 598—[1893] 1 Ch. 594; 67 L. T. 798.

PRACTICE:—

APPEAL—

1. Habeas corpus—Appeal against issue of writ—Excuse for non-compliance with writ—Judicature Act, 1873, s. 19.—An appeal lies to the Court of Appeal against an order for the issue of a writ of habeas corpus, but the order should not be set aside unless, in the opinion of the court, there are unquestionably no grounds for its issue.

The appellant, without authority from the parent, who had placed her child in his institution, handed over the child to a gentleman to be taken to Canada. This, it appeared, had taken place before the application by the parent for a writ of habeas corpus, and the appellant alleged that it was impossible for him to find the child.

Held, affirming the decision of the Court of Appeal (reported 38 W. R. 315, 24 Q. B. D. 283), that the writ ought to issue, so that the facts might be further inquired into.

The law as laid down in Reg. v. Barnardo, Tye's case, 37 W. R. 789, 23 Q. B. D. 305, as to what is a valid excuse for not producing a person in obedience to a writ of habeas corpus, discussed and disapproved by Lord Halsbury, L.C., and by Lords Watson, Herschell, and Hannen. — Barnardo v. Ford, Gossage's case, H.L. (E.) 333—[1892] A. C. 326; 61 L. J. Q. B. 728; 67 L. T. 1.

2. Interpleader—Decision in summary manner—Common Law Procedure Act, 1860 (23 & 24 Vict. c. 126), s. 17—Ord. 57, rr. 9, 11.—Where, upon an interpleader summons, the question is one of law, and the judge decides it under ord. 57, r. 9, without directing an issue or a special case, his decision is a decision in a summary manner, and is final and conclusive, and there is no power to give leave to appeal. In re Tarn, C.A. 397—[1893] 2 Ch. 280; 62 L. J. Ch. 564; 68 L. T. 311.

3. Motion to vary minutes—Refusal of judge.—The minutes of an order made in the trial of an action as settled by the registrar did not mention certain documents which the plaintiff contended were admitted during the trial. The judge refused to alter the minutes, and the plaintiff appealed.

Held, that the Court of Appeal would not entertain an appeal from the decision of a judge with reference to the minutes of his order.

Held, also, that the proper course for the plaintiff was to give notice to the respondents that at the hearing of the appeal he would apply to the court for leave to read the documents.—James v. Jones, C.A.—67 L. T. 584.

4. Pauper — Application to appeal in formâ pauperis—Court to which application should be made.—Where a party who has not sued or defended as a pauper in the court below desires to appeal in formâ pauperis, the application for leave should be made ex parte to the Court of Appeal, and the court will require the provisions of ord. 16, rr. 22-24, to be followed upon such application.—Ex parte Goldberg, C.A. 210—[1893] 1 Q. B. 417; 62 L. J. Q. B. 127; 68 L. T. 142.

5. Prohibition—County court—Appeal—Refusal to grant writ of prohibition—Jurisdiction of Court of Appeal—Jurisdiction of judge of the Admiralty Division—County Courts Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 43), s. 132.—By section 132 of the County Courts Act, 1888, "When the High Court, or a judge thereof, shall have refused to grant a writ of certiorari or prohibition to a court, . . . no other court or judge shall grant such writ, but nothing herein shall affect the right of appealing from the decision of the judge of the High Court to the High Court itself."

Held, that this section only applied to proceedings in the High Court, and did not prevent an appeal to the Court of Appeal from the refusal of the High Court to grant a writ of prohibition to a county court.

A judge of the Admiralty Division has jurisdiction to grant a writ of prohibition; and, therefore, where a judge of that division, while sitting in chambers in vacation to hear applications from all divisions of the High Court, refused to grant a writ of prohibition to a county court in an admiralty cause, the court held that he was acting as a judge of the Admiralty Division, and that, therefore, upon his certifying that he did not desire to hear further argument in court, an appeal lay direct to the Court of Appeal, and not to a divisional court of the Queen's Bench Division.—The Recepta, C.A. 561.

6. Special case stated by arbitrator—Judicial decision—Consultative opinion—Right of appeal to the Court of Appeal—Arbitration Act, 1889 (52 & 53 Vict. c. 49), s. 19.—The Court of Appeal has no jurisdiction to entertain an appeal from an opinion of the High Court of Justice on a question submitted to it by an arbitrator under section 19 of the Arbitration Act, 1889, such opinion not being a judicial decision, but merely consultative.—In re Knight and The Tabernacle Permanent Building Society, C.A. 35—[1892] 2 Q. B. 613; 62 L. J. Q. B. 33; 67 L. T. 403.

7. Stamp—Sufficiency of—Document—Ruling of judge—Trial without jury—Right of appeal—Ord. 39, r. 8.—The ruling of a judge at the trial of an action, whether with or without a jury, that a document offered in evidence is sufficiently stamped is not subject to review in the Court of Appeal.—Blewitt v. Tritton, C.A. 36—[1892] 2 Q. B. 327; 61 L. J. Q. B. 773; 67 L. T. 802.

ATTACHMENT—

8. Discharge from custody—Contempt—Obedience to the order—Ex parte motion—Ord. 44, r. 2; ord. 65, r. 1.—A defendant had been attached and committed to prison for contempt in disobeying an order to attend before an examiner, but afterwards under a writ of habeas corpus ad test., sued out by him in prison, submitted to attend before the examiner, and was examined accordingly.

On motion ex parte for the defendant's discharge from custody,

Held, that a motion for his discharge could not be made ex parte, but only on notice to the plaintiff, on the ground that the plaintiff was entitled to be present so as to insure that all costs to which he was entitled were included in the order for discharge.—In re Evans, Evans v. Noton (No. 2), CH.D. KEK., J.—68 L. T. 324.

9. Irregularity—Motion—Name of wrong judge—Affidavits—Service—Condonation — Ord. 52, r. 4; ord. 70, r. 1.—A motion for attachment was marked with the name of the wrong judge in the Chancery Division.

Held, that it was a mere irregularity which could be amended.

No affidavits were served with the notice of motion for attachment. The defendant had seen copies of the affidavits subsequently to the service of the notice of motion, and had answered them.

Held, that this objection was fatal, and that the court would not in such a case condone the irregularity.—Taylor v. Roe, CH.D. KEK., J.—62 L. J. Ch. 391; 68 L. T. 213.

10. Notice of motion for leave to issue writ—Service of notice where no appearance entered—Filing at Central Office—Rules of Supreme Court, 1883, ord. 44, r. 2; ord. 67, r. 4.—A notice of motion for leave to issue a writ of attachment is sufficiently served, where the party against whom the attachment is to issue has not entered any appearance, by filing it with the proper officer, pursuant to ord. 67, r. 4, of the Rules of the Supreme Court, 1883.

Decision of Kekewich, J., affirmed.

CHANGE OF SOLICITOR—

11. Costs—Omission to file notice of change at Central Office—Ord. 7, r. 3.—After an action had been set down for trial the defendant changed his solicitor, but did not file notice of the change at the Central Office. At the trial the defendant succeeded.

Held, that the defendant was not thereby disentitled to his costs.—Norris v. Bailey, Q.B.D.—62 L. J. Q. B. 338.

CHARGING ORDER—

12. Shares—Director of company—Shares held for purpose of qualification—"In his own right"—1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, s. 14.—Shares standing in the name of a judgment debtor in the books of a company cannot be made the subject of a charging order if he is not the beneficial owner of them, but is merely registered as owner for the purpose of qualifying as a director of the company.

13. Shares—Discretion of judge—Interest of debtor in shares of no value—1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, s. 14—3 & 4 Vict. c. 82, s. 1.—Under section 1 of 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, which says that "it shall be lawful" for a judge to make a charging order upon shares belonging to a judgment debtor, the judge has a discretion whether he will make such an order or not, and he may refuse to make an order upon the ground that the shares are of no value.—Wicks v. Shanks, C.A.—67 L. T. 609.

14. Shares—Order nisi—Application before master to discharge order—No jurisdiction—1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, ss. 14, 15—Ord. 46, r. 1; ord. 54, r. 12.—A master having once granted a charging order nisi upon shares in a public company upon an ex parte application under 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, ss. 14, 15, is functus officio, and, except by consent, has no jurisdiction to discharge it.—Mitchell v. De Vesey, Q.B.D.—67 L. T. 53.

COSTS—

15. County court—Action on contract—Claim over £50—Set-off—Verdict for sum over £50—Set-off afterwards ascertained—Judgment for balance under £20—Amount "recovered"—Action "which might have been commenced in county court"—County Courts Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 43), ss. 57, 116.—In an action on contract to recover £175, tried by a judge without a jury, a verdict was found for the plaintiff for £76, subject to a set-off which was afterwards ascertained to be £63, and judgment was given for the plaintiff for the difference between these sums—that is, for the sum of £12. Upon the question of costs, the learned judge having decided to deal with the costs as if the case had been tried before a jury, and the objection having been taken by the defendant that, as the plaintiff had recovered less than

Held, that the sum "recovered" by the plaintiff was not the £76 for which the verdict was given, but the balance of £12 for which judgment was given; yet, as there was no admitted set-off within section 57 of the Act, which must be a set-off admitted by both parties; and as, consequently, the action was one—being for a sum of over £50—which could not have been commenced in a county court, section 116 did not apply to deprive the plaintiff of his costs, as the words in that section, "action which could have been commenced in a county court," govern the whole section.—Goldhill v. Clarke, Q.B.D.—68 L. T. 414.

16. County court—Certificate—Action of tort brought in High Court—Judgment in default of pleading—Assessment of damages by under-sheriff—Power of under-sheriff to certify for costs on High Court scale—County Courts Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 43), s. 116.—An under-sheriff, before whom damages are assessed in an action brought in the High Court under a judgment signed in default of pleading, has no power to certify for costs on the High Court scale under section 116 of the County Courts Act, 1888, such power being now, under that section, exercisable only by the High Court, or a judge of the High Court.—Cox v. Hill, Q.B.D.—67 L. T. 26.

17. "Good cause"—Discretion of court over costs—Trial with jury—Ord. 65, r. 1.—The plaintiff brought an action to recover damages for breach of contract to put the drains of a house, which he agreed to take on lease from the defendants, into sound condition. Shortly after the plaintiff had gone into occupation of the house some members of his family became ill with scarlet fever. The plaintiff, acting upon the opinion of his medical man, alleged that the scarlet fever was caused by the defective condition of the drains, and claimed, in addition to the cost of putting the drains into sound condition, £366 19s. as special damage in respect of the expenses of medical attendance, medicine, and nurses, the cost of disinfection of the house and furniture, and the cost of houses to which the plaintiff's family and household were removed, and expenses of removal. The jury found that the drains were not in sound condition, but that the scarlet fever was not caused by their defective condition, and awarded the plaintiff £12 12s., the amount expended in making good the defects therein. The judge having ordered the plaintiff to pay the costs occasioned by the claim in respect of the above items of special damage,

Held, that, though this claim was not an issue in the strict sense of the term, it was a separate head of claim involving a distinct class of evidence, and that it was not fair to the defendants to make them pay the costs of resisting it, and that, therefore, "good cause" for making the order existed.—Forster v. Farquhar and Others, C.A. 425—[1893] 1 Q. B. 564; 62 L. J. Q. B. 296; 68 L. T. 308.

18. "Good cause"—Discretion of court over costs—Trial with a jury—Oppression—Ord. 65, r. 1.—The plaintiff brought an action for damages for a libel published in the Star. The Times had published a letter signed by the plaintiff, and in the same issue a leading article thereon, and a few days after a letter from someone else upon the subject of the letter. The Star thereupon published the article complained of, commenting upon what had appeared in the Times, and making a personal attack upon the plaintiff.

The defendants pleaded that their article was fair comment upon a matter of public interest. The jury found a verdict for the plaintiff with one shilling damages. The court was of opinion that it was obvious that the letter was not really written by the plaintiff, but that she had allowed her name to be used for the purpose of raising a political controversy and injuring political opponents.

Held, that it was, under these circumstances, oppression on the part of the plaintiff to bring the action, and that there was, therefore, good cause for which the judge might, in the exercise of his discretion, deprive the plaintiff of costs.—O'Connor v. Star Newspaper Co., C.A.—68 L. T. 146.

19. Refresher fees—Taxation—R. S. C., ord. 65, r. 27 (48).—By ord 65, r. 27 (48), where a cause is tried upon vivâ voce evidence in open court, "if the trial shall extend over more than one day, and shall occupy, either on the first day only, or partly on the first and partly on a subsequent day or days, more than five hours, without being concluded, the taxing officer may allow for every clear day subsequent to that on which the five hours shall have expired" refresher fees to counsel.

Held, that, when a trial has not occupied five hours on the first day, but on the second day the five hours are completed and a further period is occupied on that day before the case is concluded, a "clear day" begins after the expiration of the five hours, and refresher fees may be allowed in respect of the further period of work done on the second day.

20. Trustee—Appeal—Jurisdiction—Charges and expenses—Ord. 65, r. 1—Judicature Act, 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 66), s. 49.—A trustee of real estate unsuccessfully defended a common law action of detinue of title deeds brought by the legal tenant for life of the estate, and was ordered as defendant to pay the costs of the action. The trustee subsequently took out an originating summons in the Chancery Division for administration of the trust estate, in which he asked for, and obtained from the judge by whom the administration proceedings were heard, an order authorizing payment to him out of the trust estate of all the costs in the common law action.

Held, that the costs of the common law action were not, and could not be dealt with as, "costs" in the administration proceedings, but could only in the administration proceedings be dealt with as "charges and expenses"; that the order of the judge in the administration proceedings was therefore not an order as to "costs only," which by ord. 65, r. 1, and section 49 of the Judicature Act, 1873, would be within his unappealable discretion; and, accordingly, that a right of appeal lay on the part of the beneficiaries from the above order.

In re Chennell, Jones v. Chennell, 26 W. R. 595, 8 Ch. D. 492, approved.

Held, also (varying the decision of Kekewich, J.), that the trustee was not entitled, and ought not, to be recouped out of the trust estate all the costs of the common law action, inasmuch as a trustee was only entitled to be indemnified out of his trust estate against all costs, charges, and expenses reasonably, as well as honestly, incurred.—In re

COUNTER-CLAIM—

21. Dismissal of action for want of prosecution—Counter-claim—Default of reply thereto—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 21, r. 16; ord. 23, r. 4; ord. 27, r. 11.—The defendant to an action delivered a counter-claim. The action was dismissed for want of prosecution, the plaintiff having failed to deliver a reply.

Held, that, under ord. 27, r. 11, the defendant was entitled to set down the action on motion for judgment on his counter-claim.—Roberts v. Booth, CH.D. NOR., J. 220—[1893] 1 Ch. 52; 67 L. T. 646.

DEFAULT—

22. Default of defence—Motion for judgment—Jurisdiction of court to order interlocutory judgment—Ord. 27, r. 11.—Upon motion for judgment under ord. 27, r. 11, upon default in delivery of defence, the court or a judge may order interlocutory judgment to be entered, and may refer the whole claim to an official referee to ascertain and report to the court the amount due to the plaintiff.—Charles v. Shepherd, C.A.—[1892] 2 Q. B. 622; 61 L. J. Q. B. 768; 67 L. T. 67.

DISCOVERY—

23. Documents — Affidavit — Interrogatories — R. S. C., 1883, ord. 31, rr. 1, 12.—An action was brought by the Attorney-General at the relation of numerous tramcar manufacturers to restrain a tramway company incorporated by Act of Parliament from manufacturing and supplying rolling stock to other companies by means of capital not authorized to be so applied.

The court refused to order the defendants to make an affidavit of documents; but allowed the plaintiffs to interrogate as to what capital the defendants were employing in such manufacture.—Attorney-General v. North Metropolitan Tramways Co., CH.D. NOR., J.—[1892] 3 Ch. 70; 61 L. J. Ch. 693; 67 L. T. 283.

24. Documents—Affidavit—Motion to remove trade-mark—Ord. 31, r. 12.—In an application to remove trade-marks from the register after all the evidence had been put in except the cross-examination of two witnesses which was to take place in court, Kekewich, J., made an order that a member of the firm should make an affidavit of documents, the member to be examined in court, and that it should suffice, as regards each class of labels or documents, to mention a specimen fairly representative of the whole.

Held, on appeal, that the order was oppressive at that stage of the proceedings, and that the order must be discharged without prejudice to any order which the judge at the trial might think fit to make as to production of documents.—In re Wills' Trade-Marks, C.A.—[1892] 3 Ch. 201; 67 L. T. 453.

24a. Documents—Affidavit—Sufficiency — Production of documents — Privilege — Documents relating solely to the case of the party claiming privilege.—In an action of trespass, to which the defence pleaded was a right of way, the plaintiff made an affidavit of documents in the following terms:—"I have in my possession or power certain documents numbered 1 to 26 inclusive, which are tied up in a bundle marked A, and initialed by me; the said documents relate solely to the title or to the case of the plaintiff, and not to the case of the defendant, nor do they tend to support it, wherefore the plaintiff objects to produce the same, and says they are privileged from production."

Held, that the affidavit sufficiently described the documents so as to enable the court, if it thought fit so to do, to enforce production; and, consequently, that the affidavit was sufficient.

Taylor v. Batten, 27 W. R. 106, 4 Q. B. D. 85, followed.

Held, also, that the documents so described were privileged from production; and that the fact that the affidavit stated that the documents related to the case as well as to the title of the plaintiff, and omitted to state that the documents contained nothing impeaching the case or title of the plaintiff, did not render the affidavit insufficient for the purpose of supporting the plaintiff's claim of privilege from production.

Bewicke v. Graham, 29 W. R. 436, 7 Q. B. D. 400, followed.

McLean v. Jones, 66 L. T. N. S. 653, 40 W. R. Dig. 182, not followed.—Budden v. Wilkinson, C.A. 657.

25. Documents—Privilege—Bankruptcy—Examination by solicitor of trustee in bankruptcy—Transcript of notes of examination—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 27.—A trustee in bankruptcy had, under section 27 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, obtained an order for the examination of certain persons, including the bankrupt and the manager of a bank with whom the bankrupt had entered into an arrangement in reference to his business, and had obtained a transcript of the shorthand notes of the examination by his solicitor of those persons. He subsequently brought an action against the bank to set aside the arrangement, and in that action he made the usual affidavit of documents, in which he objected to produce the transcript, on the ground that it had "come into existence for the purpose of furnishing to his solicitors evidence to be used in this litigation, or information which might lead to the obtaining of such evidence for the use of his solicitors, to enable them to conduct this litigation and advise him in reference thereto."

Held, that the transcript was a privileged document.—Learoyd v. Halifax Joint-Stock Banking Co., CH.D. STI., J. 344—[1893] 1 Ch. 686; 62 L J. Ch. 509; 68 L. T. 158.

25a. Documents—Privilege—Action for negligence—Report of accident made by defendants' servant.—An accident, upon which the plaintiff subsequently founded an action for negligence against the defendants, occurred about six o'clock in the evening, and on the following day a written report thereof was made by the defendants' servant, at a time when no action had been commenced or even threatened.

Privilege from inspection was claimed for this report, on the ground that it had been made or had come into existence solely for the use of the defendant company's solicitor, in anticipation of this action, to advise the company in reference thereto.

Held, that, though there was at the time of the making of the report no action begun or even threatened, the circumstances of the case were such as to raise a high probability, amounting almost to a certainty, that litigation would ensue, and that the report, having come into existence, in view of litigation reasonably apprehended, for the purpose of being laid before the defendants' professional adviser, was privileged from inspection by the other side.—Collins v. London General Omnibus Co., Q.B.D.—68 L. T. 831.

26. Documents—Taking photographs of documents—Ord. 31, r. 14; ord. 50, r. 3.—The court has power to allow a party to an action to take photographs of documents in the possession of the other party.—Lewis v. Earl of Londesborough, Q.B.D.—[1893] 2 Q. B. 191; 62 L. J. Q. B. 452.

27. Interrogatories—Exhibited unreasonably—Prolix or unnecessary—Power to set aside or strike out part of a set—Ord. 31, r. 7.—Ord. 31, r. 7, deals with two cases—first, where interrogatories are exhibited which are in themselves unobjectionable, but, by reason of the circumstances of the case, it would be unreasonable or vexatious to call upon the party interrogated to answer them; secondly, where interrogatories are in themselves objectionable by reason of being prolix, oppressive, unnecessary, or scandalous. In the first case, all or any of the interrogatories may be set aside by a judge's order; in the second case, all or any may be struck out.

Where any party objects to answer interrogatories on any of the grounds mentioned in rule 7, he is entitled to apply for an order under the rule, and cannot be required to take his objection in his affidavit in answer.

The fact that leave has been obtained to administer interrogatories is not a bar to an application under either part of the rule.

If the judge considers a set of interrogatories to be as a whole prolix, oppressive, or unnecessary, he has power to strike them all out, though some of them may be unobjectionable.

EXECUTION—

28. Dormant action—Notice to proceed—Application for leave to issue writ of sequestration—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 42, rr. 22, 23; ord. 64, r. 13.—Ord. 64, r. 13, does not apply to the issue of execution; and therefore it is not necessary, in an action in which no proceeding has been had for one year, to give a month's notice of intention to proceed prior to the issue of execution.—Taylor v. Roe (No. 2), CH.D. KEK., J.—62 L. J. Ch. 391; 68 L. T. 253.

29. Judgment debtor—Examination—Property or means of satisfying judgment—Ord. 42, r. 32.—Ord. 42, r. 32, provides that a judgment debtor may be examined "as to whether any and what debts are owing to the debtor, and whether the debtor has any and what other property or means of satisfying the judgment."

A judgment debtor had deposited, before the judgment was obtained, with the judgment creditor a debenture bond of a company, payable to bearer, for £1,000 as security for the sum of £300, and the judgment creditor had commenced an action against the company to recover the amount of the bond. The company obtained leave to defend that action. The judgment was for £600, and the judgment creditor obtained an order for the examination of the debtor under ord. 42, r. 32. The debtor refused to answer certain questions as to the validity of the bond, and the judge at chambers and the court refused to order him to answer those questions. The judgment creditor appealed.

Held, that the interest of the judgment debtor in the bond was property of the debtor within the meaning of ord. 42, r. 32, as to which he could be examined, but that the appeal must dismissed, the judge and the court having refused, in the exercise of their discretion, to order the debtor to answer these questions.—Watkins v. Ross, C.A.—68 L. T. 423.

INJUNCTION—

30. Undertaking as to damages—Interlocutory injunction—Restraining sale of shares—Dismissal of action at trial—Measure of damages.—The plaintiff, claiming certain shares as his property, obtained, on giving the usual undertaking as to damages, an interlocutory injunction restraining the shareholder and his mortgagees from parting with the shares.

Before the trial a summons by the mortgagees, asking that the shares might be sold and the proceeds paid into court, was successfully opposed by the plaintiff and the shareholder. At the trial the action was dismissed.

Held, that, in ascertaining the amount of damages under the undertaking, all the facts must be considered, including the fluctuations of the market during the continuance of the injunction; and that the amount payable by the plaintiff was not the difference between the price of the shares when the action was dismissed and the highest price at which they had been quoted during that period, but the difference between the price when the injunction was granted and the price when the summons asking for a sale was issued.—Mansell v. British Linen Co. Bank, CH.D. ROM., J.—[1892] 3 Ch. 159; 61 L. J. Ch. 696; 67 L. T. 171.

31. Undertaking as to damages—Corporation—Interlocutory injunction.—Where an interim injunction is granted at the instance of a corporation, the court will in a proper case allow the usual undertaking in damages to be given by the corporation itself, and not require the undertaking to be given by some responsible individual on behalf of the corporation; and the same practice may apply where the plaintiff is a local board.—East Molesey Local Board v. Lambeth Waterworks Co., CH.D. KEK., J.—[1892] 3 Ch. 289; 62 L. J. Ch. 82; 67 L. T. 493.

32. Undertaking as to damages—Interlocutory injunction—Married woman—Sufficiency of undertaking.—Where an interlocutory injunction is granted upon the application of a married woman her sole undertaking as to damages is sufficient.

A married woman living and carrying on business apart from her husband brought her action for specific performance of an alleged agreement to grant a lease, and moved for an interlocutory injunction to restrain the defendant from dealing with the property. The defendant alleged that the plaintiff had not sufficient separate property to satisfy her present liabilities, and that her undertaking in damages would be illusory, and asked for the undertaking of some responsible person.

Held, that, since a married woman was for the purpose of suing in the same position as a feme sole, no distinction could be made between her and a male plaintiff; and that, therefore, her sole undertaking for damages was sufficient.—Pike v. Cave, CH.D. KEK., J.—68 L. T. 650.

33. Undertaking as to damages—Form of order—Interlocutory injunction.—The defendants in an action for the alleged infringement of a patent moved for an injunction to restrain the plaintiff until the trial of the action or further order from continuing the publication of newspaper advertisements threatening legal proceedings or liability in respect of any manufacture, use, sale, or purchase of the patented articles. On the 12th of May an injunction was granted. The registrar prefaced the order by an undertaking in damages on the part of the defendants in the ordinary form. The defendants now moved to vary the minutes of the order by omitting the undertaking as to damages.

Held, that the object in insisting on an undertaking as to damages is, that if, from the court not knowing all the facts, it turns out that an injunction was granted on an interlocutary application which ought not to have been granted, then the respondent is entitled to compensation; and that, the order being in the nature of a final order, an undertaking as to damages ought not to be inserted.—Fenner v. Wilson & Co., CH.D. KEK., J.—[1893] 2 Ch. 656; 68 L. T. 748.

INTERPLEADER—

34. Affidavit by sheriff—Costs of—Application by sheriff for interpleader summons—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 57, rr. 2, 16, 17.—In applying for an interpleader summons a sheriff need not, as a general rule, file an affidavit in support of his application, such affidavit being wholly unnecessary, and if he does so file an affidavit he will not be entitled to the costs of the same.

His proper course is to wait and see if an affidavit is necessary, in which case he can ask for and obtain an adjournment for an affidavit to be filed. —Stocker v. Heggarty, Q.B.D.—67 L. T. 27.

35. Collusion—Interest in subject-matter—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 57, r. 2 (a), (b).—Where an applicant for relief by way of interpleader, though he does not claim any specific portion of the sum in dispute, has agreed with one of the claimants to do what he can to oppose the claim of the other, he claims an interest in the subject-matter in dispute within ord. 57, r. 2 (a), and he "colludes" with one of the claimants within r. 2 (b), and cannot apply for relief. —Murietta v. South American, &c., Co., Q.B.D.—62 L. J. Q. B. 396.

JOINDER OF ACTIONS—

36. Action for recovery of possession of premises for breach of covenant—Claim for injunction—Joinder of separate causes of action—Leave of court—R. S. C., ord. 18, r. 2; ord. 36, r. 58.—A writ was issued claiming (1) recovery of possession of premises, (2) arrears of rent and mesne profits, (3) an injunction to restrain nuisance or damage, (4) damages, and (5) costs. The defendants entered an appearance and served notice of motion asking that the writ might be set aside, on the ground that the leave of the court had not been obtained for the joinder of the two causes of action relating (1) to the injunction, and (2) to the recovery of possession of the premises.

Held, that though a perpetual injunction might be relief inconsistent with the terms of ord. 18, r. 2, yet an interlocutory injunction was within the terms of the rule, being a substitute for damages which might be assessed for the continuing breach between the issue of the writ and the trial of the action.—Read v. Wotton, CH.D. STI., J. 556—[1893] 2 Ch. 171; 62 L. J. Ch. 481; 68 L. T. 209.

37. Claim against executor as such—Claim against executor for personal wrong—Right to join such claims—Ord. 18, r. 5.—The earlier paragraphs of a statement of claim in an action against executors alleged that, in consideration of certain services which the plaintiff performed for their testator in his lifetime and at his request, the testator had promised the plaintiff to bequeath him the sum of £5,000, but that the testator had not done so. Then came two paragraphs claiming the same sum in the alternative, as against the defendants personally, on the ground that the defendants had, by undue influence and fraud, induced the testator to break his contract with the plaintiff as to leaving the plaintiff the above sum.

Held, that these two paragraphs, as they showed a cause of action against the defendants in their private capacity, and without any reference to the estate of the testator, could not, under ord. 18, r. 5, be joined with the claim against the executors as such.—Whitworth v. Darbishire, Q.B.D. 317—68 L. T. 216.

JUDGMENT—

38. Joint debt—Summons under order 14—Judgment against one defendant—Leave to other defendant to defend—Part payment of debt by the one defendant —Plea of res judicata by the other—Ord. 14, r. 5.—In an action against two defendants to recover a debt in which one defendant submits to judgment and pays part of the debt, but the other defendant obtains leave to defend upon a summons under order 14, the plaintiff may, under ord. 14, r. 5, proceed with the action against the remaining defendant, and on obtaining judgment may issue execution for so much of the debt as remains unpaid.—Weall v. James, C.A.—68 L. T. 515.

PARTICULARS—

39. Order for particulars—Non-compliance—Order to dismiss action if particulars not delivered within certain time—Ord. 19, r. 7—Action shown by particulars to be frivolous or vexatious—"The pleadings" —Ord. 25, r. 4.—An order made on a plaintiff to deliver particulars of his claim under ord. 19, r. 7, may include the term that the action shall be dismissed unless the particulars are delivered within a certain time.

Semble, the words "the pleadings" in ord. 25, r. 4, include particulars.—Davey v. Bentinck, C.A. 181 —[1893] 1 Q. B. 185; 62 L. J. Q. B. 114; 67 L. T. 742.

PARTIES—

40. Action for the recovery of land—Title of plaintiff—Equitable title—Person in whom legal estate vested not a party—Judicature Act, 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 66), s. 24, sub-sections 1 and 4; s. 25, sub-section 11.—A person who seeks to recover possession of land upon an equitable title must make the person in whom the legal estate is vested a party to the action.—Allen v. Woods, C.A.—68 L. T. 143.

40a. Death of one of several defendants—Change of parties—Action remitted to county court—Application by administrator of deceased defendant to High Court—Summons to proceed or dismiss—Jurisdiction of High Court—Validity of order of remitter—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 17, r. 8—County Courts Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 43), s. 65.—An action was brought in the High Court against several defendants, whom it was sought to make severally liable on a contract. One of the defendants having died, the plaintiffs obtained an order remitting the action to the county court under section 65 of the County Courts Act, 1888. The action was tried in the county court against the other defendants, and judgment was given in their favour. The administrator of the deceased defendant applied to the High Court under ord. 17, r. 8, for an order that the plaintiffs might be compelled to proceed with the action against him, or that, in default, the action might be dismissed against him.

Held (affirming the decision of the Divisional Court), that, the action having been remitted to the county court, the High Court had no jurisdiction to make an order.

The order remitting the action was not void; semble, it was not irregular.—Duke v. Davis, C.A. 673—[1893] 2 Q. B. 260.

41. Deceased person—No legal personal representative—Proceeding in absence—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 16, r. 46.—On the true construction of ord. 16, r. 46, it is necessary, in order to bind the estate of a deceased person who has no legal personal representative, that the order of the court should state that the judge has proceeded in the absence of any person representing or entitled to represent the estate of the deceased person, or has appointed some person to represent such estate.—In re Richerson, Scales v. Heyhoe, CH.D. CHI., J. 583—62 L. J. Ch. 708.

42. Joinder of defendant—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 16, r. 11—Foreigner resident out of jurisdiction—Order to add as defendant—Discretion—3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 42, s. 8.—Where there are two joint contractors, and an action is brought against one only, the other being a foreigner resident out of the jurisdiction, the defendant is not entitled as of right, under ord. 16, r. 11, to have the other joint contractor added as a defendant.

Held, further, that, upon the facts, the court ought not to order that the other joint contractor should be added as a defendant.

Semble, that, under ord. 16, r. 11, the court has a discretion to order other defendants to be added, but that such discretion ought to be exercised as nearly as possible in accordance with the principles upon which a plea in abatement would, before the Judicature Act, have succeeded or failed.—Wilson, Sons, & Co. v. Balcarres Brook Steamship Co., C.A. 486—[1893] 1 Q. B. 422; 62 L. J. Q. B. 245; 68 L. T. 312.

43. Joinder of plaintiffs—Action for slander—Claims for several slanders spoken of different persons—Ord. 16, r. 1.—By ord. 16, r. 1, "all persons may be joined as plaintiffs in whom the right to any relief claimed is alleged to exist, whether jointly, severally, or in the alternative."

Two plaintiffs joined in an action for slander, and delivered a statement of claim alleging several different slanders, some of one plaintiff, and some of the other.

Held, that the plaintiffs were improperly joined, and that they must elect which plaintiff would proceed, and that so much of the statement of claim as related to the other plaintiff must be struck out.

Booth v. Briscoe, 2 Q. B. D. 496, and Gort v. Rowney, 17 Q. B. D. 625, discussed.—Sandes v. Wildsmith, Q.B.D.—[1893] 1 Q. B. 771; 62 L. J. Q. B. 404.

44. Non-joinder of plaintiffs—Action by one tenant in common for injury to reversion—Action for breach of covenant—Severance of reversion after demise.—One tenant in common of a reversion is entitled to maintain an action for injury to the reversion without joining his co-tenants as plaintiffs.

Pleas in abatement being abolished, it can only be a question for the discretion of the judge at chambers whether the non-joinder of such co-tenants ought to be a ground for staying the action until they are joined.

An action may be maintained by one tenant in common of a reversion for breach of a covenant running with the land, without joinder of his co-tenants in common as plaintiffs, where the severance of the reversion takes place after the demise.—Roberts v. Holland, Q.B.D. 494—[1893] 1 Q. B. 665.

45. Representation—Trade union—Action of tort—Action against defendant as representing all the members—"Having the same interest in one cause or matter"—Ord. 16, r. 9.—The plaintiff sued the defendants, who were the presidents and officers of certain trade unions, "as well on their own behalf as on behalf of and as representing all the members of each of the societies to which they respectively belong," for maliciously and wrongfully inducing certain persons to break their contracts with the plaintiff, and claimed damages and an injunction.

Held (affirming the decision of the Queen's Bench Division), that the members of the trade unions had not "the same interest in one cause or matter" within the meaning of ord. 16, r. 9, and the words above set out must be struck out.

The words of ord. 16, r. 9, only extend to persons who have or claim some beneficial proprietary right which they are asserting or defending in the cause or matter.—Temperton v. Russell and Others, C.A. 321—[1893] 1 Q. B. 435; 62 L. J. Q. B. 300; 68 L. T. 425.

46. Representation—Persons having the same interest in one cause—Order authorizing one or more to defend on behalf of all—Ord. 16, r. 9.—By one of the rules of a labour protection league it was provided that any member who became permanently disabled by an accident was entitled to have a levy made for his benefit on all the members of the league.

The plaintiff brought an action against the president and secretary of the league for the purpose of enforcing his rights under the rule, and applied to the judge in chambers for an order authorizing the defendants to defend the action on behalf of all the other members of the league, who numbered about 4,000. The application was opposed by the defendants, but the judge made the order.

Held, that the order was rightly made.—Wood v. McCarthy, Q.B.D. 523—[1893] 1 Q. B. 775; 62 L. J. Q. B. 373.

PLEADING—

47. Slander—Embarrassing defence.—The defendant in an action of slander denied by his defence having spoken the words alleged in the statement of claim, and set out in his defence other words which he admitted having spoken, and which he alleged were true in substance and in fact.

Held, that this pleading was embarrassing, and that the paragraphs containing the words admitted by the defendant ought to be struck out.—Rassam v. Budge, Q.B.D. 377—[1893] 1 Q. B. 571; 62 L. J. Q. B. 312; 68 L. T. 717.

48. Striking out pleading—Statement of claim seeking relief not asked by writ—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 19, r. 27; ord. 20, r. 4.—By the writ in a partnership action the plaintiff claimed an account of the partnership dealings between himself and the defendant, and an injunction restraining the defendant from dealing with the partnership assets. The plaintiff delivered a statement of claim, in which he alleged that the defendant had made certain representations to him, on the faith of which he paid to the defendant a premium of £1,500. He also alleged a course of conduct on the part of the defendant entitling him to damages, and claimed, in addition to the relief sought by the writ, the return of the said premium, and damages.

Held, that the statement of claim was irregular, inasmuch as it sought relief substantially different from that claimed by the writ, and operated to prevent a reference to arbitration; that it was not an alteration, modification, or extension of the writ within the meaning of ord. 20, r. 4; and that it must be struck out.—Cave v. Crew, CH.D. KEK., J. 359—62 L. J. Ch. 530; 68 L. T. 254.

RECEIVER—

49. Equitable execution—Future salary or earnings

—Judicature Act, 1873, s. 25, sub-section 8.—The court has no jurisdiction to appoint a receiver of the future salary or earnings of a judgment debtor.—Holmes v. Millage, C.A. 354—[1893] 1 Q. B. 551; 62 L. J. Q. B. 380; 68 L. T. 205.

SALE BY COURT—

50. Shares in company—Order for sale—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 50, r. 2.—The expression "goods" in the Rules of the Supreme Court, 1883, ord. 50, r. 2, includes shares in a limited company, and if, for "any just and sufficient reason," it is desirable to have them sold at once, they may be sold under the rule in a pending action.—Evans v. Davies, CH.D. KEK., J. 687—[1893] 2 Ch. 216; 62 L. J. Ch. 661; 68 L. T. 244.

SECURITY FOR COSTS—

51. Counter-claim—Foreigner—Defendant residing out of jurisdiction — Counter-claim arising out of same matter as claim.—Where a counter-claim arises out of the same matter as the claim, so that the counter-claim is in reality in the nature of a defence to the claim, the court will not, in its discretion, order the defendant to give security for the costs of the counter-claim merely because he is a foreigner resident out of the jurisdiction.—Neck v. Taylor, C.A. 486—[1893] 1 Q. B. 560; 68 L. T. 399.

52. New trial — Security for costs of motion—Foreigner resident abroad.—The plaintiff, a foreigner resident abroad and having no property within the jurisdiction, was ordered to give security for the costs of an action brought by him in the Queen's Bench Division. At the trial with a jury the verdict and judgment were entered for the defendants. The plaintiff moved for a new trial, and the defendants applied that the plaintiff should be ordered to give security for the costs of the motion for a new trial.

Held, that the proper practice was to make the application in the first instance at chambers, subject to an appeal direct to the Court of Appeal.—Bentsen v. Taylor, Sons, & Co., C.A. 593—[1893] 2 Q. B. 193.

STRIKING OUT PLEADINGS—

53. Frivolous action—Motion to dismiss—Rules of Supreme Court, 1883, ord. 25, r. 4.—The plaintiff claimed as heir-at-law of a testator who died in 1774, and alleged that the defendants were in possession as trustees of the testator's will. Some of the defendants traversed this allegation by their defence, whilst the remainder, without delivering a defence, put in evidence in denial. On a motion by all the defendants to dismiss the action,

Held, that, as the evidence in support was not distinct and conclusive, and that as some of the defendants had put in a defence, the motion failed.—Fletcher v. Bethom, CH.D. KEK., J. 621—68 L. T. 438.

54. Pleading raising question of law—Ord. 25, r. 4.—Applications under ord. 25, r. 4, to strike out pleadings or stay proceedings on the ground that the pleadings disclose no reasonable cause of action or defence, are not intended to supply the place of demurrers, except in frivolous cases, and the court will not entertain such an application if the pleading raises an important question of law.

An application to strike out a statement of claim or stay proceedings may be made by the defendant in a proper case before filing his defence.—Attorney-General of the Duchy of Lancaster v. London and North-Western Railway Co., C.A.—[1892] 3 Ch. 274; 62 L. J. Ch. 271; 67 L. T. 810.

55. Striking out claim—Delay.—The court refused an application by the defendant to strike out the statement of claim as frivolous and vexatious upon the ground of delay, the pleadings having closed and the action having been set down for trial—Cross v. Earl Howe, CH.D. NOR., J.—62 L. J. Ch. 342.

TRIAL—

56. Notice of trial—Change of venue by order—Party entitled to ten days' notice from date of order—Ord. 20, r. 5; Ord. 36, rr. 1, 14.—By ord. 36, r. 1, where no place of trial is named in a statement of claim, the place of trial shall be Middlesex unless otherwise ordered by the court or a judge.

The plaintiff commenced an action in the Liverpool District Registry, and delivered a statement of claim in which no place of trial was named. No order as to the place of trial was applied for. On the 16th of March, 1892, the plaintiff gave the defendant notice of trial at Liverpool Assizes, the commission day for which was fixed for the 26th of March.

Upon a summons for directions taken out by the plaintiff, the district registrar on the 19th of March made an order for the trial of the action by a jury, and that the plaintiff's notice of trial at Liverpool should stand.

Held, that the notice of trial for Liverpool was a nullity, and although the registrar had jurisdiction to change the venue from Middlesex to Liverpool, he had no power thereby to deprive the defendant of his right to ten days' notice of trial, or to put him under terms to take short notice.—Laskier v. Tekeian, Q.B.D.—67 L. T. 121.

57. Notice of trial—No reply delivered—Giving notice of trial before expiration of time for reply—Right of plaintiff to give such notice of trial—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 27, r. 13; ord. 36, rr. 11, 15.—A plaintiff who has not delivered a reply cannot give notice of trial of the action until the expiration of the time allowed for delivering a reply—that is, until the expiration of twenty-one days after the defence; because, no reply having been delivered under rule 13 of order 27, the pleadings are not closed until the expiration of the time allowed for reply, and no notice of trial can be given until after that time.—Robinson v. Caldwell and Another, Q.B.D. 364—[1893] 1 Q. B. 519; 62 L. J. Q. B. 252; 68 L. T. 218.

58. Place of trial—Local venue provided by statute—Abolition of local venues—Ord. 36, r. 1.—By ord. 36, r. 1, "There shall be no local venue for the trial of any action, except where otherwise provided by statute."

Held, that, all existing local venues having been abolished by the Judicature Act, 1875, the exception in ord. 36, r. 1, operates only in favour of local venues created by statutes passed since the Judicature Act, 1875, and does not have the effect of reviving local venues created by statutes passed prior to that Act.—Buckley v. Hull Docks Co., Q.B.D.—[1893] 2 Q. B. 93; 62 L. J. Q. B. 449.

WRIT—

59. Service — Foreign corporation — Shareholders resident in England—Service on agent in England—Setting aside—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 9, r. 8.—A foreign corporation, though having the majority of its shareholders resident in England, and having a London agent with a London office, but carrying on no principal or material part of its business in this country, is not liable to be sued in an English court.

Service of a writ of summons on the agent in London set aside on the ground of want of jurisdiction.—Badcock v. Cumberland Gap Park Co., CH.D. STI., J. 204—[1893] 1 Ch. 362; 62 L. J. Ch. 247; 68 L. T. 155.

60. Service—Foreign corporation—Head officer—R. S. C., ord. 9, r. 8.—The decision of the Divisional Court (67 L. T. N. S. 309) that the person served with the writ was not a "head officer" of the defendants within ord. 9, r. 8, affirmed.—Golding v. Order of La Sainte Union des Sacrées Cœurs, C.A. —67 L. T. 605.

61. Service—Foreign defendant—"Person carrying on business in name other than his own"—Foreigner residing abroad—Claim for injunction—Issue of concurrent writ for service out of jurisdiction—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 11, r. 1 (f); ord. 48a, r. 11.—By ord. 48*a*, r. 11, "Any person carrying on business within the jurisdiction in a name or style other than his own name may be sued in such name or style as if it were a firm name; and, so far as the nature of the case will permit, all rules relating to proceedings against firms shall apply."

A foreigner resident abroad was the proprietor of a newspaper called the New York Herald, printed and published at New York. He had an office within the jurisdiction, over the door of which was the name of the newspaper, the office being occupied by a telegraphic correspondent for the purpose of transmitting news to New York. At the head of one of the columns of the newspaper were the words, "New York Herald—James Gordon Bennett, proprietor." Copies of the newspaper were occasionally sold there. The plaintiff issued a writ of summons against the New York Herald, claiming damages for an alleged libel which had been published in the newspaper, and an injunction against any future publication.

Held, by the Queen's Bench Division, that ord. 48*a*, r. 11, did not apply so as to allow service of the writ of summons upon the proprietor of the newspaper abroad, even if he were carrying on business within the jurisdiction under a name or style other than his own name, and that leave ought not to be given under ord. 11, r. 1, to issue a concurrent writ for service upon him out of the jurisdiction, although an injunction to restrain the publication of the libel was claimed, no grounds being shown for apprehending that the publication of the libel would be repeated.

Held, by the Court of Appeal, that the proprietor of the newspaper did not carry on business within the jurisdiction in a name or style other than his own name, and that, therefore, ord. 48*a*, r. 11, did not apply.—De Bernales v. New York Herald, C.A. 481—[1893] 2 Q. B. 97n; 62 L. J. Q. B. 385; 68 L. T. 658.

62. Service—Foreign defendant—"Person carrying on business within the jurisdiction in a name or style other than his own name"—Foreigner resident abroad —Service on manager at place of business within the jurisdiction—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 48*a*, r. 11.—The defendant was a foreigner residing and carrying on business abroad, but also "carrying on business within the jurisdiction in a name or style other than his own name."

Held, that, on the authority of Russell v. Cambefort, 37 W. R. 701, 23 Q. B. D. 526, ord. 48*a*, r. 11, did not apply to a foreigner resident abroad; and therefore the writ could not be served, under rule 3, on the defendant's manager at his place of business within the jurisdiction.—St. Gobain, Channy, and Cirey Co. v. Hoyermann's Agency, C.A. 563—[1893] 2 Q. B. 96.

63. Service of concurrent writ out of the jurisdiction—Action of tort—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 11, r. 1 (g). —By R. S. C., 1883, ord. 11, r. 1, service out of the jurisdiction of a writ of summons may be allowed (g) whenever any person out of the jurisdiction is a necessary or proper party to an action properly brought against some other person duly served within the jurisdiction.

Held, that clause (g) applies to an action of tort.

The plaintiff, an undischarged bankrupt, brought an action for malicious prosecution against K. & Co. (Limited) and K. The prosecution of which the plaintiff complained had been carried on at the instance of K. & Co. (Limited); K., who was the manager of a London depôt of K. & Co. (Limited) having laid the information against the plaintiff.

The registered office of K. & Co. (Limited), a company incorporated under the Companies Act, 1862, was in Belfast. K. had been duly served within the jurisdiction with the writ in the plaintiff's action.

Held, that leave ought to be granted to serve a concurrent writ on K. & Co. (Limited) at their registered office in Ireland.—Croft v. King, Q.B.D. 394—[1893] 1 Q. B. 419; 62 L. J. Q. B. 242; 68 L. T. 296.

64. Service out of the jurisdiction—Action against defendant within the jurisdiction and defendant out of the jurisdiction—Concurrent writ—Action properly brought against defendant within the jurisdiction—Ord. 11, r. 1 (g).—A stevedore, while engaged in discharging the cargo of a ship, fell through a hatchway, in consequence, as was alleged, of the negligence of those in charge of the ship, and sustained injuries from which he died. His widow brought an action, under Lord Campbell's Act, against the brokers of the ship, who carried on business in London, and the owners of the ship, who carried on business and resided in Scotland. The writ having been served on the brokers, the plaintiff obtained an order at chambers, under ord. 11, r. 1 (g), giving her leave to issue a concurrent writ for service out of the jurisdiction, and to serve the same on the owners in Scotland.

The Court of Appeal, considering that the plaintiff had made the brokers defendants to the action merely for the purpose of being able to sue the Scotch owners in the English Court, held that the action was not "properly brought" against the brokers within the meaning of ord. 11, r. 1 (g), and, therefore, that service on the owners in Scotland ought not to be allowed.—Witted v. Galbraith, Pembroke, & Co., C.A. 395—[1893] 1 Q. B. 577; 62 L. J. Q. B. 248; 68 L. T. 421.

65. Service out of the jurisdiction—Contract "which, according to the terms thereof, ought to be performed within the jurisdiction"—Ord. 11, r. 1 (e).—The plaintiff, a civil engineer carrying on business at Newcastle, was employed by the defendants, who had undertaken to construct docks in Spain, to design and superintend the construction of the same. By the terms of the contract between the plaintiff and the defendants the plaintiff was to prepare drawings and specifications, to take out quantities, and to superintend the construction of the docks in consideration of a commission of £5 per cent. on the total cost of the works. He was not to be required to be constantly in attendance, but was to visit the works during their construction once in every three months, and to have a competent assistant constantly in attendance to superintend the construction. He was to be paid travelling expenses in connection with his visits (say, £40 British sterling per visit), and the agreed commission was to be payable in cash as follows:—

viz., £1 10s. per cent. upon the contract price of each contract as and when it was made, and the remaining £3 10s. per cent. at the expiration of every three months on the value of the work done during three such months, subject to the retention of a certain amount as security for the performance of the plaintiff's duties, which amount was to be paid to the plaintiff within seventy-five days after the works had been finally completed to the defendants' satisfaction. The contract did not in express terms provide where these payments were to be made. The plaintiff sued for a balance payable to him under the contract.

Held, that the true construction of the contract and the circumstances under which it was entered into was that the payments to the plaintiff were to be made at Newcastle; and therefore leave might be given to issue a concurrent writ in the action, and serve notice thereof upon one of the defendants, a foreigner resident out of the jurisdiction, under ord. 11, r. 1 (e).—Thompson v. Palmer, C.A.—[1893] 2 Q. B. 80.

66. Service out of the jurisdiction—Foreign defendant—Service of notice of writ—Appearance under protest.—A foreign defendant resident out of the jurisdiction was served with notice of a writ of summons. He appeared to the writ under protest, the appearance containing on the margin a memorandum that it was entered under protest in order to preserve the defendant's right to object to the jurisdiction.

Held, that the defendant could properly enter an appearance under protest without losing his right to object to the jurisdiction.—Firth & Sons v. De Las Rivas, Q.B.D. 493—[1893] 1 Q. B. 768; 62 L. J. Q. B. 403.

67. Specially-indorsed writ—Appearance—Amendment of indorsement — Summons for judgment — R. S. C., 1883, ord. 3, r. 6; ord. 14, r. 1. — A plaintiff commenced an action by serving upon the defendant a writ indorsed with a claim for a sum of money lent, and for interest in the nature of unliquidated damages. The defendant entered an appearance to this writ. On a summons for judgment under ord. 14, r. 1, unconditional leave to defend was granted. The plaintiff then by leave amended his indorsement by striking out the claim for interest, so as to make his writ specially indorsed within ord. 3, r. 6, and afterwards obtained leave to enter final judgment upon a new summons under ord. 14, r. 1.

Held, that the defendant's appearance to the original writ must stand as an appearance to the amended writ, and that, the defendant having appeared to a specially-indorsed writ, the master had jurisdiction to give leave to enter final judgment.

Gurney v. Small, [1891] 2 Q. B. 584, 40 W. R. Dig. 192, discussed. — Paxton v. Baird, Q.B.D. 88 —[1893] 1 Q. B. 139; 62 L. J. Q. B. 176; 67 L. T. 623.

68. Specially-indorsed writ—"Bank charges"—Liquidated demand — Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, (45 & 46 Vict. c. 61), s. 57—Ord. 3, r. 6; ord. 14, r. 1.—In an action on a bill of exchange the writ was specially indorsed under ord. 3, r. 6, with a claim for the amount of the bill, and also 2s. 9d. "bank charges."

Held, that by the expression "bank charges" expenses of noting were referred to, and that as expenses of noting are made liquidated damages by section 57 of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, this was a good special indorsement.—Dando v. Boden, Q.B.D. 285—[1893] 1 Q. B. 318; 62 L. J. Q. B. 339; 68 L. T. 90.

69. Specially-indorsed writ—Condition precedent—No averment of performance—Ord. 3, r. 6; ord. 14, r. 1.—The defendant agreed to pay £210 to the plaintiff if he would deliver to the defendant's husband certain bills. In an action to recover the £210, the writ, which was specially indorsed under ord. 3, r. 6, did not aver that the plaintiff had delivered the bills to the defendant's husband.

Held, that, notwithstanding the non-averment of performance of the condition precedent, it was a good special indorsement.—Bradley v. Chamberlyn, Q.B.D. 300—[1893] 1 Q. B. 439; 68 L. T. 413.

70. Specially-indorsed writ—Dishonoured cheque—Notice of dishonour—Ord. 14, r. 1.—To entitle the holder of a cheque to sign final judgment against the drawer under ord. 14, r. 1, upon a writ indorsed with a claim for the amount of the cheque, which has been dishonoured, the indorsement must contain an allegation of notice of dishonour to the drawer or of facts dispensing with it.—Frühauf v. Grosvenor, Q.B.D—61 L. J. Q. B. 717.

71. Specially-indorsed writ — Promissory note payable by instalments—Ord. 3, r. 6.—The plaintiffs indorsed their writ against the defendants as follows: "The plaintiffs' claim is against the defendants as makers of a joint and several promissory note dated the 11th of April, 1892, for £36 6s., and payable by certain instalments in respect whereof default has been made. Particulars.—To balance of moneys owing upon the said promissory note, £24 6s."

Held, that this was not a good special indorsement.—Manchester Advance and Discount Bank v. Walton,, Q.B.D.—62 L. J. Q. B. 158; 68 L. T. 167.

PRACTICE (IRELAND):—

1. Appeal—Case stated by justices—Appeal to Court of Appeal—20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, s. 6—Judicature (Ireland) Act, 1877, s. 24.—Section 24 of the Judicature Act does not repeal the definite prohibition of appeal which was previously enacted by particular statutes. No appeal, therefore, lies from the decision of the Divisional Court as to what is the proper answer to be given to the questions raised by a case stated by justices to take the opinion of the Divisional Court in a civil matter.—Harvey v. Copeland, C.A. (Ir.)—32 L. R. Ir. 419.

2. Appeal—"Criminal cause or matter"—Jurisdiction of Court of Appeal—Judicature (Ireland) Act, 1877, s. 50.—An order made by the Queen's Bench Division attaching a constable for refusing to aid the sheriff in the execution of a writ is a judgment in a "criminal cause or matter," and no appeal lies to the Court of Appeal.—Attorney-General v. Kissane, C.A. (Ir.)—32 L. R. Ir. 220.

3. Appeal—Death of respondent—Continuing proceedings—Appellant neglecting to proceed— Ord. 17, r. 8.—The plaintiff, in an action for specific performance, appealed from a judgment dismissing the action. After the notice of appeal was served the defendant died. The plaintiff took no steps to revive the action; thereupon the heir and personal representative of the deceased defendant revived the action. The plaintiff failed to proceed with the appeal, and the new defendants applied to the Court of Appeal to direct the plaintiff to proceed therewith, and in default that the appeal be dismissed.

Held, that the proper course for the new defendants to have adopted was to have given the order reviving the action to the registrar, and that on this being done the appeal would have been listed in its turn.—Nolan v. Marquis of Drogheda, C.A. (Ir.)—31 L. R. Ir. 84.

4. Costs—Counsel—Contempt of court—Election petition—Motion for attachment—Costs of three counsel—Corrupt and Illegal Practices Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 51), s. 44, sub-section 3.—There is no fixed rule absolutely limiting for the purposes of taxation, as between party and party, the number of counsel to two upon a motion in the Common Law Division.

A motion for attachment for contempt of court by interfering with the trial of a pending election petition is an originating motion in the Queen's Bench Division, and the costs of it are taxable accordingly, and are not governed by section 44, sub-section 3, of the Corrupt and Illegal Practices Act, 1883.

An order made upon such a motion is an order of the Queen's Bench Division, not an order in the election petition matter, and is properly signed by the registrar of the division.—In re South Meath Election Petition, Q.B.D. (Ir.)—32 L. R. Ir. 407.

5. Costs—Costs levied after notice of appeal—Reversal of judgment—Liability of solicitor to refund.—Where after service of notice of appeal the successful party levied his costs, and the judgment was afterwards reversed,

Held, that the party's solicitor was responsible for repayment of the costs in default of his client refunding them.

In such a case an order for repayment should be asked for at the hearing of the appeal, and the costs of a motion for the purpose will not be allowed.—Fitzmaurice v. Jordan, C.A. (Ir.)—32 L. R. Ir. 112.

6. Costs—Crown—Action to establish right to seashore—Plaintiffs' right proved—Attorney-General not contesting—Costs of Crown.—In an action against the Attorney-General and other defendants to establish the plaintiffs' right to seashore the Attorney-General did not actively contest the plaintiffs' claim, but did not admit the same until their right had been established by evidence at the trial.

Held, that the Attorney-General was not entitled to be paid his costs of action by the plaintiffs.—Kilmorey v. Attorney-General, V.C. (Ir.)—29 L. R. Ir. 320.

7. Costs—Taxation between party and party—Costs of action—Costs of one issue—Third counsel—Refreshers.—Taxation of costs referred back to the taxing master for allowance of certain items.—Mahalm v. M'Cullagh, V.C. (Ir.)—31 L. R. Ir. 147.

8. Costs of discovery—Certificate of judge at trial—Ord. 31, r. 24.—Applications for a certificate under ord. 31, r. 24, as to costs of discovery cannot be granted by the judge who presided at the trial unless made to him at the trial before he leaves the court or its precincts.—Aaron's Reefs Co. v. Twiss, Q.B.D. (Ir.)—30 L. R. Ir. 616.

9. Death of defendant—Order to carry on proceedings against personal representative—Time—Order 17; ord. 28, r. 7.—An order that further proceedings in an action be carried on against the personal representative of a deceased defendant is an order for leave to amend within ord. 28, r. 7, and must be acted on, if no time is therein limited for so doing, within fourteen days from its date.—Brown v. Owen, V.C. (Ir.)—31 L. R. Ir. 94.

10. Notice of trial—Service—Computation of time—Ord. 64, r. 9.—Where an order made in court on a Saturday gave liberty to the plaintiffs to serve a notice of trial on that day, and where the service of such order was not made at the Dublin offices of the defendant's solicitor until after 2 p.m. on the same day,

Held, that under the circumstances ord. 64, r. 9, did not invalidate the service. That order only applies where it is essential to find a terminus a quo for the computation of subsequent periods of time.—Browne v. Reid, Q.B.D. (Ir.)—30 L. R. Ir. 619.

11. Originating summons—Service—Indorsement of service—Affidavit—R. S. C., 1891, ord. 9, r. 16; ord. 67, r. 6.—Ord. 67, r. 6, applies to the service of an originating summons, which should be indorsed after service in the manner provided by ord. 9, r. 16, and the affidavit of service should verify the making of such indorsement.—Browne v. Browne, V.C. (Ir.)—29 L. R. Ir. 368.

12. Originating summons—Service out of jurisdiction—Ord. 11, rr. 4, 10.—The court has power under ord. 11, rr. 4, 10, to give liberty to issue a concurrent originating summons for service out of the jurisdiction.—In re Herdman's Trusts, M.R. (Ir.)—31 L. R. Ir. 87.

13. Parties—Third party—Application for leave to serve—Ord. 16, r. 49.—An application in the Chancery Division for leave to serve a third party notice under ord. 16, r. 49, should be made by motion on notice to the parties in the action.—Maquay v. Adair, V.C. (Ir.)—29 L. R. Ir. 369. [See also Deane v. Bunbury, 29 L. R. Ir. 416.]

14. Parties—Third party—Covenants in leases of adjacent plots—Indemnity—Ord. 16, rr. 49, 53.—A.'s predecessor in title demised lands to B. in 1872, and covenanted to make a new street beside them. In 1890 A. demised adjacent lands to C., and in this lease C. covenanted with A. to complete and finish all new streets on lands abutting on these lands, so far as A. was bound to do, subject to certain terms. B. brought an action against A. claiming damages for breach of the covenant in the lease of 1872. A. sought to join C. as a defendant under ord. 16, r. 49.

Held, that A. under the circumstances was not entitled to do so.

Application for directions under ord. 16, r. 53, should be made by motion on notice, and not by summons—Morris v. Kennedy, Q.B.D. (Ir.)—30 L. R. Ir. 461.

15. Pleading—New assignment—Reference in reply to "particulars" previously furnished—R. S. C., 1891, ord. 19, rr. 6, 17; ord. 23, r. 6.—In an action against a solicitor, as fiduciary agent and trustee of the plaintiff, for loss sustained by negligent and improper investment of funds belonging to the plaintiff, the defendant pleaded (inter alia) the Statutes of Limitation. The plaintiff in his reply alleged that the defendant had committed a fraudulent breach of trust, and that he was not entitled as trustee to the benefit of the statutes, and said that "full particulars of such fraudulent breaches of trust have been furnished to the defendant by the plaintiff."

Held, that that the reply was bad and should be set aside, first, because it was either an unnecessary repetition of the statement of claim or an attempt to make a new case; and, secondly, because it did not comply with ord. 19, r. 6, which requires the particulars to be stated on the face of the pleadings.—Kingston v. Corker, V.C. (Ir.)—29 L. R. Ir. 364.

16. Receiver—Discharge—Surcharge of accounts—Jurisdiction.—Notwithstanding the discharge of a receiver, the court has jurisdiction to surcharge his accounts.—In re Edwards (Minors), L.J. (Ir.)—31 L. R. Ir. 242.

17. Receiver—Equitable execution—Deposit receipt in joint names of defendant and another—"Just or convenient"—Ord. 50, r. 27.—A receiver was appointed by way of equitable execution of the interest of a judgment debtor in a deposit receipt held in the joint names of the judgment debtor and another, even though the whole beneficial interest in the fund was in the judgment debtor.—O'Donovan v. Goggin, Q.B.D. (Ir.)—30 L. R. Ir. 579.

18. Receiver — Equitable execution — Judgment debtor's money in bailee's hands.—There is no need to appoint a receiver of a sum of money due to a judgment debtor in a bailee's hands, as the money can be seized by the sheriff under a writ of fi. fa.—Morris v. Taylor, C.A. (Ir.)—32 L. R. Ir. 14.

19. Security for costs—Plaintiff permanently resident out of jurisdiction, but having real estate within it—Affidavit as to defence on the merits—Common Law Procedure (Ireland) Act, 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 113), s. 52.—A plaintiff permanently resident out of the jurisdiction may be compelled to give security for the costs of the action, although he has real estate within the jurisdiction; and for the purposes of an application for such security the existence of a defence is sufficiently shown if the affidavit states that the defendant "has a defence upon the merits," without disclosing his case. Where the affidavit is made by a defendant whose knowledge is personal, and against whose veracity there is no suggestion, such affidavit is fairly "satisfactory" within section 52 of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1853.—Casey v. Cork Gas Consumers' Co., C.A. (Ir.)—30 L. R. Ir. 713.

20. Sequestration—Peer—Enforcement of order of Chancery Division in England—41 Geo. 3, c. 90, s. 5—Ord. 43, rr. 5, 7.—An order to account was made against the defendant, an Irish peer, by the Chancery Division of the High Court of Justice in England, and an exemplification of it enrolled in Ireland pursuant to 41 Geo. 3, c. 90, s. 5. An application was made for leave to appoint a sequestrator over the estates of the defendant in Ireland.

Held, that the order could only be enforced by the process of attachment prescribed by the statute, and that, although that remedy was not available against the defendant by reason of his being a peer, there was no jurisdiction to issue a sequestration to enforce obedience to the order.—Viscount Kilworth v. Lord Mountcashell, M.R. (Ir.)—31 L. R. Ir. 81.

21. Writ—Service out of jurisdiction—Defendant resident in England—Offer and acceptance by post—Ord. 11, r. 1 (e) (f).—The defendant, who was floating a company in England, wrote to D., a stockbroker in Dublin, offering him a specified fee and commission in consideration of the company going to allotment and D. allowing his name to be used as broker. D. accepted the offer by signing his name at foot, and sent it by post from Dublin, addressed to the defendant's agent in England, along with a letter in which he stated that his asseptance was on the distinct understanding that H. (an English firm of stockbrokers) also joined. The company's prospectus was issued, and H.'s name did not appear upon it as the company's English broker; but, notwithstanding this, D. did not withdraw his name, and acted as Dublin broker until the company went to allotment. D., having been adjudicated bankrupt, his assignees brought an action in Ireland to recover the agreed remuneration.

Held, that the court had power under ord. 11, r. 1 (f), to give leave to serve the writ in England, there being a concluded contract entered into within the jurisdiction by the posting of D.'s acceptance in Dublin, and there being evidence from which a jury might infer that he had waived the term requiring the appointment of H. as brokers in England; and, further, that, under the circumstances of this case, the balance of convenience was in favour of the action being tried in Dublin.—Maconchy v. Trower, Q.B.D. (Ir.)—30 L. R. Ir. 480.

22. Writ — Special indorsement — "Statement of claim"—Signature —Ord. 3, r. 6; order 14.—In order to enable a plaintiff to obtain final judgment on a specially-indorsed writ, the indorsement of the claim must be headed "statement of claim," and must be signed at the foot.—Cassidy v. M'Alone, C.A. (Ir.)—32 L. R. Ir. 368.

PRESCRIPTION.—See LIGHT, 2-4; WAY, 2.

PRINCIPAL and AGENT:—

1. Estate agent—Authority—Sale of land—Specific performance.—An estate agent has no authority to enter into a contract for sale of real estate unless he has express authority from the vendor to sign such contract.—Chadburn v. Moore, CH.D. KEK., J. 39—61 L. J. Ch. 674; 67 L. T. 257.

2. Sale of land—Vendor and purchaser—Payment of deposit to vendor's solicitor—Recovery of deposit on sale going off—Liability of solicitor—Following trust money.—Upon a sale of land the purchaser, in accordance with the conditions of sale, paid to the vendor's solicitor, as agent for the vendor, a deposit upon the purchase-money. The vendor being unable to make a good title, the sale went off, and the purchaser sued the vendor's solicitor to recover the deposit-money.

Held, that, as the solicitor received the money solely as agent of the vendor, the action would not lie against him at the suit of the purchaser.—Ellis v. Goulton, C.A. 411—[1893] 1 Q. B. 350; 62 L. J. Q. B. 232; 68 L. T. 144.

3. Undisclosed principal—Liability for contracts of agent—Secret limitation of agent's authority—Credit given to agent alone.—The ordinary rule of law that a principal is liable for the acts of his agent which are within the authority usually confided to an agent of that character, notwithstanding secret limitations upon that authority, applies also where the existence of any principal was unknown to the person contracting with, and giving credit to, the agent alone.

W. supplied goods to an agent H., on H.'s sole credit, in ignorance that H. had principals. F. & Co., who were in fact H.'s principals, had allowed H. to appear as ostensible principal while managing their business, with secret instructions not to buy goods. H. failing to pay, W. sued F. & Co. for the price of goods supplied, which were such as were ordinarily dealt in and supplied to such a business.

Held, that F. & Co. were liable.—Watteau v. Fenwick, Q.B.D. 222—[1893] 1 Q. B. 346; 67 L. T. 831.

PRINCIPAL and SURETY:—

1. Contribution by co-surety—Right of surety to contribution after judgment and before payment—

Unascertained liability to contribute—Statute of Limitations.—A surety, against whom judgment has been obtained by the principal creditor for the full amount of the guarantee, but who has paid nothing in respect thereof, can maintain an action against a co-surety to compel him to contribute towards the common liability; and for this purpose the allowance of a claim by the principal creditor against the estate of a deceased surety is equivalent to a judgment; and where the principal creditor is a party to the action, the surety may obtain an order upon the co-surety to pay his proportion to the principal creditor. Where the principal creditor is not a party, he may obtain a prospective order directing the co-surety, upon payment by the surety of his own share, to indemnify the latter against further liability.

The Statute of Limitations does not begin to run against a surety suing a co-surety for contribution until the liability of the surety is ascertained—i.e., until the claim of the principal creditor has been established against him; although at the time of the action for contribution the statute may have run as between the principal creditor and the co-surety.—Wolmershausen v. Gullick, CH.D. WRI., J.—[1893] 2 Ch. 514; 68 L. T. 753.

2. Discharge of surety—Novation—Release of principal debtor.—Where a creditor released his principal debtor and accepted a third party as full debtor in his stead, and the surety for the former debtor agreed to give a guarantee for the latter, and to continue his former guarantee until he did so, and then died without having done so,

Held, in an action by the creditor against his executors, that, the former debt having been extinguished by the release, the remedy against the deceased was gone.

Novation of debt operates as a complete release of the original debtor, and cannot be construed as a mere covenant not to sue him.—Commercial Bank of Tasmania v. Jones, P.C.—[1893] A. C. 313; 68 L. T. 776.

3. Discharge of surety—Release of co-surety.—In a suit against one of five joint and several sureties to recover the amount guaranteed, it appeared that the plaintiff had, without the defendant's knowledge and consent, released another of the sureties "from all debts due by him to the bank at this date."

Held, that the plaintiff could not recover, and that the legal effect of the release could not be modified by evidence of verbal negotiations prior to the release for the purpose of showing an agreement to reserve rights against the sureties.—Mercantile Bank of Sydney v. Taylor, P.C.—[1893] A. C. 317.

4. Fraud of principal—Liability of surety—Building contract—Certificate obtained by fraud of contractor.—An alteration in the position of a surety brought about by the act of an employer does not discharge the surety, if the act of the employer has been caused by the fraud of an employé whose honesty the surety has guaranteed.

The plaintiffs entered into a contract with a firm of contractors for the construction of certain works. The defendants were parties to the contract as sureties for the contractors. The contract provided that the liability of the sureties should continue until the engineer of the plaintiffs should have given his final certificate of completion. A certain sum of money was to be retained by the plaintiffs, and not paid over to the contractors until six months after the granting of the final certificate of completion. The certificate was obtained by fraud on the part of the contractors, and the retention money was paid over to the contractors.

Held (affirming the decision of Grantham, J.), that the certificate, having been obtained by the fraud of the contractors, whose honesty the defendants had guaranteed, did not operate as a discharge of the defendants' liability under their contract of suretyship; that the payment over of the retention money, even if it had not been brought about by the contractors' fraud, would not have discharged the defendants, there being no evidence that the payment of the retention money had caused any alteration in the position of the defendants.—Mayor, &c., of Kingston-upon-Hull v. Harding, C.A. 19—[1892] 2 Q. B. 494; 62 L. J. Q. B. 55; 67 L. T. 539.

5. Guarantee—Parol—Recital in will—"Note or memorandum in writing"—Statute of Frauds (29 Car. 2, c. 3), s. 4.—A testator, being in partnership with the two defendants, and his son being indebted to the firm, verbally agreed to "guarantee" such indebtedness. By his will he recited that his son was indebted to the firm, and that he had "guaranteed" the firm against loss in respect of such debt, and he directed that his son should stand released from all personal liability for it. By a codicil he confirmed the "guarantee."

Held, that, if there was such a guarantee as the 4th section of the Statute of Frauds referred to at all, there was in the will and codicil a sufficient note or memorandum in writing, within the meaning of the section, to take the case out of the operation of it.

Semble, that a promise to pay made by a person to himself and others was not a guarantee at all within the Statute of Frauds.

Decision of Kekewich, J., reversed.—In re Hoyle, Hoyle v. Hoyle, C.A. 81—[1893] 1 Ch. 84; 62 L. J. Ch. 182; 67 L. T. 674.

6. Guarantee—Agreement with some co-sureties—Payment—Bankruptcy—Proof for full amount due—Banker—Appropriation of sum deposited.—Several persons, including W., had become guarantors to the appellant bank for the discharge of £6,250. Some of the guarantors, not including W., subsequently entered into an arrangement by agreement with the bank, that their liability, as between them and the bank, should be limited, so that, in lieu of their personal liability to pay the entire sum guaranteed in case of default of the principal debtor, there should be substituted a deposit of £3,000 in the bank to a suspense account. The bank had the power of appropriating the £3,000 towards the payment of the principal debt, but had not done so. W. became bankrupt.

Held, that the agreement did not amount to payment, and that, apart from bankruptcy, the carrying out of such an arrangement in no way affected the liability of W.; and, further, that the bankruptcy of W. could make no difference as to the amount of W.'s liability; so that the bank were entitled to prove in W.'s bankruptcy for the full sum of £6,250, without making the deduction of the £3,000.—Commercial Bank of Australia v. Official Assignee of John Wilson & Co.—P.C. 603—[1893] A. C. 181; 62 L. J. P. C. 61; 68 L. T. 540.

7. Guarantee—Construction—Mortgage—Running of time—Statute of Limitations (21 Jac. 1, c. 16).—On the 20th of January, 1881, E. P., in consideration of an advance of £2,000, mortgaged certain real estate to G. H., and covenanted to pay £2,000 and interest at 5 per cent. per annum on the 20th of July, 1881, and to pay interest at the like rate half-yearly on the £2,000, or so much of it as should for the time being remain owing, until the same should be fully paid. On the 9th of May, 1882, C. F. P. executed a document in the following terms: "I, C. F. P.," for the consideration therein mentioned, "do hereby guarantee to the said G. H. repayment of the sum . . . of £2,000, and interest for the same" at 5 per cent. per annum. This guarantee was referred to in the correspondence relating to the execution thereof as "the guarantee of E. P.'s mortgage." Interest was regularly paid by E. P. until the 20th of July, 1891. E. P. died on the 13th of September, 1891, and the proceeds of his estate and the property comprised in the mortgage were sufficient to pay £600 only of the mortgage debt. Upon non-compliance by C. F. P. with a notice to pay the balance of £1,400 and interest, the mortgagee brought an action against C. F. P., and thereby sought to recover from him £1,400 and interest, as sums payable by him under his guarantee.

Held, that the liability of C. F. P. was confined to the payment of £2,000 and interest, in accordance with the terms of the mortgage deed.

Held, that, in the absence of an agreement not to sue for a definite time, the mortgagee could at the most be presumed to have agreed not to sue for a reasonable time; that such time had elapsed prior to the commencement of six years before the bringing of the action, and that consequently the mortgagee's claim against C. F. P. was barred by the Statute of Limitations.—Henton v. Paddison, CH.D. STI., J.—68 L. T. 405.

8. Rights of surety—Right to compel principal debtor to pay off debt.—When there is an actual accrued debt, and the surety is liable and admits liability for the amount guaranteed, he has a right to compel the principal debtor to relieve him from liability by paying off the debt.

In order to support such an action it is not necessary to prove that the creditor has refused to exercise his right to sue the principal debtor.

The suggested limitation, in Padwick v. Stanley, 9 Hare, 627, on the right of the surety, disapproved.

Ranelagh v. Hayes, 1 Vern. 189, approved and followed.—Mathews v. Saurin, M.R. (Ir.)—31 L. R. Ir. 181.

PRIVY COUNCIL PRACTICE:—

1. Appeal—Appealable amount—Plaintiff's right to appeal—Mesne profits.—The measure of value for determining a plaintiff's right of appeal is the amount for which the defendant has successfully resisted a decree. Mesne profits, if demanded by the plaint, must enter into a calculation of the appealable value.—Mohideen Hadjiar v. Pitchey, P.C.—[1893] A. C. 193.

2. Appeal in criminal case—Leave to appeal refused.—Her Majesty will not be advised to grant leave to appeal in criminal cases where it is not even suggested or surmised that substantial and grave injustice has been done, either through a disregard of the forms of legal process, or by some violation of the principles of natural justice. —Ex parte Deeming, P.C.—[1892] A. C. 422.

3. Appeal in criminal case—Leave to appeal refused—Indian Penal Code, s. 511.—Although in very special and exceptional circumstances leave to appeal in criminal cases may be granted, misdirection by a judge, either in leaving a case to a jury where there is no evidence, or founded on an incorrect construction of the Penal Code, even if established, is insufficient for that purpose, especially where no miscarriage of justice has resulted. —Ex parte Macrea, P.C.—[1893] A. C. 346.

PROBATE:—

1. Administration bond—Legacy to infant—Failure to provide for payment—Condition to well and truly administer—Breach—Sureties—Court of Probate Act, 1857 (20 & 21 Vict. c. 77), s. 81.—An administration bond was executed by administratrixes with the will annexed, and by two sureties, by which the administratrixes were to "well and truly administer" the personal estate of the deceased—"(that is to say) do pay the debts of the deceased which he did owe at his decease, and then the legacies contained in the said will annexed to the said letters of administration so to them committed, as far as the personal estate and effects will thereto extend, and the law charge them." The testator left a legacy of £50 to a person who was then, and at the time the action was brought, an infant. The administratrixes paid the debts and legacies, except this legacy of £50, and distributed the residue to those entitled under the will, at the same time handing over £50 to their brother-in-law to pay the legacy to the infant. The brother-in-law did not pay the £50, and had disappeared. In an action against the sureties by an assignee of the bond, suing on behalf of the infant, to recover the legacy of £50,

Held, that there had been a breach of the bond on the part of the administratrixes in distributing the whole of the estate without retaining sufficient to pay the legacy to the infant upon its attaining twenty-one, and that the sureties were therefor liable.—Dobbs v. Brain, C.A. 7—[1892] 2 Q. B. 207; 61 L. J. Q. B. 749; 67 L. T. 371.

2. Administration bond—Sureties—Fund in court—Order to dispense with sureties.—The court dispensed with sureties upon an administration bond, where the whole estate of the deceased was in court, and where the applicant had been appointed by the Chancery Division guardian of an infant, who was the sole surviving beneficiary.—In the Goods of Wilcocks, P.D. & A.D.—67 L. T. 528.

3. Administration bond—Will of foreigner resident abroad—Administration with will annexed—Foreign sureties.—The testator, a French subject resident in France, made a will there by which he constituted a domiciled French subject his universal and residuary legatee. Part of the estate was in the English funds, and there were no debts in this country.

Held, on application for administration with the will annexed, that the administratrix might give an administration bond with two foreign sureties.—In the Goods of De Beaufort, P.D. & A.D.—[1893] P. 231.

4. Administration, grant of—Creditors—Prior petens—Grant to creditor for largest amount.—In an insolvent estate the court made a grant to the creditor for the largest amount, in preference to one who claimed for a much smaller sum, but who was prior petens.—In the Goods of Smith, P.D. & A.D.—67 L. T. 503.

5. Administration, grant of—Joint grant—Citation of next of kin—Special circumstances—Court of Probate Act, 1857 (20 & 21 Vict. c. 77), s. 73.—Where the only next of kin and persons interested in the personal estate of a deceased intestate were her brother and certain nephews and nieces, some of whom were residing out of the jurisdiction of the court,

The court (with the consent of those residing within the jurisdiction) made a joint grant of administration to the brother and one of the nephews without requiring those residing out of the jurisdiction to be cited.—In the Goods of Wash, P.D. & A.D.—61 L. J. P. D. & A. 123.

6. Administration, grant of—Lost will—Grant until will found—Court of Probate Act, 1857 (20 & 21 Vict. c. 77), s. 73.—Where it appeared that a will had been duly executed by the testator, but it could not be found after his death, and his widow, who had made a statement to the effect that it had been accidentally destroyed, on being served with a notice to attend and be examined concerning the contents of the will, disobeyed the order, and was believed to have left the country, and it was necessary, for the purpose of selling certain leasehold property, valued at between £300 and £400, the court made a grant of letters of administration to the testator's only son, with the consent of the remaining next of kin, limited to the property in question, and without requiring the widow to be cited.—In the Goods of Wright, P.D. & A.D. 318—[1893] P. 21; 62 L. J. P. D. & A. 31; 68 L. T. 25.

7. Administration, grant of—Lost will—Evidence that will dealt only with realty—Intestacy as to personalty.—Where after the death of the testator the will was lost, and there was evidence that the will dealt only with realty, the court granted administration to the applicant upon the ground that the deceased died intestate as regards personalty.—In the Goods of Attlay, P.D. & A.D.—67 L. T. 502.

8. Administration, grant of—Specific fund—Testator entitled to no beneficial interest—Executors dead—Limited grant to executors of deceased beneficiary—Court of Probate Act, 1857 (20 & 21 Vict. c. 77), s. 73.—The surviving trustee of a fund being dead, and no one having been appointed to administer his estate, the next of kin having failed, after citation, to have his will proved,

The court made a grant of administration, under section 73, limited to a specific fund over which the deceased tenant for life had power to dispose, and did dispose, by her will, and by the said will appointed the applicants executors.—In the Goods of Price, P.D. & A.D.—67 L. T. 503.

9. Administration, grant of—Wife's estate—Lapse of time—Grant to next of kin—Concealment—Right of husband to revocation of grant—County court—Appeal—Court of Probate Act, 1857 (20 & 21 Vict. c. 77), ss. 54-58—Court of Probate Act, 1858 (21 & 22 Vict. c. 95), ss. 10, 11—County Courts Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 43), s. 100.—A husband and wife separated in 1863. The wife died in 1881, and the executors of her father's will took out letters of administration of her estate in her maiden name, describing her as a spinster, without notice to the husband, although they knew of the marriage, and that the husband was alive. In 1888 the husband first heard of his wife's death, and, after inquiries, brought an action in the county court for revocation of the grant, and regrant to himself.

The county court judge held that, in the absence of fraud, he was not justified in revoking the grant after so long a lapse of time.

Held, on appeal (Jeune, P., and Barnes, J.), that it was not necessary to show fraud, and that the grant must be revoked and a grant made to the husband.

Semble, that the appeal was not under the County Courts Act, 1888, but under the Court of Probate Acts, 1857 and 1858, and that, although section 11 of the Act of 1858 repeals section 54 of the 1857 Act, which confers the jurisdiction on the county courts, and the Act of 1858, whilst giving jurisdiction to the county court, contains no reference to appeals, yet the Acts of 1857 and 1858 must be read together, and the appellate jurisdiction under section 58 of the 1857 Act remains.

Held, that, even if the appeal were not under the Court of Probate Acts, the question of law was sufficiently raised to comply with the requirements of section 120 of the County Courts Act, 1888.—Copeland v. Sinister, P.D. & A.D. 269—[1893] P. 16; 62 L. J. P. D. & A. 38; 68 L. T. 257.

10. Administration with will annexed—Two wills—No executor named in second—Wife sole beneficiary—Grant to wife—Securities dispensed with—Personal bond only required.—A testator having duly executed a will, placed it among his papers, and being unable to find it, subsequently executed a second will. By both wills he made his wife his universal legatee, and in his first will he appointed her his sole executrix; but in the second will he made no appointment of executrix.

Held, on a motion for probate of both wills, that administration ought to be granted to the widow, with the last will annexed, but that she might give her personal bond without being required to find securities.—In the Goods of Allen, P.D. & A.D.—[1893] P. 184; 68 L. T. 462.

11. Administration with will annexed—Widow a lunatic—Only other legatee renounced—Court of Probate Act, 1857 (20 & 21 Vict. c. 77), s. 73—"Special circumstances"—Grant to nominee of guardians.—By his will the testator appointed his widow sole executrix, and left her all his property, subject to a legacy of £10. The widow did not prove, became of unsound mind, and was confined in an asylum as a pauper lunatic. The legatee and creditors, and all the next of kin of the widow, save two, who were abroad, renounced administration.

The court granted administration, with the will annexed, to the nominee of the guardians for the use and benefit of the lunatic widow, the guardians undertaking, by their counsel, to secure the legacy of £10 to any proper representative of the legatee who should appear to claim it, the legatee herself being now dead.—In the Goods of Sharland, P.D. & A.D.—67 L. T. 501.

12. Bankrupt executor out of England—Testator's desire to change executor—Wish not carried out—Grant to widow—Citation—Court of Probate Act, 1857 (20 & 21 Vict. c. 77), s. 73.—A sole executor named in a will during the lifetime of the testator left England under an assumed name, after selling all his effects to his landlord, and was subsequently adjudicated bankrupt.

The testator, on hearing of the facts, desired to alter his will by removing the name from the executorship, but, owing to illness and the inaccessibility of the will at the time, died without carrying out his intention.

The court, on motion, granted letters of administration with the will annexed to the testator's widow under section 73 of the Probate Act, 1857, and dispensed with citation of the absent executor.—In the Goods of Crawshay, P.D. & A.D. 303—[1893] P. 108; 68 L. T. 260.

13. Codicils—Words of revocation included in will without the knowledge of testatrix—Omission.—A testatrix by her will constituted her illegitimate son her universal legatee and one of her executors. After the execution of the will, and shortly before her death, she expressed a wish to bequeath part of her furniture and other personal effects to her sister, her sole next of kin and heiress-at-law, and proceeded to write out a bequest giving effect to such wish on a printed form of will, which was duly executed. The form commenced by a clause of revocation, but the testatrix did not fill up the blanks in this part of the form, and the clause was not read over to her at the time of execution, though the rest of the will was, and there was no evidence that she knew of such clause.

Held, that under the circumstances probate might be granted of the paper omitting the clause of revocation as a codicil to the original will.—In the Goods of Moore, P.D. & A.D.—[1892] P. 378; 62 L. J. P. D. & A. 9.

14. Execution—Attestation—1 Vict. c. 26, s. 9.—The two attesting witnesses to a will were father and son, both working at the same workshop, but on different floors. The testator produced his will first to the father alone telling him it was his will, and asked him to sign it as witness. The testator's signature was already on the will, and the father signed it. The son, who was working on the floor above, was then called in and signed as witness, all three being present.

Held, that the will was not duly executed.—Wyatt v. Berry, P.D. & A.D.—[1893] P. 5; 62 L. J. P. D. & A. 28; 68 L. T. 416.

15. Execution—Foot or end—Lord St. Leonards' Act (15 & 16 Vict. c. 24), s. 1.—The whole of the disposing portion of a will was written on the first side of a sheet of foolscap; the second and third sides were blank; and the attestation clause with the signatures of the testator and the witnesses were on the fourth side.

Held, that the will was duly executed.—In the Goods of Fuller, P.D. & A.D.—[1892] P. 377; 62 L. J. P. D. & A. 40; 67 L. T. 501.

16. Executor according to the tenor—Trustees.—Trustees nominated by a testator "to carry out this will," and "for the due execution of this my will,"

Held, to be thereby constituted executors according to the tenor and entitled to probate.—In the Goods of Russell, In the Goods of Laird, P.D. & A.D.—[1892] P. 380; 62 L. J. P. D. & A. 15; 67 L. T. 504.

17. Married woman, will of—Consent of husband not obtained—No separate property—Probate to husband.—The testatrix was married in 1872, and died in 1874. She made a will in 1873, to which her husband's consent was not obtained. Under a settlement of 1846, made upon the marriage of her parents, she was entitled to a share of certain property in reversion. Part of this interest became an interest in possession some months after her death in 1874, and the remainder in 1890.

The court declined to grant administration to the husband as upon intestacy, but made the ordinary grant of probate to him.—In the Goods of Williams, P.D. & A.D.—67 L. T. 502.

18. Practice — Attachment — Non-compliance with citation to bring in probate of will—Motion for attachment—Affidavits not served along with notice of motion — Application dismissed. — The affidavits intended to be used by the applicant, upon a motion for attachment, must be served at the same time as the notice of motion.—Evans v. Evans, P.D. & A.D.—67 L. T. 719.

19. Practice — Citation — Compromise — Attorney-General cited to give his sanction.—A testator by his will bequeathed the residue of his real and personal estate for the establishment of an agricultural college. The will was disputed by one of his next of kin, who was also heiress-at-law; but a compromise was agreed to, by which the will was to be proved in solemn form without opposition. The Attorney-General, as interested in the disposal of the residue, was cited, and appeared at the hearing to give his sanction to the compromise.—Boughey v. Minor, P.D. & A.D.—[1893] P. 181.

20. Practice—Costs—Plea of undue influence not established — Costs out of the estate. — If the mode in which a testator has executed his will raises in the minds of those who are interested in contesting it reasonable grounds for suspicion, and really give rise to litigation ensuing thereon, the court is justified, in the exercise of its discretion, in ordering the costs of both plaintiff and defendant to be paid out of the estate, notwithstanding the fact that undue influence has been pleaded but not proved.—Williams v. Coker, P.D. & A.D.—67 L. T. 626.

21. Practice—Costs—Plea of undue influence not established—Costs out of the estate.—The widow of the testator propounded his last will, which was disputed, upon the ground of testamentary incapacity, by the defendant, his brother, who also pleaded that it was obtained by the undue influence of the widow, and counter-claimed probate of an earlier will. The court found for the plaintiff, the widow, upon both issues, and pronounced for the last will; but, being of opinion that there were reasonable grounds for the litigation, and there being evidence of certain expressions used by the widow just prior to the making of the will, upon which the plea of undue influence appeared to have been founded, the court, upon the authority of Orton v. Smith, L. R. 3 P. & D. 23, and the principles therein enunciated, allowed costs of both parties out of the estate.—Shortman v. Shortman, P.D. & A.D.—67 L. T. 717.

22. Practice—Testamentary capacity—Lunatic so found by inquisition—Reports of Chancery visitors—Lunacy Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 5), ss. 184, 185, 186—Costs.—In an action to obtain probate of the will of a lunatic so found by inquisition two of the next of kin opposed probate on the ground of her insanity at the date of the will. The Chairman of the Board of Chancery Visitors was examined on behalf of the defendants, and admitted that the reports made by himself and his colleagues were still in existence, but refused to produce them on the ground that he was precluded by section 186 of the Lunacy Act, 1890, from making them public.

Held, by Barnes, J. (after consultation with Lord Esher, M.R., Lindley, Bowen, Lopes, and Kay, L.JJ.), that the reports must be treated as non-existent, and that no order could be made for their production.

The jury having found for the will, probate of it was granted, and on the authority of Davies v. Gregory, L. R. 3 P. & D. 28, the costs of all parties were allowed out of the estate.—Roe v. Nix, P.D. & A.D.—[1893] P. 55; 62 L. J. P. D. & A. 36; 68 L. T. 26.

23. Revocation—Intention—Implied revival—Grant of probate refused on motion.—A testator executed two wills, one in 1872 and the other in 1892. By the first he left all his property to his wife, and by the second he made no provision for her. Shortly before his death he asked that the two wills might be brought to him, and directed his wife to burn the later will, which she did, and he then handed to her the earlier will, saying, "Now you will be mistress of all."

After his death letters of administration were granted to his widow, upon the assumption that the destruction of the will of 1892, which revoked all previous wills, had caused an intestacy.

Held, that, inasmuch as there were infants interested under the earlier will who could not consent, the court would not revoke the letters of administration and grant probate of the later will on motion, but would require such will to be propounded.—In the Goods of Andrews, P.D. & A.D.—[1893] P. 14; 62 L. J. P. D. & A. 25; 68 L. T. 259.

24. Revocation of will—Effect of words of revocation—Previous wills—Erroneous explanation.—If a testator employs another to convey his meaning in technical language, and that other person makes a mistake in doing it, the mistake is the same as if the testator had employed the technical language himself.

A lady, after making a previous will and codicil, desired to make a special disposition of a small sum of money payable under a policy of life insurance. She asked the insurance agent to draw up a will carrying out her intentions. He procured a form beginning with the words "I hereby revoke all wills by me at any time heretofore made," and, on his reading out these words, the testatrix objected to them, on the ground that she did not wish to revoke her previous will and codicil, but he assured her that, as the will in question related only to the insurance money, these words would not have the effect of revoking the other instruments, and, if struck out, might invalidate this will, and he believed what he stated to her. She accordingly executed the will with these words in.

The plaintiffs, executors of all three documents, commenced an action asking for probate of all these testamentary papers, but with the words of revocation in the last omitted.

Held, that on the authority of Guardhouse v. Blackburn, 14 W. R. 463, L. R. 1 P. & D. 109, and Morrell v. Morrell, 30 W. R. 491, 7 P. D. 68, the testatrix, having had the will read over to her, must, in the absence of fraud, be held to have approved as well as known the contents thereof, and probate of the last will only, with the words of revocation, granted.—Collins v. Elstowe, P.D. & A.D. 287—[1893] P. 1; 62 L. J. P. D. & A. 26; 67 L. T. 624.

25. Will and codicils—Practice—Writing on back of codicil—Blank piece of paper pasted over codicil—Order of removal.—A testatrix left a will and two codicils duly executed. She had made various alterations in the codicils, and among others she had written some words at the back of the first codicil, and had subsequently pasted a piece of blank paper over them.

The court made an order that the paper should be removed to ascertain what the words were.—In the Goods of Gilbert, P.D. & A.D.—[1893] P. 183; 68 L. T. 461.

PROBATE (IRELAND):—

1. Administration, grant of—Joint grant to one of next of kin and to a nominee refused—Joint grant to four next of kin—Security—20 & 21 Vict. c. 79. s. 78.—An intestate died leaving a nephew and three nieces her sole next of kin. The court refused to make a joint grant of administration to the nephew and the mother of the nieces under a power of attorney from them, but made a joint grant to the four next of kin upon their entering into a bond and giving justifying security in a separate bond.—In the Goods of M'Grossan, P. & M.D. (Ir.) — 29 L. R. Ir. 412.

2. Costs — Administration with will annexed — Action to recall grant and have will condemned—Want of capacity—Grant of administration to creditor—R. S. C., 1891, ord. 13, r. 11; ord. 27, r. 10; ord. 36, r. 2.—Where a next of kin wishes to recall a grant of administration with the will annexed, and have the will condemned on the ground of want of capacity, the proper course is to proceed by action and have the will condemned at the trial.

A creditor taking out administration with a supposed will annexed does so, though acting innocently, at his own risk, and will not be allowed his costs in a successful action to condemn the will.—Ross v. Wallace, P. & M.D. (Ir.)—29 L. R. Ir. 330.

3. Costs—Taxation—Instructions to act and intervene—Witnesses' expenses—Costs of counsel—Rules of April, 1878, ord. 7, schedule 75a; ord. 10, rr. 1, 8, 8a, 30.—In an important probate action the court refused to interfere with the taxation of costs in respect of instructions to act and intervene, instructions for brief, &c., and witnesses' expenses, though it was of opinion that one of the largest items was excessive.

A party to a probate action, to whom costs were given out of the estate, was not allowed on taxation: (a) the costs of counsel appearing on a motion not in the cause, e.g., an application before the receiver judge; (b) the costs of two counsel on a proceeding in chambers; (c) the costs of an application for discovery of documents where no certificate had been given by the judge at the trial.—Rooney v. Langtry, P. & M.D. (Ir.)—31 L. R. Ir. 175.

4. Execution—Attestation clause—Refusal of witnesses to make affidavit—Ord. 79, rr. 4, 7.—Each of two attesting witnesses to a will (the attestation clause of which was insufficient) refused to make an affidavit as to its due execution. The two executors named in the will made affidavits under ord. 79, r. 7, as to its due execution in their presence.

Held, that the court had jurisdiction to dispense with the affidavits of the attesting witnesses, and would grant probate on the affidavits of the executors.—In the Goods of Ovens, P. & M.D. (Ir.)—29 L. R. Ir. 451.

5. Publican's licence—Freehold premises—Heir in possession on death of owner intestate—Property in licence—Valuation for personal estate.—The owner of a freehold licensed house died intestate. His heir entered, and his daughter took out administration to the deceased. The heir obtained at quarter sessions a transfer of the licence to himself. An order for administration of the assets of the deceased having been made, an application was made for an order that the licensed interest and the goodwill of the business formed part of the personal estate of the deceased.

Held, reversing the decision of Porter, M.R., that there was no property in the licence or goodwill apart from the ownership of the premises to which the licence was attached.—Kelly v. Montague, C.A. (Ir.)—29 L. R. Ir. 429.

PROHIBITION.—See PRACTICE, 5.

QUO WARRANTO:—

Acceptance of incompatible office—Churchwarden and vestry clerk—Non-corporate office.—The defendant, while holding the office of churchwarden, was proposed for the office of vestry clerk, and declared elected. He published a letter thanking the electors, but never acted as vestry clerk.

Held, that the defendant had not exercised the office of vestry clerk in such a way as to render the remedy by quo warranto applicable.

RAILWAY:—

1. Abandonment of undertaking—Parliamentary deposit—Release of deposit—Jurisdiction—Parliamentary Deposits and Bonds Act, 1892 (55 & 56 Vict. c. 27), s. 1.—Summons by the persons who had made a parliamentary deposit on behalf of a railway company for a transfer of the deposit. The company had acquired no land and raised no capital. Their powers of compulsory purchase had expired. They had passed a resolution to abandon the undertaking. The time limited by their Acts for the completion of the undertaking had still three years to run.

Held, that, under the Parliamentary Deposits and Bonds Act, 1892, s. 1, the court had no jurisdiction to order a transfer of the deposit fund until the time limited for the completion of the undertaking had arrived.—In re South Hampshire Railway and Pier Act, 1891, Ex parte Chambers, CH.D. NOR., J. 170—[1893] 1 Ch. 47; 62 L. J. Ch. 78; 67 L. T. 647.

2. Fencing—Liability to fence as against adjoining land—Sufficiency of fence—Injury to cattle—Railways Clauses Act, 1845 (8 & 9 Vict. c. 20), ss. 68-73.—In 1862 a railway company acquired lands under their statutory powers, and, in constructing their line, fenced it off from the adjoining lands occupied by the plaintiff by a ditch or gripe, and bank with posts and rails on top; the ditch being on the plaintiff's side, the bank on the railway side, of the fence. In 1890 the plaintiff's cow slipped into, and was found dead in, the ditch.

Held, that the fence was properly and sufficiently constructed by the company, and that the company were not liable in damages for the loss of the cow. —Ryan v. Great Southern and Western Railway Co., Q.B.D. (Ir.)—32 L. R. Ir. 15.

3. Minerals—Custom of working usual in district—Minerals worked by quarrying—Statutory right of mine owner to enter upon and break up surface land of railway—Trespass—Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845 (8 & 9 Vict. c. 20), ss. 77-79.—The respective rights under the Railways Clauses Act, 1845, of a railway company, as owner of land compulsorily taken, and as the owner of minerals under such land, are different from, and are not governed by the principles of law applicable to, the respective rights of land surface owners and mineral owners in other cases.

The owner of minerals lying under or near the land and line of a railway company, which, according to the usual manner of working in the district, are won by open quarrying is, by section 79 of the Railways Clauses Act, 1845, if desirous of working such minerals, and if the railway company are not willing to purchase the same, entitled to enter upon and break up the surface of the land of the railway company for the purpose of winning the minerals, even though the consequence be the destruction of the railway.—Ruabon Brick and Terra Cotta Co. v. Great Western Railway Co., C.A. 418—[1893] 1 Ch. 427; 62 L. J. Ch. 483; 68 L. T. 110.

4. Negligence—Breach of duty to passenger—Theft by fellow-passenger—Liability of company.—The plaintiff, by his statement of claim, alleged that he had suffered damage through being robbed while a passenger on the defendants' railway, and through the refusal of the defendants' servants to afford him facilities for arresting the persons who had robbed him, and for recovering the stolen property.

Held, that the statement of claim disclosed no cause of action.—Cobb v. Great Western Railway Co., C.A. 275—[1893] 1 Q. B. 459; 62 L. J. Q. B. 339; 68 L. T. 483.

5. Passenger—Condition on ticket—Ticket used for station other than that for which it is available—Action to recover full fare to station at which passenger alighted—Penalty.—The defendant, a passenger on the plaintiffs' railway, took a ticket to S., for which he paid 8s. The ticket contained a condition that if used for any other station it would be forfeited and the full fare charged. He alighted at F., a station short of S., to which the fare was 9s., he then took a ticket from F., to his destination on a branch line. He did not give up at F. the ticket he had originally taken. The plaintiffs brought an action in the county court, claiming to be entitled to recover 9s., the full fare to F., or 1s. if the defendant was entitled to be credited with the 8s. paid by him for his original ticket; but they were nonsuited, on the ground that they were suing for a penalty, which was only recoverable before justices.

Held, that the plaintiffs were not suing to recover a penalty, but to recover a fare, under the terms of the contract entered into with the defendant; that the action was therefore maintainable and the nonsuit was wrong.

6. Passenger—Failure to produce ticket—Detention pending inquiry as to name and address—Railways Regulations Act, 1889 (52 & 53 Vict. c. 57), s. 5, sub-section 2.—A railway company are not authorized, under section 1, sub-section 2, of the Railways Regulations Act, 1889—which empowers any officer of a company or any constable to detain a passenger who, having failed to produce or to deliver up his ticket or to pay his fare, refuses to give his name and address, until he can be brought before a justice —to detain a passenger pending an inquiry whether the name and address given by him are correct when the name and address turn out upon inquiry to have been correctly given.—Knights v. London, Chatham, and Dover Railway Co., Q.B.D.—62 L. J. Q. B. 378.

7. Scheme of arrangement—Creditors—Sale of undertaking—Bill in Parliament—Petition to sanction scheme—Railway Companies Act, 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 127), s. 18.—A petition was presented by a railway company asking that the scheme of arrangement between the company and its creditors might be confirmed by the order of the court. Another railway company had agreed to purchase the undertaking of the petitioning company, and a Bill was prepared to be presented in the session of 1893 to carry the sale into effect.

Held, that the court ought not, on behalf of unsecured creditors, to approve a scheme on the hypothesis that a Bill before Parliament would pass into law.

Held, therefore, that the petition must stand over, with liberty to apply.—In re Eastern and Midlands Railway Co., CH.D. KEK., J.—67 L. T. 711.

REGISTRY ACTS (YORKSHIRE):—

"Assurance"—Contract for sale of land—Registration—Priority—Yorkshire Registries Act, 1884 (47 & 48 Vict. c. 54), ss. 3, 4, 14.—The owner of land in Yorkshire made an agreement in writing with the plaintiff, by which the former agreed, in consideration of £200 paid to him by the plaintiff, to complete certain buildings on the land, and the plaintiff agreed to purchase the buildings when completed for £750, less the £200 already paid. This agreement was registered under the Yorkshire Registries Act, 1884.

Held, that this agreement was not an "assurance" within the meaning of the Act so as to be entitled to be registered, and that, therefore, it had not priority over a prior mortgage to the defendants registered subsequently.—Rodger v. Harrison and Others, C.A. 291—[1893] 1 Q. B. 161; 62 L. J. Q. B. 213; 68 L. T. 66.

RENT-CHARGE:—

Personal liability of grantor—Possession of land—Receipt of rents and profits—Payment of prior incumbrances—No surplus for payment of rent-charge.—W. was owner in fee of certain lands subject to outstanding mortgages, and by deed dated December 19, 1881, granted an annual rent-charge to the plaintiffs. From a recital it appeared that the object of the deed was the benefit of the lands by promoting the construction of a railway. There was no express covenant to pay the rent-charge, but it was provided that it might be recovered by the same means as if it were a rent-charge created by the Improvement of Land Act, 1863. There was a recital that the lands were subject to the incumbrances which were set out in the schedule to the deed. Since the execution of the deed the rents and profits of the lands were insufficient to pay the paramount outgoings and incumbrances, and no rents were received out of the lands applicable to the payment of the rent-charge. W. had appointed an agent or receiver over the rents, who accounted for the receipts to the incumbrancers, and paid over whatever he received according to the interest of those entitled, no surplus at any time coming to W. W. used a portion of the lands, which were untenanted, as a home farm, and it was stocked and worked by him; but any profits he received were paid to the mortgagees.

Held, (1) that the legal position of W. was that of tenant at will or bailiff to the mortgagees, and that he was not pernor of the profits of the lands so as to be personally liable to pay the rent-charge; (2) that the fact of his being himself the grantor of the rent-charge charged upon the lands did not render him personally liable to pay the rent-charge.

Neither by analogy to the old writ of annuity nor by virtue of the grant itself is there now necessarily involved any personal liability on the part of the grantor of an annuity charged upon lands.—Sligo, Leitrim, and Northern Railway Co. v. Whyte, M.R. (Ir.)—31 L. R. Ir. 316.

RESTRAINT of TRADE:—

1. Covenant—Severability—Validity—Sale of business—Business in the nature of a trade secret—Restraint co-extensive with area of business—No limit of space.—In 1888 the defendant covenanted with the plaintiff company, which carried on (inter alia) the business—formerly carried on by the defendant and sold by him to a company with which the plaintiff company was afterwards amalgamated—of the manufacture of quick-firing and other guns and ammunition, that he "should not, during the term of twenty-five years from the date of the incorporation of the company, if the company should so long continue to carry on business, engage, except on behalf of the company, either directly or indirectly, in the trade or business of a manufacturer of guns, gun mountings or carriages, gunpowder explosives or ammunition, or in any business competing or liable to compete in any way with that for the time being carried on by the company."

In pursuance of a further agreement the defendant acted as one of the plaintiff company's two managing directors. The defendant in 1890 having, owing to disputes, resigned his office in the plaintiff company, and having entered into arrangements with a foreign company for carrying on business in competition with the businesses of the plaintiff company, the plaintiff company commenced an action asking that the defendant might be restrained by injunction from so acting in breach of the covenant.

Held, that the covenant was severable, and was valid and must be enforced so far as it related to the business of the manufacture of guns, gun mountings or carriages, gunpowder explosives or ammunition; for that, so restricted, it was not, although unlimited in space, contrary to public policy or wider than was reasonably necessary for the protection of the interests of the covenantee.

Semble, that the covenant would be too wide, and therefore invalid, in its application to any business which the company might carry on during twenty-five years.

Decision of Romer, J., reversed.

The law as to "general restraints" and "partial restraints" reviewed.

Per Bowen, L.J.—The rule as to general restraint of trade ought not to apply where a trader or manufacturer finds it necessary, for the advantageous transfer of the goodwill of a business in which he is interested and for the adequate protection of those who buy it, to covenant that he will retire altogether from the trade which is being disposed of, provided always that the covenant is one the tendency of which is not injurious to the public.—Maxim Nordenfelt Guns and Ammunition Co. v. Nordenfelt, C.A. 604—[1893] 1 Ch. 630; 62 L. J. Ch. 273; 68 L. T. 833.

2. Covenant—Validity—Reasonableness.—By an agreement dated August, 1880, and made between the plaintiff, who was described as an agent or commission merchant carrying on business under the style of M. & Co., of the one part, and the defendant F. of the other part, the defendant agreed to enter the plaintiff's service as clerk at a certain salary. Clause 4 of the agreement provided as follows: "In case the aforesaid employment of the said F. shall be determined by any cause whatever, he shall not during the period of five years thence next following carry on or engage in, either as principal, agent, clerk, or otherwise, any trade or business in the United Kingdom in connection with any kind of goods of Continental manufacture which the said firm of M. & Co. shall have dealt in at any time previously to such determination." In 1892 the defendant left the plaintiff's employment and embarked in a rival business, and the plaintiff applied for an injunction restraining him from carrying on any business in contravention of the above agreement. The defendant contended that the agreement was unreasonable and oppressive, and was void, as being in restraint of trade.

Held, that the words "any trade or business" in the covenant did not refer to any retail trade in which such Continental goods might happen to be sold, but to trade or business of a commission merchant; that, having regard to the plaintiff's business, the restriction that the defendant should not carry on such business in the United Kingdom was not unreasonably wide; that the words "at any time previously" meant during the time of the defendant's employment; and therefore that the restraint was not wider than was reasonably necessary for the plaintiff's protection, and the covenant was not void.

Decision of Stirling, J., affirmed.—Moenich v. Fenestre, C.A.—61 L. J. Ch. 737; 67 L. T. 602.

3. Covenant — Reasonableness — Injunction. — The defendant was by an agreement in writing employed by the plaintiff as a commercial traveller for ten years, and the defendant agreed that he would not within twelve years from the date of the agreement, or for two years after the termination of his employment, if the same should continue beyond ten years, engage in business similar to that carried on by the plaintiff or act as commercial traveller for any person or body carrying on a similar business, provided that such restriction should only extend to such counties in Ireland as the defendant should travel in for the plaintiff at any time during his employment.

Held, a reasonable agreement, and therefore valid.

Held, also, that the court in granting an injunction had a discretion to limit the extent of the injunction, and under the circumstances of the case granted it for two years only.—Cussen v. O'Connor, EX.D. (Ir.)—32 L. R. Ir. 330.

4. Covenant—Unreasonable covenant.—R., a brewer, engaged M. as a traveller for procuring orders for and selling malt liquors, and also, if required by R., aerated waters, to the class known as wholesale purchasing agents in a certain district. M. agreed that for two years after the determination of his employment he would not be concerned in selling malt liquors or aerated waters within a certain district. R. never dealt in aerated waters, nor required M. to obtain orders for them. M., after leaving R.'s employment, became a traveller to rival brewers within the prescribed district. R. brought an action, and applied for an injunction. M. insisted that the restriction was too wide, and therefore void. Stirling, J., construed the restriction as only prohibiting M. from selling wholesale, and held that the stipulation as to aerated waters was severable, and granted an injunction limited to selling malt liquors wholesale.

Held, on appeal, that the agreement must be construed as prohibiting M. from selling wholesale or retail within the limit, and that the restraint was not greater than was necessary for the reasonable protection of R., for that selling wholesale and retail were not two distinct businesses, but only different modes of carrying on the one business of selling malt liquors; that the selling of malt liquors either wholesale or retail within the district might affect R.'s business, and that R. was entitled to restrain M. from selling malt liquors in any way within the district.

Held, also, affirming the decision of Stirling, J., that the stipulation as to aerated waters was severable.—Rogers v. Maddocks, C.A.—[1892] 3 Ch. 346; 62 L. J. Ch. 219.

5. Covenant—Limitation as to time or space—Reasonableness—Validity—Public policy.—Where a covenant in restraint of trade is general—that is, without qualification—it is bad, as being unreasonable and contrary to public policy; where it is partial—that is, subject to some qualification either as to time or space—then the question is whether it is reasonable, and, if reasonable, it is good in law.

In considering the question of reasonableness the points to which the attention of the court is specially directed are the limits of time and of space, and the protection required for the trade of the covenantee, this latter point involving the examination of the nature and extent of the trade.—Badische Anilin und Soda Fabrik v. Schott, Segner, & Co., CH.D. CHI., J—[1892] 3 Ch. 447; 61 L. J. Ch. 698; 67 T. 281.

6. Covenant—Covenant not to keep a coffee-house—Sale of refreshments by grocer—Ancillary business.—The defendants were bound by a covenant in the lease of their house not to use the same as a coffee-house. The defendants were dealers in tea, coffee, and other groceries, but they proposed, as ancillary to their business, and for the convenience of their customers, to sell light refreshments consisting of cups of tea and coffee, bread and butter, pastry, ham sandwiches, and pork pies, to be consumed on the premises.

Held (affirming the decision of North, J.), that the sale of light refreshments was carrying on the business of a coffee-house keeper, and was a violation of the covenant, and an injunction was granted accordingly.

1. Exemption—Free library—Assessment of corporation in respect of free libraries—"Building the property of any literary or scientific institution"—5 & 6 Vict. c. 35, Schedule A, s. 61, r. 6.—Free libraries, established by corporations or commissioners under the Free Libraries Acts, 1855 and 1866 (18 & 19 Vict. c. 70 and 29 & 30 Vict. c. 114) are not within the class of institutions entitled to exemption from duty under schedule A., s. 61, r. 6, of the Income Tax Act, 1842.—Andrews v. Mayor, &c., of Bristol, Q.B.D.—61 L. J. Q. B. 715; 67 L. T. 618.

2. Profits or gains—Life assurance—Deductions for annuities paid—Income Tax Act, (5 & 6 Vict. c. 35), s. 100, Schedule D, Case 1, r. 4; s. 102.—One branch of a life assurance society's business consisted in the sale of annuities to the public. A lump sum was paid down in the case of an immediate annuity, and for a deferred or contingent annuity either a lump sum or a series of periodical payments. In making up the balance-sheet for three years for the purpose of ascertaining the profits and gains on which income tax was to be assessed under Schedule D of the Income Tax Acts, the society deducted from its gross income the sum paid in discharge of its annuity contracts. The assessment was for the year 1885-6.

Held, that the society was not liable to be assessed for the amount paid by it for these annuities.

PROBATE DUTY—

3. Residuary devisee—Specific legatee—Residuary legatee—Incidence of duties—Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 12), ss. 27, 41—Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1889 (52 & 53 Vict. c. 7), s. 5.—A testatrix, who died in 1891, by her will, made in 1870, after making certain pecuniary bequests and specific gifts of real and leasehold property, and disposing of the residue of her real property and certain specified sums of stock and investments, gave the residue of her personal property to A. B. absolutely.

Held, that the stamp duty payable under section 27 of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1881, and the estate duty payable under section 5 of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1889, were not payable in part out of the property specifically given, but must be borne entirely by the general residuary personal estate.

The principle of the decision in In re Croft, Deane v. Croft, 40 W. R. 425, [1892] 1 Ch. 652, not applicable as between specific and residuary legatees.—In re Bourne, Martin v. Martin, CH.D. STI., J. 70—[1893] 1 Ch. 188; 62 L. J. Ch. 69; 67 L. T. 586.

4. Valuation—Under-estimate of value—Close of administration—Subsequent discovery of true value—"Person acting in the administration of the estate"—Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 12), ss. 32, 37.—Upon the death of a testator, who died in 1883, a valuation for probate purposes of (inter alia) certain paintings, forming part of the estate, was made by a competent valuer, and the executors delivered an affidavit of account stamped on the basis of such valuation, and obtained probate. In 1886 the executors had fully administered and distributed the testator's estate, and since that date they had not any part of the testator's estate in their hands or under their control as executors. In 1888 it was for the first time discovered that the paintings had been considerably undervalued. No suggestion was, however, made of any mala fides or negligence on the part of either the executors or the valuer. Upon an information claiming to recover from the executors further duty upon the true value of the pictures, under section 32 of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1881,

Held, that the words "the person acting in the administration of such estate and effects" in section 32 meant the person who is acting in the administration of the estate when the mistake as to undervalue is discovered; that, in the present case, the executors, having fully administered the estate at the time when the mistake as to the undervalue of the paintings was discovered, were not persons acting in the administration of the estate within the meaning of section 32; and, accordingly, that the Crown had no remedy against them.

Held, that the effect of section 6, sub-section 4, of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1889, was to incorporate into sub-section 1 the definition of "succession" contained in section 1 of the Succession Duty Act, 1853, and that by virtue of section 12 of 36 Geo. 3, c. 52, and sections 10 and 32 of the Succession Duty Act, 1853, the fund constituted a "succession" of a value exceeding £10,000, upon which estate duty was payable.—Attorney-General v. Lord Aberdare, Q.B.D.—[1892] 2 Q. B. 684; 61 L. J. Q. B. 615; 67 L. T. 588.

6. "Succession"—Acceleration of succession—Succession Duty Act, 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 51), ss. 2, 15, 20, 38.—By a marriage settlement a sum of money was settled upon trustees upon trust to pay the income to the wife during her life, and after her death to pay the income to the husband, if he should survive her, during his life, with remainder, in default of issue, to the wife absolutely The husband died leaving the wife surviving him, and there was no issue.

Held, that, on the death of the husband, the widow became entitled in possession to a succession, and that succession duty was payable on the amount of the fund, less the value of her life interest therein.—Attorney-General v. Robertson, C.A. 241—[1893] 1 Q. The sewer communicated with a stream, which become polluted by the sewage from the defendants' premises. The plaintiffs applied to a county court for an order under section 10 of the Rivers Pollution Prevention Act, 1876, to restrain the defendants from polluting the stream. The county court judge made the order.

Held (affirming the decision of the Divisional Court), that the plaintiffs and the defendants had both committed offences against the Act, the defendants by causing the sewage to flow into the stream, and the plaintiffs by permitting them to do so; that the making of the order was discretionary, and that, under the circumstances, no order ought to be made at the instance of the plaintiffs.

Appeals from county courts under the Rivers Pollution Prevention Act, 1876, are properly made by way of motion.—Kirkheaton District Local Board v. Ainley, C.A. 99—[1892] 2 Q. B. 274; 61 L. J. Q. B. 812; 67 L. T. 209.

SALE of FOOD and DRUGS ACTS.—See ADULTERATION.

SALE of GOODS:—

1. Sale by sample—Place for delivery—Place for inspection—Contract—When property in goods sold passed.—The plaintiff, a farmer, sold by sample to the defendant, a corn dealer, a quantity of barley. In accordance with the terms of the contract the plaintiff, at his own expense, delivered the barley in sacks at T., a small roadside railway station. The plaintiff, at the time of the sale to the defendant, was aware that the defendant would resell the barley to brewers or maltsters, but had no knowledge when or to whom such resale would take place, nor to whom the defendant would consign the barley. The defendant, in fact, on the same day resold the barley to a firm of brewers carrying on business at S. The defendant, on hearing of the arrival of the barley at T. station, directed the stationmaster to take and forward him a sample, and this the stationmaster did. The defendant, after inspection of the sample, ordered the stationmaster to send on the barley to the defendant's sub-vendees, the brewers at S. The defendant subsequently rejected the barley as inferior to sample. There was evidence to show that the bulk of the barley could be inspected in the sacks in the trucks at T. station.

Held, on these facts, that there was nothing to displace the primâ facie presumption that T. station, the place of delivery by the plaintiff (vendor), was also the place for inspection, and that the property in the barley passed when the defendant took possession of the barley at T. station and ordered it to be sent on to his sub-vendees at S.; and, consequently, that the defendant was not entitled afterwards to reject the barley.—Perkins v. Bell, C.A. 195—[1893] 1 Q. B. 193; 62 L. J. Q. B. 91; 67 L. T. 792.

2. Stoppage in transitu—End of transit.—Certain goods were ordered from R. & Co. by G. and were delivered at the docks, marked, as required by G., J. H. A. & Co., Trinidad. With the goods were forwarded shipping instructions from G. directing the goods to be placed on board the s.s. MacGarel. A receipt signed by the dock superindent was given for them to R. & Co. as follows:—"Bought of R. & Co., J. H. A. & Co., 500 boxes. S s. MacGarel, on account G., Trinidad."

The goods were shipped for Trinidad, and while on their way, G. having become bankrupt, R. & Co. gave notice to stop them in transit. The goods were afterwards delivered under the orders of the Trinidad Court to J. H. A. & Co., who paid the trustee in bankruptcy of G. £75 for them. R. & Co. claimed this money.

Held, that the transit was determined when the receipt was given; that there was no stoppage of the goods in transit; and that therefore the trustee, and not R. & Co., was entitled to the £75.—In re Gurney, Ex parte Hughes, Q.B.D., BKCY.—67 L. T. 598.

SCOTCH LAW:—

1. Bankruptcy—Vesting of heritable estate in bankrupt's trustee—Latent trust in bankrupt—Doctrine tantum et tale—Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856 (19 & 20 Vict. c. 79), s. 102.—Heritage was held by a bankrupt on an unqualified ex facie absolute disposition registered in his own name; but it appeared that he held it only as a trustee for the right owners, to whom he had given an unrecorded acknowledgment of the trust.

Held, reversing the decision of the Court of Session (18 Ct. Sess. Cas., 4th series, 1166), that the heritage did not vest in, or pass to, the bankrupt's trustee for the benefit of general creditors of the bankrupt.—Heritable Reversionary Co. v. Millar, H.L. (Sc.)—[1892] A. C. 598.

2. Church—Contract—Minister's stipend—Obligation to provide a legal and competent stipend not under a certain sum—Extent of obligation—Surplus from seat rents—Trust.—By decree of the Teind Court, dated the 15th of July, 1741, obtained at the instance of the baron, baillie, and certain of the feuars of the burgh of Greenock, for themselves and in the name of its whole inhabitants, the burgh was disjoined and erected into a new parish. The sum of £1,000 had already been subscribed and invested in heritable security for the purpose of building a kirk for the new parish and endowing the minister with a competent stipend of not less than 950 merks; and the pursuers had likewise undertaken to contribute certain yearly sums for a period of fifteen years in order to complete a fund for the stipend.

These facts were fully set out in the summons, but were not referred to either in the conclusions of the summons or in the decree, which simply ordained the baillie, feuars, and inhabitants of the burgh to provide the minister of the new church with a competent legal stipend not under 950 merks.

Held, affirming the decision of the Court of Session (19 Ct. Sess. Cas., 4th series (Rettie), 643), that the decree of the Court of Teinds imposed a direct liability upon the burgh of Greenock to pay the minister a competent and legal stipend according to the varying circumstances from time to time, and that a minimum payment of 950 merks would not fulfil the obligation; nor was the obligation impaired by any loss of the funds or deficiency in the expected contributions.—Provost, &c., of Greenock v. Peters, H.L. (Sc.)—[1893] A. C. 258.

3. Conveyance—Sale of superiority—General words of description in dispositive clause—Construction—Subsidiary clauses—Right to coals.—By the law of Scotland the dispositive clause of a deed in implement of a sale of land rights is the governing clause, and if its terms are express and unambiguous they cannot be contradicted or cut down by inference drawn from other parts of the deed; but if the dispositive clause contain general words of description susceptible of more than one meaning, other clauses of the deed may be referred to as showing the sense in which these general words are used.

The appellant raised this action for declarator that he was entitled to the exclusive right of the coals within the respondents' lands of H., L., and B. These coals had never been worked. In 1796 the Duke of Argyll, then owner of the barony of which these lands formed a part, disposed of the dominium utile of H., L., and B. to the predecessor in title of the respondents, reserving the coals. The superiority of these lands, and the reserved coals, were acquired in 1808 from the Argyll family by C. T. By deed in 1837 C. T.'s trustee in bankruptcy, on the narrative that he had offered for sale the "superiorities and feu duties" of these lands, conveyed by the dispositive clause to the respondents' predecessor in title, the owner of the dominium utile, "all and whole the town and lands of H., with mosses, muirs, and all and singular pertinents used and wont pertaining and belonging thereto, all as at present possessed by the said" respondents' predecessor. L. and B. were conveyed in similar words. In 1860 the barony, with the coals, was purchased by the appellant's predecessor in title from C. T.'s trustee.

Held, reversing the decision of the majority of the whole Court of Session (19 Ct. Sess. Cas., 4th series (Rettie), 700), that the estate of coal was not conveyed by the deed of 1837, the narrative clause showing that the words "all and whole the lands" were meant to apply to the vassal's estate, and not to land and minerals belonging in fee to the superior.

4. Negligence — Injury to workmen resulting in death after action brought — Competency of second action by mother for solatium for same injury.—A workman having been injured through the fault, as he alleged, of his employers, brought an action against them for damages. While the action was pending he died, intestate and unmarried. His mother was appointed his executrix, and she raised a second and concurrent action for solatium for her son's death, and asked that the second action should be remitted to the same jury who were to try the first action.

Held, affirming the decision of the court (18 Court Sess. Cas., 4th series (Rettie), 1164), that the second action was incompetent.—Wood v. Gray & Sons, H.L. (Sc.)—[1892] A. C. 576; 61 L. T. 628.

5. Railway — Statutory agreement to stop all ordinary trains at temporary station — Subsequent agreement to make station permanent—Right to have trains stopped.—The House, reversing the decision of the Court of Session (20 Court Sess. Cas., 4th series (Rettie), 409), held that all ordinary trains must stop at the station in question.—Gilmour v. North British Railway Co., H.L. (Sc.)—[1893] A. C. 281.

6. River—Pollution—Prescriptive right, extension of—Concurrent findings of fact.—A riparian proprietor who has a prescriptive right to take, in a particular way and at a particular place, water from a river, and to return such water to the river in a polluted condition, is not entitled to take the water in any other way or place, nor use even his common law right of taking it in such a way as to add to the pollution of the stream. — McIntyre Brothers v. McGavin, H.L. (Sc.)—[1893] A. C. 268.

7. Succession—Marriage contract—Vesting—Conditio si sine liberis decesserit—Discharge of trustees.—The rule is, "si sine liberis decesserit" applies to ante-nuptial marriage contracts.

By ante-nuptial contract of marriage the wife conveyed the sum of £4,000 to trustees, first, to pay the wife during the life of the spouses the interest for her alimentary use exclusive of the jus mariti; secondly, in the event of the predecease of the wife leaving a child or children of the marriage, the trustees were to pay the income to the husband during his life for "his alimentary use only," his right to assign and claims of creditors being excluded; and on his death to pay the capital of the fund over to the said "child or children" after their attaining majority, &c. And if there were no children alive at the dissolution of the marriage by the wife's predecease, or, though there should then exist a child or children, in the case of the death of all of them before the term of payment of their provisions, then the interest was still, as provided, to be paid to the surviving husband, but the capital was to be at the wife's disposal by will, to be conveyed to the disponees on the husband's death, and, failing any will, then to the wife's nearest heirs and executors, but with power to the trustees to pay over the capital at any time after the death of the predeceasing wife and "failure of issue" on obtaining, inter alia, the consent of the surviving husband. Thirdly, in the event of the predecease of the husband, and a child or children being then in existence, the trustees were to pay the interest to the wife for her alimentary use only, and, after her death, the capital to the children on majority; but declaring always if such child or children should all die before the wife or should "die before majority and without leaving issue," the trustees were still to pay the interest for the wife's alimentary use only, and in the event of the wife surviving the husband and "failure of issue" she was to have the same power as above of disposing by will of the capital. It was further provided that the provision of the children should not become vested interests until after the death of the survivor of the spouses and until the children attained majority.

The wife died, leaving by will all she possessed to her husband, by whom she was survived, and by one child, a son, stated to have been born subsequently to the wife's will. The son had no children. The husband and son claimed from the trustees immediate payment of the capital, on the ground that it must inevitably belong to one or the other.

Held, reversing the decision of the Court of Session (18 Court Sess. Cas., 4th series, 319), that the husband and son were not entitled to immediate payment, the trustees being bound to keep alive the trust for the protection of the alimentary provision to the husband, and the right of possible children born to the son.—Hughes v. Edwards, H.L. (Sc.)—[1892] A. C. 583.

8. Superior and vassal—Whether composition or relief payable by the vassal on entry—Entry by trustees—Effect of confirmation of prior infeftments by superior.—An ancestor of the appellant acquired three several parcels of land, D., W., and T., by purchase, in all of which his authors were infeft and entered with the superior. He took base infeftment in one of these parcels, W.; but with the exception of the appellant none of the series of heirs upon whom his succession devolved expede a feudal title, or were entered with the superior. In 1810, one of these heirs, the grandfather of the appellant, conveyed these three parcels to trustees for the purpose of paying the truster and his wife an annuity; the truster's debts; and in the event of the truster's death before the debts were paid to carry out any deed of settlement he might leave. Power was given to the trustees to sell with the truster's consent. When the debts were paid, or if demanded in 1814, the trustees were to reconvey.

The truster died in 1811. In 1815 the trustees were entered in the lands of D. and W. with the superior whose charter confirmed previous infeftments. In 1828 the trustees were entered in the other lands of T. On each entry they paid a composition of a year's rent.

Held, affirming the decision of the Court of Session (18 Ct. Sess. Cas., 4th series, 587), that the appellant was liable to the superior in a composition; because (a) assuming the trust to be simply an incumbrance, he would not have been in a position to enter as heir; (b) that the appellant's implied entry in 1874 was not enfranchised by the entry of his grandfather's trustees; and (c) that the confirmation in 1815 had not the effect of making the appellant's ancestor an entered vassal, the confirmation having no operation other than to safeguard the investiture of the trustees.

Stuart v. Jackson, 17 Ct. Sess. Cas., 4th series, 85; Duke of Athole v. Stewart, 17 Ct. Sess. Cas., 4th series, 724; and Duke of Athole v. Menzies, 17 Ct. Sess. Cas., 4th series, 733, assuming them to be correct, must be taken to be not applicable.—Johnstone v. Duke of Buccleuch, H.L. (Sc.)—[1892] A. C. 625.

SEDUCTION:—

Master and servant—Parent and child—Evidence of service.—In an action by a parent for the seduction of her daughter, it appeared that the daughter had been married, and lived with her husband for eight years, up to his death, which took place two years before the commencement of the action. She was then in the employment of a third party, which occupied her time each weekday from 9.30 a.m. to 8 p.m. She resided in lodgings rented by herself, but was in the habit during the time which remained at her disposal of coming to her mother's house and helping her by the discharge of household duties which were of such a nature as would be usually performed by a servant.

Held (by Palles, C.B., and Andrews, J.; Murphy, J., dissenting), that there was evidence to go to the jury in support of the plaintiff's case, and that the verdict for the plaintiff must stand.—O'Reilly v. Glavey, EX.D. (Ir.)—32 L. R. Ir. 316.

SETTLED ESTATES ACT.—See LANDLORD and TENANT, 13.

SETTLED LAND ACTS:—

1. Equitable tenant for life—Right to possession of estate—Custody of title deeds—Settled Land Acts, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 38), and 1884 (47 & 48 Vict. c. 18).—The powers granted to, and the duties imposed on, a tenant for life by the Settled Land Acts raise a presumption, in favour of his title to possession, not before existing, and render it incumbent on the court to provide that, if the estate and trustees can be adequately protected by reasonable safeguards, an equitable tenant for life should be let into possession.

An equitable tenant for life is entitled to the custody of the title deeds.—In re Wythes, West v. Wythes, CH.D. KEK., J. 375—[1893] 2 Ch. 369; 62 L. J. Ch. 663; 68 L. T. 520.

2. Heirlooms—Sanction of court to sale—Proviso in restraint of sale of land—Settled Land Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 38), ss. 37, 51.—A testator by his will settled real estate and bequeathed chattels as heirlooms. He directed his trustees to hold a sum of £4,000 on trust to keep up part of the estate, and to pay the surplus income to the person for the time being entitled to possession, with a proviso that, if such person alienated the property, the £4,000 was to fall into the residue. The tenant for life, under the provisions of the Settled Land Act, sold the estate. He also sold some of the heirlooms. On summons to obtain the sanction of the court to the sale of the heirlooms, and declare the rights of the parties in the £4,000,

Held, that the court could not, ex post facto, sanction the sale of the heirlooms already sold, under section 37 of the Settled Land Act, 1882; and that the provision in the will directing the £4,000 to fall into the residue on alienation was void under section 51.—In re Ames, Ames v. Ames, CH.D. NOR., J. 505—[1893] 2 Ch. 479; 62 L. J. Ch. 685; 68 L. T. 787.

3. Improvements — Rent-charges — Redemption — Capital moneys—Right of tenant for life to repayment —Improvement of Land Act, 1864 (27 & 28 Vict. c. 114), s. 49—Settled Land Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 38), s. 21, sub-sections 2, 3—Settled Land Act, 1887 (50 & 51 Vict. c. 30), s. 1—Settled Land Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 69), s. 15.—A tenant for life had paid certain instalments of rent-charges which had, between 1885 and 1890, been created under the Improvement of Land Act, 1864, to secure money borrowed by him for improvements on the settled estates. On an application to the court to authorize, under section 15 of the Settled Land Act, 1890, the repayment to him by the trustees, out of capital moneys in their hands, of the instalments paid by him before March, 1892, when he first called upon the trustees to provide for the instalments, Held, that the case did not come within section 15 of the Act of 1890, but within section 1 of the Act of 1887, and that the application must be refused.—In re Dalison's Settled Estate, CH.D. STI., J. 15—[1892] 3 Ch. 522; 61 L. J. Ch. 712.

4. "Improvements" — Application of "capital money"—Mansion-house—Alterations with a view to let—"Rebuilding"—"Annual rental of the settled land"—Settled Land Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 69), ss. 13 (iv.) (ii.), 15—Settled Land Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 38), ss. 22 (5) (6), 25.—By the Settled Land Act, 1890, s. 13, "improvements authorized by the Act of 1882" include "making any additions to, or alterations in, buildings reasonably necessary or proper to enable the same to be let," and "the rebuilding of the principal mansion-house on the settled land, provided that the sum to be applied thereunder "shall not exceed one-half of the annual rental of the settled land."

In calculating the amount of such annual rental, the income of capital money arising under the Settled Land Act, 1882, must be included.

The expression "rebuilding of the principal mansion-house" will be construed strictly, and improvements, to amount to a rebuilding within the above enactment, must be something more than structural alterations, however extensive.

There must be a present intention of, if not an actual contract for, letting, for additions or alterations to constitute improvements authorized by the Act of 1882 under the above enactment.—In re De Teissier's Settled Estates, CH.D. CHI., J. 184—[1893] 1 Ch. 153; 62 L. J. Ch. 552; 68 L. T. 275.

5. Improvements—Tenants for life—Scheme approved by trustees—Payment—Capital money arising under the Act—No capital money in hands of trustees—Prospective authorization of payment out of money to arise in the future—Settled Land Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 38), ss. 21, 26.—Under section 26 of the Settled Land Act, 1882, the court has no power to prospectively authorize payment for improvements out of capital money to arise in the future, when the trustees have no capital money in their hands at the time.

Decision of Kekewich, J., affirmed.—In re Millard's Settled Estates, C.A. 577—62 L. J. Ch. 761.

6. Improvements—Tenant for life—Obligation to make payments to sinking fund—Validity—Settled Land Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 38), ss. 25, 26, 33, 51, 56.—Under a settlement made in 1877 trustees were enabled, at the request of the tenant for life, to raise certain sums of money for improvements which were, to a large extent, those authorized by the Settled Land Act, 1882, and to hand them over to him to be applied by him for such improvement purposes, without any liability on the part of the trustees to see to their application. The tenant for life was, according to the terms of the settlement, under an obligation to replace out of income the moneys so handed over to him by annual instalments of 1-25th of each sum handed over to him. He received moneys from the trustees, applied them for improvements, and paid several contributions to the sinking fund.

Held, that the obligation to recoup did not in any way affect the right of the tenant for life to exercise any of the powers of the Settled Land Act, 1882, and, consequently, did not contravene section 51 of that Act.—In re Sudbury and Poynton Estates, Vernon v. Vernon, CH.D. STI., J. 585—[1893] 3 Ch. 74; 62 L. J. Ch. 539; 68 L. T. 707.

7. Incumbrances—Power to mortgage settled land to pay off incumbrances—Interest of parties entitled under the settlement—Settled Land Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 38), s. 53—Settled Land Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 69), s. 11.—Under the Settled Land Act, 1882, ss. 2 (1) (3) (4), 20, 21, and the Settled Land Act, 1890, ss. 2, 3, 11, the tenant for life of a settled estate has power to mortgage the whole of the settled estate to pay off an incumbrance upon part of it.

Held, further, that, upon the facts of the case, the tenant for life could not properly exercise the power, having regard to section 53 of the Settled Land Act, 1882, at least until it had been ascertained that no sale at a proper price could be effected; and that the court ought to restrain him from exercising the power, upon the ground that its exercise would be a breach of trust, although he was acting bonâ fide.

Decision of Kekewich, J., reversed.—Hampden v. Earl of Buckinghamshire, C.A. 516—[1893] 2 Ch. 531; 62 L. J. Ch. 643; 68 L. T. 695.

8. Mansion-house—Sale by tenant for life—Sanction of the court—Settled Land Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 38), ss. 3, 15, 50, 53—Settled Land Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 69), s. 10 (2).—It is the duty of the court, on an application under the Settled Land Acts, 1882-1890, for permission to sell the mansion-house and lands usually occupied therewith, to consider the interests of the estate itself, in addition to the wishes and interests of the remaindermen.

A young tenant for life under a settlement of an old family estate, who had heavily mortgaged his life interest, and was unable to keep up the establishment, applied for an order sanctioning a proposed sale of the mansion-house and demesne lands for an adequate price. The remaindermen opposed.

Held (affirming the decision of the Court of Appeal, 40 W. R. 243, [1892] 1 Ch. 506), that the sale should be allowed.—Bruce v. Marquis of Ailesbury, H.L. (E.) 318—[1892] A. C. 356; 62 L. J. Ch. 95; 67 L. T. 490.

9. Tenant for life—Suspension or cesser of life estate—Person having powers of tenant for life—Trust for accumulation of income for payment of debts—Settled Land Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 38), s. 2, sub-sections 2, 5, 7; s. 58, sub-section 1 (vi.)—A testator devised real estate to trustees upon trust to permit his daughter to receive the rents, issues, and profits thereof during her life for her separate use, and directed that, if a claim for £1,000, settled on the marriage of his daughter, should be enforced for payment, "then all her interest and benefit from the estate" should "cease until all the debts and claims on the same" should be paid. After the testator's death the trustees of the daughter's settlement demanded payment of the £1,000. The personal estate of the testator was insufficient for the payment of the debts due from, and claims against, his estate. The testator's daughter, who was his heiress-at-law, claimed to have the powers of a tenant for life under the Settled Land Act, 1882.

Held, that the daughter's life estate was suspended only; that the trustees might properly have received the income and paid it over from time to time in reduction of the debts; and that there was, in substance, an estate for life subject to a trust for accumulation of income for payment of debts; and Held, therefore, that the testator's daughter was a person having the powers of a tenant for life within the meaning of the Act.—Williams v. Jenkins, CH.D. KEK., J. 489—[1893] 1 Ch. 700; 62 L. J. Ch. 665; 68 L. T. 251.

10. Tenant for life—Sale free from incumbrances—Settlement—Jointures created under prior settlements—Restraint on anticipation—Settled Estates Act, 1877 (40 & 41 Vict. c. 18), s. 2—Conveyancing Act, 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 41), s. 5—Settled Land Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 38), ss. 2, 3, 10, 20-22, 31 (sub-section 3), 44.—The S. Estate was by deed in 1826 settled to such uses as C., Marquis of A., and G., afterwards Marquis of A., should jointly appoint, with remainder in default of appointment to the use of C., Marquis of A., for life, with powers of jointuring a future wife, with remainders over. In 1833 and 1836 jointure rent-charges were, in exercise of these powers, created in favour of M., Marchioness of A. The estate was, in exercise of the joint power of appointment, by deed in 1837 settled, subject to the jointure rent-charges, to the use of C., Marquis of A., for life, with remainder to G. for life, with remainder to his first and other sons in tail male, with remainder to the use of E., afterwards Marquis of A., for his life, with remainder to his first and other sons in tail male. G. B. was the eldest son of E., and by a deed in 1863 the estate was limited to the use of E. for life, with remainder to the use of G. B. for life, with remainder to the uses for securing a jointure rent-charge to Lady E. C. for life, with remainder to the first son of G. B. in tail male. G. B. died in 1868, leaving the present marquis his only son. In 1884 the present marquis converted his estate tail into a base fee, which was in June, 1885, enlarged into a fee simple. In July, 1885, the estate was by deed limited to the use of E. for life, in restoration of his former life estate, with remainder to the use of the present marquis for life. E. died in 1886, and the present marquis had contracted, as tenant for life, to sell the estate.

Held, that the present marquis was tenant for life of the settlement created by the series of deeds executed between 1826 and 1885; and that he had power, under section 20 of the Settled Land Act, 1882, to convey the estate discharged from the jointure rent-charges,—In re Marquis of Ailesbury and Lord Iveagh, Riddell v. Riddell, CH.D. STI., J. 644—[1893] 2 Ch. 345; 62 L. J. Ch. 713; 69 L. T. 101.

SETTLEMENT:—

1. Annuities charged on lands — Indemnity — Principal and surety—Arrears—Interest.—In 1868, on the marriage of A., certain estates to which he was absolutely entitled were settled upon A. for life, with remainder to his first and other sons in tail male, and were charged with the payment of an annual sum of £3,000 for the intended wife during the joint lives of herself and her husband, and a like sum as jointure in case she should survive her husband, and also with portions for younger children. These settled lands were charged with certain annuities created prior to 1868, set out in the schedule to the deed. The settlement contained a proviso that the settled lands should be indemnified against the annuities and against all charges and incumbrances prior to the date of the deed by certain unsettled estates to which A. was entitled in fee, which were thereby "charged and made chargeable with the said incumbrances, and every of them, in exoneration of the lands and hereditaments hereby granted and conveyed." In 1875 A. mortgaged his life estate in the settled lands and his absolute interest in the unsettled estates to the plaintiffs as security for money advanced to him. A. died in 1876, leaving his wife surviving. After his death and up to 1887 the annuities were paid out of the settled estate, and all the rents and profits of the unsettled estates were applied in keeping down the interest on the plaintiffs' mortgage. The lands mortgaged to the plaintiffs proved a deficient security, and in 1888 they brought an action for the administration of the real and personal estate of A. The plaintiffs had notice of all the transactions in reference to the settlement. The surviving trustee of the term created by the settlement to secure the wife's jointure and portions for children filed a claim to rank as a creditor on the unsettled estates of A. in the priority of the settlement of 1868 for all principal sums paid on foot of the annuities since A.'s death, together with arrears of interest thereon.

Held, that those persons interested in the settled estate under the settlement had the right, when the annuitants had obtained payment out of the settled estate, to have these payments severally made good as charges upon the unsettled estate, and to have the settled estate exonerated.

Held, that they were entitled to principal for the full period claimed, and also for interest; but as to the latter, subject to the six years' limitation.

A surety, who has paid a gale of an annuity by virtue of suretyship, becomes a creditor in respect of what he has paid, just as if, instead of an annuity, it were a sum in gross he had paid, and he is not limited to the recovery of six years' arrears of the annuity.—Scottish Provident Institution v. Conolly, M.R. (Ir.)—31 L. R. Ir. 329.

2. Construction—Power to appoint to children—Limitation in default of appointment to heirs of settlor—Implied trust for children.—By a marriage settlement real estate of the wife was settled on the husband and wife for their respective lives, with remainder to such children as the husband or wife might appoint, and in default of appointment, "or there being no issue of the said intended marriage," then to the right heirs of the wife. There was issue of the marriage, one son and four other children. The husband and wife died without having made any appointment.

Held, that there was no implied trust for the children in default of appointment, and that the eldest son took the property as heir of the wife.

Goldring v. Inwood, 8 Jur. N. S. 206, followed.—In re Regan's Estate, L.J. (Ir.)—31 L. R. Ir. 246.

3. Powers—Jointure and portions—Exercise of power—Devise of real estate and bequest of personal estate for purchase of land subject to same powers—Liability of devised estate to charges.—Real estate was settled with powers to the tenant for life to charge jointure and portions. On his marriage he in part exercised these powers and charged the settled estate, but not to the full extent authorised. At a subsequent period a testator devised real estate and bequeathed his residuary personal estate to be laid out in the purchase of land, to such of the uses and subject to such of the powers declared of the settled estate as should be subsisting at his death, but not so as to increase or multiply any charges or powers of charging. The tenant for life and the tenant in tail of the settled estate executed after the testator's death a disentailing assurance of all the properties subject to the settlement.

Held, that the devised estate and the residuary personal estate were not subject to the charges existing at the date of the testator's death; that a release of his still existing powers of charging ought to be executed by the tenant for life; and that the trustees of testator's will were thereupon bound to pay the residuary personalty to the tenant for life and the tenant in tail on their joint receipt.—In re Berners, Berners v. Calvert, CH.D. NOR., J. 188—67 L. T. 849.

4. Powers—Leasing power—Power to lease for thirty-five years at the best rent—Validity of lease—Estoppel.

Held, by the Court of Appeal, that a certain lease for thirty-one years, purporting to be made under a power in a settlement, at an annual rent of £100 (the jury having found that it was the "best rent") was binding.—Harold v. Daly, C.A. (Ir.)—30 L. R. Ir. 697.

5. Repairs—Expenditure of trust money—Tenant for life in possession—Infants—Jurisdiction.—T. by his will made a legal devise of real estate, including a mansion-house, to several tenants for life in succession, the last of whom was an infant, without impeachment for waste, with remainders over.

T. lived in the house till his death, when it was found to be in a very dilapidated condition. Divers repairs and improvements were considered necessary to make the house habitable, including the repair of damage caused by dry rot. On an application by the trustees of the will,

Held, that there was no jurisdiction to allow the necessary expenditure out of a fund representing capital moneys under the Settled Land Act; for assuming that disposition of such moneys otherwise than as the Settled Land Acts provided was not excluded by the Acts, there was no settled doctrine of the court under which the expenditure could be sanctioned. The circumstances did not amount to a case of salvage or preservation of the inheritance, and the court had no inherent jurisdiction to charge or sell an infant's estate upon the notion that such a proceeding would be beneficial to the infant.

Hibbert v. Cooke, 1 Sim. & St. 552, followed as to the repair of the damage from dry rot.

BILL OF LADING—

1.—Chartered ship—Liability of owner of chartered ship on bills of lading signed by master—Principal and agent—Master and servant.—The owner of a ship registered as such and as the managing owner under the Merchant Shipping Act, 1876, who has parted with the possession and control of the ship, under a charter-party to the charterer, is not liable for the loss of goods shipped under bills of lading signed by the captain, who is the servant of the charterer, and not of the owner, and who has no authority from the owner to pledge his credit, although the shipper of the goods has no notice of those facts.

The owner of a ship, registered as such, and also registered as the managing owner, under the Merchant Shipping Act, 1876, let her by charter-party for a term of four months. The charter-party provided that the captain, officers, and crew should be paid by the charterer; that the captain should be under the orders of the charterer as regards employment, agency, or other arrangements; that the charterer should indemnify the owner from all liabilities arising from the captain signing bills of lading; and that the owner should maintain the ship in a thoroughly efficient state in hull and machinery for the service, and should pay for the insurance on the ship.

The charterer took possession of the ship and appointed the captain, officers, and crew, except the chief engineer, who was appointed by the owner, in exercise of the option given him by the charter-party. The charterer sent the ship to New Orleans, where goods were shipped under bills of lading, some of which were signed by the captain and some by the agents of the charterer. Neither the captain nor the charterer's agents had any authority in fact from the owner to pledge his credit. The bills of lading contained no reference to the charter-party, and the shippers had no notice of its terms. The goods having been lost at sea during the currency of the charter, owing (as was alleged) to the unseaworthiness of the ship, the shippers sued the owners for the loss.

Held, affirming the decision of the Court of Appeal, [1892] 1 Q. B. 253, that the captain not being the servant or agent of the owner, and having no authority to pledge his credit, was not liable.—Baumwoll Manufactur Von Carl Scheibler v. Furness, H.L. (E.)—[1893] A. C. 8; 62 L. J. Q. B. 201; 68 L. T. 1.

2. Delay in unloading — Demurrage — Reasonable time—Strike.—Where the terms of a bill of lading contain no stipulation as to the time within which the consignee is to discharge the ship's cargo, the obligation on him is to discharge within a reasonable time under the circumstances existing at the time of unloading.

Should the existing circumstances be extraordinary, owing to a strike preventing the obtaining of necessary labour, the consignee (provided the delay was not due to any act or default on his part) under such a bill of lading is not liable to the shipowner for damages for detention of the ship.

Decision of the Court of Appeal (reported sub nom. Hick v. Rodocanachi, 40 W. R. 161, [1891] 2 Q. B. 626) affirmed.—Hick v. Raymond & Reid, H.L. (E.) 384—[1893] A. C. 22; 62 L. J. Q. B. 98; 68 L. T. 175.

3. Excepted perils—"Act, neglect, or default of the pilot, master, or mariners in the navigation or management of the ship"—Negligent stowage of stevedore—Liability of shipowner.—The plaintiff shipped a quantity of oranges on the defendants' vessel under a bill of lading which excepted "damage from any act, neglect, or default of the pilot, master, or mariners in the navigation or management of the ship." The oranges were damaged by the negligent stowage of the stevedore employed by the ship.

Held, that the exception did not apply, as the stevedore did not come within the list of persons enumerated therein, and the "management of the ship" did not include improper stowage.—The Ferro, P.D. & A.D.—[1893] P. 38; 62 L. J. P. D. & A. 48; 68 L. T. 418.

4. Excepted perils—Exemption of liability for default of master and crew in the navigation of the ship—Pipe left uncased—Damage to cargo—Seaworthiness.—A cargo of jute was shipped under a bill of lading which contained an exception from liability for any act, neglect, or default whatsoever of the master and crew in the navigation of the ship in the ordinary course of the voyage. The ship during her voyage encountered stormy weather, and the pipe of the port water-closet was broken by the pressure of the cargo, whereby water entered the vessel and the jute was damaged.

In an action at the instance of the indorsees of the bill of lading, it was found (1) that the pipe was uncased at the sailing of the vessel; and (2) that the default came within the exemption. It was also found (1) that it was the usual practice to case such a pipe before loading a cargo of jute; (2) that when the cargo was loaded the pipe was not visible; and (3) that to case the pipe it would have been necessary to remove part of the cargo, but the evidence did not show how much.

Held, reversing the decision of the Court of Sessions (18 Ct. Sess. Cas., 4th series (Rettie), 569), that the findings of fact amounted to a verdict that the ship was not seaworthy on sailing, and, therefore, following Steel v. State Line Steamship Co., 3 App. Cas. 72, the exception in the bill of lading did not relieve the shipowners from liability.—Gilroy, Sons, & Co. v. Price & Co., H.L. (Sc.)—[1893] A. C. 56; 68 L. T. 461.

CHARTER-PARTY—

5. Custom—Cargo to be "taken from alongside ship at merchant's risk and expense"—To be discharged "according to custom"—Parol evidence.—A charter-party provided that the plaintiff's steamer should load a cargo for the defendants, "the cargo to be taken from alongside the ship at merchant's risk and expense," and should proceed to a certain port or so near thereto as she might safely get, and deliver the same always afloat; "the cargo to be supplied as fast as steamer can load and stow same, and discharged as fast as steamer can deliver and according to the custom of the respective ports." On arrival at the port of discharge the vessel was moored fifteen feet from the quay, which was as near as she could lie afloat, and in consequence the cost of discharge was increased.

Held, that evidence of a custom that the shipowner must deliver on the quay was not admissible, as the two clauses were not inconsistent, the clause as to the cargo being "taken from alongside at merchant's risk and expense" dealing with the cost of the discharge, and the clause as to the discharge being "according to the custom of the port" dealing with the time and mode of discharge.—The Nifa, P.D. & A.D.—[1892] P. 411; 62 L. J. P. D. & A. 12.

6. Demurrage—Delay in loading—Stevedore servant of owners—Duty of owners as to loading—Stowage—Liability of charterers.—By a charter-party it was agreed that the ship should proceed to Leith and to London and there load cargo to be shipped by the charterers; and that a stevedore should be "appointed by the charterers in London only, but employed and paid for by owners."

Cargo was loaded at Leith by the charterers, no information as to the London cargo being then asked for by the captain. On the voyage to London, owing to bad weather, some of the cargo was damaged and some had shifted. After the arrival of the vessel at London it was necessary to land the damaged cargo to be reconditioned and to restow the cargo which had shifted. It also became necessary to shift some of the cargo to enable the London cargo to be properly stowed. Owing to these matters, and to some delay on the part of the stevedore who had been appointed under the terms of the charter-party, three days more than those allowed by the charter-party were occupied in loading at London.

Held, that the stevedore was the servant of the owners, and that the charterers were not liable for demurrage arising either from his delay or from the necessity of moving the cargo; and that the charterers were not liable for any of the expenses of moving the cargo because they were either expenses of stowage or of work done for the benefit of the cargo without the authority of the charterers.—Harris v. Best, Ryley, & Co., C.A.—68 L. T. 76.

7. Demurrage—"Steamer to be discharged as fast as she can deliver"—Custom for dock company to discharge cargo.—By a charter-party it was agreed that the plaintiffs' steamer should proceed to a dock as ordered and there deliver her cargo, "Steamer to be discharged as fast as she can deliver."

The vessel was ordered to a certain dock, but as the berths were all occupied, the vessel was moored, under the direction of the dock officials, alongside another steamer, and there remained for three days until she could be hauled into a quay berth. It was customary at that dock for the whole of the discharge to be done by the dock company's servants at the quay; but owing to the quay being crowded with other cargo, the discharge was not commenced until two days afterwards, and (the intermediate days being Sunday and Bank Holiday) was not resumed until the following Tuesday. It was completed by 3 p.m. on the Wednesday, being the tenth day from the arrival of the vessel in the dock. The discharge, under ordinary circumstances, would occupy two days.

In an action for demurrage,

Held, that the defendants were not liable, as the whole operation of the discharge was, by the custom of the dock, carried out by the dock company's servants at the quay, and the plaintiffs had failed to make out any breach of the contract to discharge as fast as the ship could deliver.—The Jaederen, P.D. & A.D.—[1892] P. 351; 61 L. J. P. D. & A. 89; 68 L. T. 266.

8. Demurrage—Strike clause—Strike of labourers preventing discharge of lighters available for lighterage of cargo.—The plaintiffs' ship was chartered to carry a cargo of timber to Sharpness and there deliver the same under a charter-party by which it was provided that the cargo should be discharged with the customary steamer discharge of the port, any time lost by reason of strikes, lock-outs, or combinations of workmen, whether partial or general, not to count as part of the aforesaid discharging time, and that if, through any default of the merchants or charterers, who were to observe the usual custom of the wood trade, the vessel be longer detained, demurrage to be paid at the rate of fivepence per gross register ton per like day, and pro rata per hour for any part of the last of such days. The vessel arrived at Sharpness, which is within the port of Gloucester, at a time when there was a strike in the port of Gloucester amongst the labourers in the shipping trade, and owing to the continuance of such strike all the timber lighters which would otherwise have been available to take on board the cargo and take it up the canal to Gloucester were detained at Gloucester with the loads of timber they had last taken up the canal still laden on board them, so that nothing could have been done to discharge the plaintiffs' ship until the strike had come to an end. After the strike had come to an end the discharge of the plaintiffs' ship duly commenced, and was completed with all reasonable despatch, except on one day, when the discharge was delayed by matters bearing no reference to the strike. The plaintiffs, as the owners of the ship, instituted an action in a county court having admiralty juristiction against the charterers to recover for over five days' demurrage for the alleged detention of the ship at Sharpness; but the county court judge, being of opinion that the strike clause in the charter-party operated to free the defendants from liability for demurrage during the continuance of the strike above mentioned, gave the plaintiffs judgment for demurrage only in respect of the day the delay on which had had no relation to the strike. The defendants appealed.

Held, on appeal, that, as four days and twenty-two hours out of the entire number of days and hours in respect of which the plaintiffs had claimed demurrage had been lost by the strike, the judgment of the court below was right, and must be affirmed.—The Alne Holme, P.D. & A.D. 572—[1893] P. 173; 62 L. J. P. D. & A. 51; 68 L. T. 862.

9. Excepted perils—Obligation to complete voyage where damage to ship reparable.—The exceptions of perils of the sea contained in a charter-party will not relieve the shipowner from his obligation to complete the voyage by carrying the cargo to the port of destination in the chartered ship if the damage caused by such perils is capable of repair within a reasonable time and at a cost not exceeding the value of the ship when repaired.—Assicurazioni Generali v. SS. Bessie Morris Co., C.A. 83—[1892] 2 Q. B. 652; 61 L. J. Q. B. 754; 67 L. T. 218.

COLLISION—

10. Barge without man in charge—Barge sunk while moored in dock — Negligence.—The man in charge of a barge left her moored in a dock, which was well lighted, for a few hours in the evening. A steam tug, used in shifting craft in the dock, ran into her and sank her.

Held, that the absence of a man in charge in no way contributed to the collision, and the steam tug was alone to blame.—The Hornet, P.D. & A.D.—[1892] P. 361; 68 L. T. 516.

11. Fog—Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, art. 18.—By article 18 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, "Every steamship, when approaching another ship so as to involve risk of collision, shall slacken her speed, or stop and reverse if necessary."

During a fog the whistle of the steamship A., bound eastward, was first heard by the master of the steamship L., bound westward, a point or a point and a half on his starboard bow, and the sound of the whistle gradually broadened until it reached two and a half to three points on that bow. As the next whistle did not seem to broaden, the master of The L. stopped his engines. The next whistle satisfied him that A. was porting and closing on his starboard bow, and he thereupon reversed his engines. The two vessels came into collision; but if A. had not ported they would have passed starboard to starboard on nearly parallel and opposite courses.

Held, by the Court of Appeal (affirming the judgment of Barnes, J.), in an action of damage, that The L. was to blame for the collision as well as The A.

The Ceto, 14 App. Cas. 670, followed.—The Lancashire, C.A. 327—[1893] P. 47; 62 L. J. P. D. & A. 34.

12. "Making way"—Regulations of 1884 for Preventing Collisions at Sea, art. 5, sub-sections (a), (c), (d).—This House will not disturb a mere finding of fact in which both the courts below have concurred unless it can be clearly shown that the finding was erroneous.

By article 5 of the Regulations of 1884 for Preventing Collisions at Sea, sub-section (a), a steamship "which from any accident is not under command shall at night carry," in place of the white light, "three red lights in globular lanterns." By sub-section (c) such a steamship, "when making way" through the water, shall carry the side lights. By sub-section (d) the lights "required to be shown by this article are to be taken by other ships as signals that the ship showing them is not under command, and cannot, therefore, get out of the way."

Owing to an accident to her machinery the speed of a steamship was reduced from eleven knots to between four and five knots. She was able to steer, but could not reverse and go astern as quickly as before. She hoisted three red lights in place of the white light, and went ahead; but it was found as a fact both in the Admiralty Division and in the Court of Appeal that she did not exhibit her red side light till the moment when she came into collision with another vessel. The courts below held that she thus misled the other vessel into the belief that she was stationary, and so caused the collision.

Held, that, as it could not be clearly shown that the finding of fact as to the red side light was erroneous, this House would not disturb it.

The decisions of the Admiralty Division ([1891] P. 313) and of the Court of Appeal ([1892] P. 191) affirmed, with observations by Lord Herschell, L.C., and Lord Watson as to the circumstances under which a steamship can be said to be "not under command" within the meaning of the regulations.

By Lord Herschell, L.C.: This ship being able to make way at between four and five knots, to steer, to stop and reverse, though less quickly than before, and the danger of the machinery ceasing to work at any moment not being imminent, the ship could not properly be said to be "not under command" within the meaning of the regulations.—Owners of The P. Caland and Freight v. Glamorgan Steamship Co.; The P. Caland, H.L. (E.)—[1893] A. C. 207; 62 L. J. P. D. & A. 41; 68 L. T. 469.

13. Overtaken ship—Manœuvres for third vessel—Course—Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, arts. 20, 22, 23.—Where a vessel which is being overtaken by another deviates from her course, it becomes the duty of the overtaking ship to exercise reasonable care to keep out of the way of the former.

An overtaken vessel which finds it necessary to manœuvre for a third vessel is to blame if she deviates from her course more than is necessary to avoid immediate danger.—The Saragossa, C.A.—68 L. T. 400.

14. Overtaking ship—Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, Articles 16, 20.—The steamship M. was proceeding down the Bristol Channel on a W. course, and gradually overhauled the steamship B., which was proceeding on a W.½N. course.

When on the starboard beam of The B., The M. altered her course to W.S.W., and a collision occurred.

The M. charged The B. with a breach of article 16. The B. charged The M. with a breach of article 20.

Held, that the obligation on The M. under article 20, as the "overtaking" ship, to keep out of the way continued, although she had ceased to be within the area lighted by the stern light, and had advanced into a position in which she could see the side light of the "overtaken" ship.—The Molière, P.D. & A.D.—[1893] P. 217.

15. Pilot—Compulsory pilotage—Qualification of pilot—Order in Council, May 1, 1855, Regulation 4.—A collision in the Thames within the London district was caused solely by the negligence of the pilot of the defendants' vessel. The defendants' vessel drew more than fourteen feet of water, but the pilot who was in charge was not licensed to take charge of a vessel drawing more than fourteen feet of water. It was admitted that when the pilot boarded the vessel no pilot qualified for vessels drawing more than fourteen feet was available.

Held, affirming the judgment of the President, that the defendants' plea of compulsory pilotage was good, as the effect of the clause in the Order in Council of May, 1855—"unless there shall be no qualified pilot to be obtained who has passed the said examination for ships drawing more than fourteen feet of water"—was to render the pilot qualified, and his employment compulsory.

Semble, a duly qualified pilot would have a right to supersede him, the latter being paid his fair proportion of the pilotage fees.—The Carl XV., C.A.—[1892] P. 324; 61 L. J. P. D. & A. 111; 68 L. T. 49.

16. Thames navigation—Pilot in charge by compulsion of law—Carrying anchor at the hawse pipe with stock above water within province of pilot—Order in Council, February 5, 1872, par. 20 (Thames Conservancy Bye-Laws).—Whether the anchor of a steamer in the Thames should be carried at the hawse pipe with the stock above water is a matter within the province of the pilot, notwithstanding that the carrying of the anchor in such a position may be an infringement of rule 20 of the Thames Conservancy Bye-Laws for the Navigation of the River Thames, in force under the Order in Council of the 5th of February, 1872.

MASTER—

17. Disbursements on account of the ship—Maritime lien—Master's authority—Merchant Shipping Act, 1889 (52 & 53 Vict. c. 46), s. 1.—The appellant, as master of the steamship Castlegate, and agent for the charterers, obtained cash advances and coals from W. & Co., for which he paid by bills drawn in their favour upon the charterers. The bills were dishonoured, and W. & Co. recovered judgment against the appellant as drawer, who thereupon applied to the High Court of Admiralty for a declaration that he had a valid lien for his disbursements upon ship and freight. The charterers had undertaken to pay port dues, &c., and to provide and pay for coals, and the appellant had notice of these terms.

Held, that the appellant had no maritime lien given him by the Merchant Shipping Act, 1889, either on the ship or freight.

The decision of the Court of Appeal in Ireland (29 L. R. Ir. 55) affirmed.—Morgan v. Castlegate Steamship Co., H.L. (Ir.) 349—[1893] A. C. 38; 62 L. J. P. C. 17; 68 L. T. 99.

18. Thames navigation — Bye-laws — Watermen's and Lightermen's Amendment Act, 1859 (22 & 23 Vict. c. 133), bye-law 99—Thames Conservancy Act, 1864 (27 & 28 Vict. c. 113), bye-law 36.—By the 99th bye-law under the Watermen's and Lightermen's Amendment Act, 1859, if the master, &c., of any steam vessel navigated on the Thames within a certain district "shall not (when practicable) remain, continue, and be on one of the paddle-boxes or on the bridge" of such vessel, or on the deck cabin adjoining, "or shall not cause and procure a proper look-out to be kept from the bow" of such vessel, he shall incur a penalty not exceeding five pounds.

By the 36th bye-law made under the Thames Conservancy Act, 1864, the master of every steam vessel navigating the river shall be and remain on one of the paddle-boxes or bridge, "and shall cause a proper look-out to be kept from the said vessel."

The appellant, the master of a steamboat, was convicted and fined for not having caused a proper look-out to be kept from the bow of the vessel, contrary to bye-law 99 of the first-mentioned Act.

Held (affirming the conviction), that the Watermen's and Lightermen's Amendment Act, 1859, and the Thames Conservancy Act, 1864, being intended to be read together, the bye-laws under the latter Act did not supersede generally those made under the former, and that the provisions in question of bye-law 99 of the former Act were not inconsistent with bye-law 36 of the latter, and remained, therefore, in force.—Gosling v. Green, Q.B.D. 141—[1893] 1 Q. B. 109; 62 L. J. M. C. 45; 67 L. T. 853.

MERCHANT SHIPPING ACTS—

19. "Vessel used in navigation"—Electric launch not having certificate carrying passengers on an artificial lake—Merchant Shipping Act, 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104), s. 318.—The appellants were convicted by the justices of Southport on a charge that they, being the owners of an electric launch, did ply with more than twelve passengers on board without having a duplicate of a certificate of the Board of Trade put up in a conspicuous part of the vessel, so as to be visible to all persons on board the same, contrary to section 318 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854. The vessel was an electric launch, owned by the appellants, in which passengers were taken for hire on pleasure trips on an artificial lake in a park also the property of the appellants.

Held, that the electric launch was not within section 2 of the Act, which enacts that the term "ship" shall include a "vessel used in navigation," and that the Act, therefore, did not apply, and the conviction was wrong.—Mayor, &c., of Southport v. Morriss, Q.B.D. 382—[1893] 1 Q. B. 359; 62 L. J. M. C. 47; 68 L. T. 221.

SALVAGE—

20. Agent—Services rendered by—Authority to incur expenses—Principle upon which award based.—An agent is not precluded from claiming as a salvor; but where the owners of the property in danger have requested him to render assistance and thereby have given him a right to some remuneration, though the operations prove unsuccessful, the assessment of the award for successful salvage services will be based upon the principle that the agent did not, like an independent salvor, run the risk of the loss of the entire expenditure if his efforts had proved unsuccessful.—The Kate B. Jones, P.D. & A.D.—[1892] P. 366; 69 L. T. 197.

21. Amount of award.—In a case of salvage, where the services mainly consisted in towing a large steamer, disabled in her machinery, in the Atlantic Ocean in the winter for six and a half days into safety at Halifax, the values of the salved vessel, her cargo and freight, being £90,000, and the owners of the salving vessel having incurred expenses in consequence of deviation and delay, the court made a salvage award of £5,350; awarding to the owners of the salving vessel £4,225, to her master £375, and to her crew £750.—The Edenmore, P.D. & A.D. 654—[1893] P. 79.

22. Apportionment—Agreement to participate in salvage remuneration in proportions previously determined—Merchant Shipping Act, 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104), s. 182—Merchant Shipping Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 63), s. 18.—In a case of apportionment of salvage it appeared that it had been stipulated by the articles that the salvors, the owners, master, and crew of a steam trawler, should participate in all sums awarded for salvage in proportion to a percentage set forth therein, and that, according to this proportion, the master of the trawler would be entitled to ten per cent. of all salvage awards, her mate to seven per cent., and her boatswain to three per cent. of the same.

Held, that the stipulation so embodied in the articles was not inequitable, and that the court would apportion shares of the salvage to the applicants, the master, mate, and boatswain of the trawler. in accordance with such stipulation.—The Wilhelm Tell, P.D. & A.D. 205—[1892] P. 337; 61 L. J. P. D. & A. 127; 69 L. T. 199.

23. Apportionment — Classification of salvors — Non-navigation portion of crew—Surgeons, stewards, &c.—A large steamer fell in, in the Atlantic, with another large steamer disabled by the breaking of her propeller shaft, and successfully brought her into port, after a towage of 757 miles, lasting five days. The owners of the disabled steamer settled the claim of the salving steamer by the payment of £12,000, and the owners, master, and crew of the salving steamer applied to the court to apportion this sum. Of the fifty-nine persons composing the crew of the salving steamer there were eleven non-navigating members, viz., the surgeon, four stewards, stewardess, two cooks, baker, and two cabin boys, who took no active part in rendering assistance to the disabled steamer.

In apportioning the above sum, and awarding £9,200 to the owners, £800 to the master, and the remaining £2,000 to the crew according to their rating,

The court held that the non-navigating members of the crew above specified were only entitled to a half share, according to their ratings.—The Spree, P.D. & A.D.—[1893] P. 147.

24. Towage agreement—Risk to tug—Danger to tow—Conditions required before salvage engrafted on towage.—The plaintiffs' tug was engaged, for a fixed sum, to tow from sea and dock the defendants' ship. Whilst the tug was, under the direction of the pilot, turning the ship round in order to enter the dock stern first, the tow-rope of another tug fast on the ship's quarter parted, and, through the effect of the wind and tide, the ship touched the ground. The plaintiffs' tug, by the direction of the pilot, then shifted her position, and proceeded to tow the ship into dock bow first. In so doing the ship came off. The plaintiffs claimed remuneration, alleging that their tug had rescued the defendants' ship from danger.

Held, that the plaintiffs were not entitled to salvage remuneration, as the ship was not in any immediate danger, and the tug had not run any risk or performed any duty, or rendered any services beyond what, in the contemplation of the parties, was reasonably to be expected of her during the continuance of the towage contract.—The Liverpool, P.D. & A.D.—[1893] P. 154; 68 L. T. 719.

SOLICITOR:—

1. Charging order— Costs — Action on behalf of mortgagor—Charging order taking priority over interest of mortgagee—Attorneys and Solicitors Act, 1860 (23 & 24 Vict. c. 127), s. 28.—An action was commenced by the solicitors for the purchaser of a leasehold house for specific performance of the agreement for sale. In the course of the proceedings it transpired that the purchaser had mortgaged his interest in the agreement; but the mortgagee declined to release her interest, or to concur in the proceedings. Judgment was obtained in the action, ordering the defendants to assign the lease of the house to the plaintiff or his mortgagee. Plaintiff's solicitors applied by petition for a charging order on the leasehold house for their taxed costs, charges, and expenses as solicitors for the plaintiff in the action.

Held, that they were entitled to a charging order as prayed, and that it must not only bind the plaintiff's interest in the house, but take priority over the mortgage.—Scholey v. Peck, CH.D. ROM., J., 508--[1893] 1 Ch. 709; 62 L. J. Ch. 658; 68 L. T. 118.

2. Charging order—Costs—"Property recovered and preserved"—Lapse of time—39 & 40 Vict. c. 44, s. 3.—In 1883 K., acting as solicitor for M., succeeded in establishing the will of M.'s father in a suit in the Probate Court in which M. was declared entitled to her costs out of the assets. In August, 1884, M. changed her solicitor, and executed a mortgage of the assets, which consisted of leasehold property, to B. for £200. In December, 1884, K. obtained judgment against M. for the amount of his costs, which he registered as a mortgage against the property in the same month. In 1884 M. presented a petition for sale of the chattels real to the Landed Estates Court, and in 1886 an action was brought against her in the Chancery Division to administer the assets. In this latter action M. was found a debtor to the estate in the sum of £583, and the claims of the creditors were reserved for adjudication by the judge. In March, 1892, K., who had not been paid his costs of the suit in the Probate Court, applied for an order, under 39 & 40 Vict. c. 44, s. 3, for a charge on the assets for the amount of his costs.

Held, that, having regard to the lapse of time and the several events which had happened since the will was proved affecting the rights and interests of the parties interested in the assets, K. was not entitled to a charge for his costs.—Roche v. Roche, C.A. (Ir.)—29 L. R. Ir. 339.

3. Costs—Agreement as to costs—Attorneys and Solicitors Act, 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 28), s. 4.—A solicitor wrote to a client on whose behalf he had done work and incurred expenses, saying, "If you are not prepared to settle the whole amount, I must ask at least for £100 on account." Receiving no answer he wrote again, threatening proceedings unless the client "was prepared to send a cheque for the whole amount." Subsequently the client paid £100 on account, and, in consequence of communications made to him by a third party, wrote: "I am off to Scotland, and will send you a cheque for the whole amount on my return."

Held, that the letters did not disclose any agreement between solicitor and client within section 4 of the Solicitors Act, 1870, so as to deprive the client of his right to taxation.—Pontifex v. Farnham, Q.B.D. 238—62 L. J. Q. B. 344; 68 L. T. 168.

4. Costs—Agreement as to costs—Signature of one party — Taxation after payment — Solicitors' Remuneration Act, 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 44), s. 8.—An agreement for remuneration under sub-sections 1 and 2 of section 8 of the Solicitors' Remuneration Act, 1881, is sufficiently signed if signed by the person who seeks to repudiate it, and need not be signed by both parties.

Where such an agreement signed by the client is impeached by him as being, and evidence is brought forward showing that it is, unfair and unreasonable, it is competent to the court, upon a taxation summons by the client, although payment has been made under the agreement, to make an order for taxation, and to direct the taxing master to certify whether or not the agreement is unfair and unreasonable.

5. Costs—Agreement as to costs—Application to set aside such agreement — Summons at chambers — Attorneys and Solicitors Act, 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 28), s. 8.—Since the Judicature Act, 1873, an application to set aside an agreement between a solicitor and his client as to costs may be made by a summons in chambers, notwithstanding section 8 of the Attorneys and Solicitors Act, 1870, which provides that such agreement may be enforced or set aside "on motion or petition" by the court in which the business was done, or a judge thereof.—In re Thomas, Q.B.D. 524—[1893] 1 Q. 6. Costs—Agreement as to costs—"Fair and reasonable"—Attorneys and Solicitors Act, 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 28), ss. 4, 8, 9.—An agreement as to the remuneration of a solicitor, to be "fair and reasonable" within the meaning of the Attorneys and Solicitors Act, 1870, must be "fair" in the sense of having been fairly obtained, and "reasonable" in the sense of being reasonable in its terms.

A solicitor, who was retained by a client to attend on her behalf upon the taxation of a bill of costs, made an agreement in writing with his client under which the client was to pay him five per cent. on all costs taxed off the bill. The bill of costs when delivered amounted to about £5,000, and about £2,000 was taxed off, the greater part of this latter sum consisting of refresher fees paid to counsel which were largely in excess of the fees allowed by the rules. The client having applied, under sections 8 and 9 of the Attorneys and Solicitors Act, 1870, to have the agreement set aside as not being "fair and reasonable,"

Held, that, as the agreement was fully explained to the client, and its effect was understood by her before she entered into it, it could not be said to be unfair; but that, as the remuneration which the solicitor would receive under the agreement was largely in excess of that which he would receive for the work done apart from the agreement, the terms thereof were not reasonable, and the agreement must be set aside.—In re Stuart, Ex parte Cathcart, C.A. 614—[1893] 2 Q. B. 201.

7. Costs—"Attendances"—Discretion of taxing master—Solicitors' Remuneration Act, 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 44)—General Order, Schedule 2.—Under Schedule 2 of the General Order under the Solicitors' Remuneration Act, 1881, prescribing a charge of 10s. for an "ordinary" attendance, and giving the taxing master power in "extraordinary cases" to increase or diminish that charge "if for any special reasons he shall think fit," it is a question for the discretion of the taxing master whether or not a case is "extraordinary" as being more simple or more difficult than a normal fair average case. In extraordinary cases, where the taxing master increases or diminishes the "ordinary" charge, he must have special reasons for so doing, but he is not bound to state his special reasons till he formally answers the objections to his taxation.

9. Costs — Sale of property by public auction—Scale of charges for property sold in lot—Solicitors' Remuneration Act, 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 44), General Order, Schedule I.—Where property sold by public auction is divided into different lots, the scale of charges is to be a commission upon the aggregate sum realized by the whole of the property, and not upon the value of each different lot, although the lots be held by the vendor under different titles, and be sold to different persons.—In re Onward Building Society, Q.B.D. 107—[1893] 1 Q. 10. Costs—Taxation—Solicitor co-mortgagee—Foreclosure action—Profit costs—Sale of mortgaged property—Solicitor mortgagee's firm acting for mortgagees.—A solicitor mortgagee is not entitled, as against the mortgagor, to charge profit costs in respect of business relating to the mortgage transacted by the solicitor acting for himself and a co-mortgagee, or by a firm of solicitors of which he is a partner.

The rule established by Cradock v. Piper, 1 Mac. & G. 664—that where a solicitor or his firm appears in an action on behalf of himself and a co-trustee, and the expense has not thereby been increased, the solicitor is entitled to the usual costs—is not applicable to the costs of a solicitor mortgagee acting for himself and his co-mortgagees.

In re Donaldson, 27 Ch. D. 544, 33 W. R. Dig. 61, overruled.

F. (who was a solicitor) and A. were transferees of a mortgage created by D. D. died, and the transferees brought an action for administration of his estate, and obtained the usual administration judgment. Orders were subsequently made for the sale of the mortgaged property out of court, and that the purchase-money should be received by the plaintiffs, they undertaking to pay into court the balance after satisfying the mortgage debt. The sale took place, and the plaintiffs carried in for taxation two bills of costs delivered by the firm of F. & H., one for costs incurred upon the transfer of the mortgage, and the other for costs incurred in carrying out the sale. The taxing master disallowed all costs except costs out of pocket, on the ground that F., one of the mortgagees, was a member of the firm of F. & H., by whom the costs were claimed. The business charged for was transacted exclusively by H. and the clerks of the firm. The plaintiffs took out a summons to review the taxation.

Held, by Stirling J., that F. could not retain his share of the profit costs as against the estate of D., but that on principle there was nothing to prevent H. from receiving remuneration for his trouble, and the matter would, therefore, be remitted to the taxing master for reconsideration, with a direction to ascertain what would be properly chargeable against the estate of D. if an independent solicitor had been employed, and to allow such proportion of that amount as H. was entitled to in respect of the general profits of the partnership as between himself and F.

Two mortgagees, one of whom was a solicitor, brought an action for foreclosure, and obtained judgment. The mortgagees were represented in the action by the solicitor mortgagee. The taxing master disallowed as against the mortgagor all profit costs of the action.

Held, by the Court of Appeal (affirming the decision of Stirling, J.), that the taxing master was right, and that the costs were properly disallowed. —In re Doody, Fisher v. Doody; Hibbert v. Lloyd, C.A. 49—[1893] 1 Ch. 129; 62 L. J. Ch. 14; 68 L. T. 128.

11. Costs—Taxation—Allowance by solicitor of part of bill—More than one-sixth taxed off—Special circumstances—Solicitors Act, 1843 (6 & 7 Vict. c. 73), s. 37.—A firm of solicitors sent in to their clients, who were two surviving trustees, a detailed bill of their charges in respect of business connected with the trust for which they had been employed. The bill was for £44 2s. 8d., and there was added at the foot, "By allowance, £7 2s. 8d." The taxing master disallowed £10 19s. 4d. from the bill (of £44 2s. 8d.), but stated in his certificate that he treated the bill as one for £37, as he considered the £7 2s. 8d. allowance to be unconditional; many of the charges were disallowed on the ground that the trustees themselves ought to have performed the work in respect of which the disallowed charges were made, but it appeared that the solicitors had been expressly instructed by the acting trustee (since deceased) to perform it; and the taxing master considered the solicitors entitled to the costs of taxation.

Held (affirming the decision of the Chancellor of the Durham Palatine Court of Chancery), that the bill was properly taxable on £44 2s. 8d.

Held, also, that the facts were sufficient to justify the Chancellor in allowing, in the exercise of his discretion, the solicitors the costs of the taxation.

12. Costs—Taxation—Counsel's fees—New trial motion.—Primâ facie the costs of counsel disallowed between party and party should not be allowed as between solicitor and client.

If three counsel appear on a new trial motion in the Divisional Court and in the Court of Appeal, the principles of taxation which allow or disallow the costs of more than two counsel in either court should be equally applied to the costs in both courts; and in the absence of special circumstances counsel allowed in the one court will be allowed in the other. The costs of a third counsel may be allowed as between solicitor and client where important interests are involved, or where the client has authorized or subsequently assented to the employment of a third counsel.—In re Barnhill's Estate, L.J. 13. Costs—Taxation—Preparation of petition in Landed Estates Court—Tenancy fee—Schedule of Fees (July 18*th*, 1859), item 76.—To entitle the solicitor for a petitioner to the fee of two shillings for each tenancy set out in the first schedule, pursuant to item 76 of the Schedule of Fees (July 18th, 1859), there must be a real investigation of the tenures under which the tenants hold and the rents which they pay; and the cost of transcription only will be allowed for a mere transcript of the poor law valuation affording no practical information as to the tenancies.—In re Temple's Estate, L.J. 14. Costs—Taxation—Mortgagee's solicitor—Scale fee—Past advance—Solicitors' Remuneration Act, 1881 —General Order, 1884, r. 2, Schedule I., Part I.—The word "loan" in Schedule I., Part I., of the General Order under the Solicitors' Remuneration Act, 1881, means "mortgage," and does not imply that there must necessarily be a fresh advance on the occasion of a mortgage. Accordingly, where a mortgage is effected by a solicitor to secure a past debt, the scale fee applies.

15. Disciplinary jurisdiction—Order for payment of money—Judgment debt.—A solicitor received a sum of money for and on behalf of a client, but claimed to retain the whole, on the ground that his bill of costs amounted to a larger sum. The client sued the solicitor for the balance which he alleged to be due to him after making a proper deduction for costs, and obtained judgment. The judgment being ineffective, the client applied to the court for a summary order on the solicitor to pay over the money.

Held (reversing the decision of Grantham and Charles, JJ.), that the fact of a judgment having been obtained by the client against the solicitor did not prevent the court from exercising its disciplinary jurisdiction.

16. Lien for costs—Land agent—Policies—Payment of premiums by solicitor.—By indentures of assignment a testator assigned to M. B. two policies on the life of the testator. The testator lived in England, but M. B. for many years acted as solicitor and land agent for the testator on his estate in Ireland. The policies were assigned by the testator to M. B. as trustee to secure to mortgagees the repayment of a loan on the Irish property. M. B. acted as solicitor both for the testator and the mortgagees. M. B. died on the 19th of July, 1889, and the testator died on the 14th of March, 1890. C. B., widow and executrix of M. B., claimed in a creditor's action to have a lien on the proceeds of the policies in court for two sums of money: (1) in respect of professional charges of M. B. acting as solicitor to the testator; (2) partly for work done as a land agent, and partly for two insurance premiums paid by M. B. for the testator. The chief clerk allowed a claim made by the mortgagees, but disallowed the claim of C. B. to be entitled to a lien on the proceeds of the policies.

On summons by C. B. to vary the chief clerk's certificate,

Held, that the solicitor's lien could not be extended to the claim in respect of land agency; that C. B. was entitled to be repaid out of the fund in court the premiums paid by the late M.B.; and, as to the professional charges as solicitor, that M.B.'s lien was preserved subject to the mortgage, and the chief clerk's certificate must be varied by finding that C. B. was entitled to be paid the two sums, except in respect of the land agency, and must have her costs.—In re Walker, Meredith v. Walker, CH.D. KEK., J.—68 L. T. 517.

17. Lien for costs—Company—Claim by solicitor as legatee—Issue of debentures as security—Costs previously due.—Before 1866 C. acted as solicitor to a railway company, and there was a large sum due to him for costs. In 1866 C. was pressing for payment, and £4,000 debentures were issued to C. in March, 1867. These debentures were never paid, and C. commenced an action against the company in respect of them, but this action was discontinued and it was arranged that the claims for costs should be submitted to K., a solicitor, for "moderation or taxation." K. certified a sum as the net amount due for costs up to the 21st of February, 1871. These costs were not paid, but the costs subsequently incurred were paid from time to time. C. died in 1875, having bequeathed to his son, the respondent, the unpaid costs due to him from the company, and any security for them. After the father's death the respondent was appointed solicitor to the company, and all costs due to him as such solicitor were paid. He continued to act as their solicitor till March, 1892. In April, 1892, a petition was presented by the company praying that the respondent might be ordered to deliver up certain deeds and documents of the company in his possession. The respondent claimed a lien upon them in respect of the costs accrued due after the date of the issue of the debentures.

Held, that the submission to K. for taxation did not alter the effect of the transaction of March, 1867, and that the issue of the debentures amounted merely to giving security for costs previously due to C.; secondly, that the respondent, as legatee of his father, was entitled to a lien for the sum found due to C. by K.'s certificate between March, 1867, and the 21st of February, 1871.—Enniskillen, Bundoran, and Sligo Railway Co. v. Collum, M.R. 18. Misconduct—Inquiry by the Incorporated Law Society — Charge withdrawn — Report not filed—Solicitors Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 65), s. 13.—Charges of professional misconduct having been made against a solicitor, an inqury was instituted before the Incorporated Law Society under the Solicitors Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 65). Evidence having been given, the charges, at the suggestion of the chairman, were withdrawn, and the committee did not file any report. The solicitor applied for a mandamus to compel the committee to make and file a report in the High Court.

Held, that the committee could not be compelled to do so, as they had not arrived at any finding that could be reported, and no objection having been made at the hearing to the withdrawal, such course had been assented to.—Ex parte Whitfield, Q.B.D.—67 L. T. 856.

19. Negligence—Sale of land—Unpaid instalments of redeemed tithe rent-charge — Particulars and conditions of sale—Land sold free from incumbrance.—The plaintiff employed the defendant as his solicitor to prepare particulars and conditions of sale of lands which were liable to certain instalments in respect of the redemption of the tithe rent-charge. The plaintiff had forgotten the existence of the charge, though he had paid one instalment, and the defendant did not inquire whether tithe rent-charge or instalments of its purchase-money were payable out of the lands. The particulars and conditions of sale did not disclose the existence of the charge, and the lands were sold as free from incumbrance. The purchaser having claimed, on the authority of Perrin v. Roe, 25 L. R. Ir. 37, to have the charge redeemed out of the purchase-money, the plaintiff brought this action to recover damages for negligence in the preparation of the abstract of title, the particulars and conditions of sale, in that the same did not disclose the unpaid instalments. The jury having found a verdict for the plaintiff,

Held, by O'Brien, C.J., and Holmes, J., that there was no evidence of negligence, and verdict and judgment must be entered for the defendant; by Johnson, J., that there should be a new trial.—Mahony v. Davoren, Q.B.D. (Ir.)—30 L. R. Ir. 664.

20. Trustee—Power to charge for professional services and trouble—Settlement of accounts between trustees.—A testator appointed B. & G. his executors and trustees, bequeathed to G., if he should accept the office of trustee and executor, £200, and declared that G. and every future trustee of his will who might be a solicitor should be entitled to receive out of the estate his usual professional costs and charges for business transacted by him, including business not strictly professional, but which might or would have been performed in person by a trustee not being a solicitor. Considerable sums were charged by G. against the estate for business done by him, including charges for his trouble in matters not strictly professional.

Held, that G., notwithstanding the legacy given to him, was entitled to make such charges.

Held, also, that, in the absence of special powers in the will, trustees cannot settle the amount payable out of the estate to one of themselves, so as to bind the cestuis que trust, and that the latter were entitled to have G.'s costs and charges investigated.—In re Fish, Bennett v. Bennett, C.A.—[1893] 2 Ch. 413.

to act, his jurisdiction to imprison for contempt being confined, by section 162 of the County Courts Act, 1888, to contempts committed in the face of the court.—Reg. v. Judge of the Brompton County Court, Q.B.D. 648—[1893] 2 Q. B. 195; 68 L. T. 829.

SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE:—

Landlord and tenant—Residential flat—Covenant to employ porter to perform certain duties—Injunction—Damages.—The defendants granted to the plaintiff a lease of a residential flat, the lease containing a covenant by the lessors to appoint a resident porter who should act as the servant of the tenants of the several rooms in the block, his duties being (inter alia) to be constantly in attendance in the block, either by himself or, in his temporary absence, by some trustworthy assistant. The defendants appointed as porter a cook, who spent the greater part of his time elsewhere in performing his duties as a cook at a neighbouring luncheon club; and his duties as resident porter were for the most part performed by a boy or a charwoman.

In an action claiming specific performance of the agreement to appoint a resident porter within the meaning of the covenant, A. L. Smith, J., held that there had been a breach of the covenant, and granted specific performance.

Held, on appeal, that this was not a contract of which the court would decree specific performance, and that the plaintiff must be left to his remedy in damages.—Ryan v. Mutual Westminster Chambers Association (Limited), C.A. 146—[1893] 1 Ch. 116; 62 L. J. Ch. 252; 67 L. T. 820.

STATUTORY DUTY:—

Waterworks — Reservoir — Exercise of statutory powers — Deviation — Construction of works not authorized by statute—Injunction.—Where the promoters of a public undertaking have authority from Parliament to interfere with private property on certain terms, any person whose property is interfered with by virtue of that authority has a right to require that the promoters shall comply with the letter of the enactment so far as it makes provision on his behalf. Nor can any court remodel arrangements sanctioned, or relax conditions imposed, by statute.

Deviation in its ordinary and natural sense, as used in Acts of Parliament, means shifting the work in its integrity from one site to another which may be deemed more suitable. It does not imply a right not only to alter the situation of the work but in doing so to dispense with a half or two-thirds of it.

A local and personal Act empowered commissioners to take water from a river for the supply of a township on condition of their executing certain works and (inter alia) a reservoir to supply compensation water to mill owners, and a conduit, the reservoir to be constructed by an embankment across the river. The Act and the plans described the position of the reservoir, its contour and capacity, and the height of the embankment, and provided that in constructing the authorized works the commissioners might, subject to the provisions of the Act, deviate from the lines of the works to any extent not exceeding the limits of lateral deviation shown on the deposited plans, and from the levels shown on the deposited sections, in the case of the reservoir to any extent of lesser height which would enable the commissioners to give a sufficient supply of water for compensation purposes; but the commissioners should not in the exercise of the power of lateral deviation thereby given construct any embankment or wall of any reservoir of a greater height above the general surface of the ground than that shown on the plans with reference to the corresponding embankment or wall and six feet in addition.

In constructing the reservoir the commissioners curtailed it by more than one-third of its length and nearly two-thirds of its capacity, and placed the embankment higher up the river than the point fixed by the Act, and so that the capacity could not be enlarged in the event of the supply of compensation water proving insufficient. In constructing the conduit the commissioners disregarded in material points the directions of the Act, and constructed a conduit which they alleged was "a substantial equivalent" to the mill owners. The mill owners having brought an action against the commissioners,

Held, reversing the decision of the Irish Court of Appeal (27 L. R. Ir. 179), Lords Morris and Hannen dissenting, that, though no actual damage was proved, the mill owners were entitled to a declaration that the reservoir and conduit were not in accordance with the provisions of the Act, and to an injunction restraining the commissioners from taking or using the waters of the river or from interfering with the flow of the river otherwise than as authorized by the Act.—Herron v. Rathmines and Rathgar Improvement Commissioners, H.L. STOCK EXCHANGE:—

Sale of shares—Undisclosed principal—London and country brokers—Set-off of debt due from agent—Custom of Stock Exchange.—A country stockbroker, acting for the plaintiff, an undisclosed principal, employed the defendants, members of the London Stock Exchange, to sell certain shares. The defendants sold the shares and claimed, under a custom of the London Stock Exchange, to set off the moneys received on the sale of the shares against the country broker's indebtedness to them in respect of previous Stock Exchange transactions.

Held, that the custom was an unreasonable one, and would not bind the plaintiff unless at the time he knew of it and agreed to be bound by it.—Blackburn v. Mason, C.A.—68 L. T. 510.

TENANT for LIFE:—

Perpetuity—Agreement for a lease for lives after expiration of prior lease for ninety-nine years or three lives.—By a lease in 1798 lands were demised to D. for three lives and the survivor of them, and if the said lives and the survivor of them should die before the determination of ninety-nine years from the date of the lease, for the residue of that term. By deed in 1814 the reversioner agreed with E. that he, his heirs and assigns, would, so soon as the said lives and years should determine and expire, grant to E., or to his heirs and assigns, by lease, whenever thereafter applied to for that purpose, portion of said lands, such lease to be for three lives, and to contain a covenant for perpetual renewal.

Held, that though it was competent for the reversioner in 1814 to agree to execute a lease for a definite term, to commence as soon as the lease to D. expired, it was necessary that the interest to be taken should be capable of ascertainment within the period prescribed by the rule against perpetuities; that as the lives in this case could not be nominated until after the term of ninety-nine years had expired, the nature and extent of the interest to be taken could not be ascertained within the prescribed period; that the lease would not be less open to objection by reason of the covenant for perpetual renewal; and that the agreement could not be enforced.

TENANT for LIFE and REMAINDERMAN:—

1. Annuity—Corpus or income.—B. granted certain annuities by bond, and subsequently died leaving his widow, the testatrix, his universal legatee and sole executrix. Under her will her residuary estate was held in trust for a tenant for life, with remainders over to other persons.

Held, that each payment of the annuities, as it became due, must be raised out of the corpus of the estate.—In re Bacon, Grissell v. Leathes, CH.D. KEK., J. 478—62 L. J. Ch. 247; 68 L. T. 155.

2. Apportionment—Income and capital—Mortgage—Mortgagees in possession—Will—Conversion clause.—A testator at the date of his death was in possession of a colliery as mortgagee, and there were considerable sums owing to his estate under the mortgage. After his death a receiver was put to work the colliery by the trustees of his will, and the trustees finally foreclosed the mortgage. Under his will the testator had given his trustees power to postpone the conversion of any part of real and personal estate. Prior to the date of the foreclosure decree the receiver had paid into court to the credit of the foreclosure action considerable sums of money, representing the net profits of working the colliery, which sums had been increased by accumulations of interest. This fund had been transferred to the credit of an action for the administration of the testator's estate. The tenants for life claimed the whole fund as income.

Held, that the accumulations of interest were income, and belonged to the tenants for life; that until the date of foreclosure absolute the mine was not a part of the testator's estate affected by the conversion clause, but only a security for money advanced, and that the profits arising from the working of the mine previous to that date must be apportioned between the tenants for life and remaindermen, on the principle that the tenants for life were entitled to the difference between the sum transferred into court and the sum which, with interest at four per cent. from the date of the testator's death to the date of the transfer to the credit of this action, would amount to the sum transferred into court; and that the sum so calculated belonged to the estate as capital.

3. Income in specie—Discretion in trustees to retain—Rule as to wasting securities—Originating summons—Practice.—Where the trustees of a will held freehold and leasehold estate in trust for sale, with power to postpone at discretion,

Held, that the words of the will were insufficient to entitle the tenant for life to enjoy in specie the income arising from the leaseholds prior to sale.

Semble, in an originating summons the court will not, at the instance of the respondent, decide a point not raised by the plaintiff taking out the summons.—In re Carter, CH.D. KEK., J. 140.

4. Trust for conversion—Capital and income—Unsaleable property retained—Apportionment of loss or profit.—A testator directed that his residuary estate should be sold and converted on a particular day, and that a share of the proceeds should be held upon trust for his wife for life, with remainders over. The residuary estate included a circus, which it was found impossible to sell advantageously, and which had been carried on at a loss by the executors since the day named for the sale and conversion of the estate. In a summons asking for directions how such losses and any future losses (or profits) should be apportioned as between capital and income,

Held, that the amount of annual profit or loss should be apportioned between the capital and the income of the testator's estate by inquiring what sum, put out at interest at four per cent. per annum on the day appointed for sale and conversion, and, as regards succeeding years, accumulating at compound interest calculated at the like rate, with yearly rests, would, together with such interest and accumulations, after deducting income tax, be equivalent, at the end of each year, to the amount of such profit or loss, and by crediting such sum to, or charging it against, the capital of the testator's estate, the rest of such profit or loss being credited to, or charged against, the income thereof.—In re Hengler, Frowde v. Hengler, CH.D. KEK., J. 491—[1893] 1 Ch. 586; 62 L. J. Ch. 383; 68 L. T. 84.

5. Trust for conversion—Enjoyment of income in specie—Lands settled on trust for sale—No power of postponement.—Where lands are vested in trustees upon trust for sale and investment of the proceeds, and payment of the income of the investments to a tenant for life, with remainders over, and without any power of postponement, the tenant for life is entitled to receive the net rents and profits until such conversion.—Hope v. D'Hedouville, CH.D. TENANT in TAIL:—

Disentailing deed—Estates taking effect in defeasance of the estate tail—Estates to which the estate tail is postponed upon happening of an event—Fines and Recoveries Act, 1833 (3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 74), s. 15.—The Act for the Abolition of Fines and Recoveries, 1833, provides, by section 15, that "every actual tenant in tail, whether in possession, remainder, contingency, or otherwise, shall have full power to dispose of for an estate in fee simple absolute or for any less estate the lands entailed by force of any estate tail . . . and also as against all persons whose estates are to take effect after the determination or in defeasance of any such estate tail; saving the rights of all persons in respect of estates prior to the estate tail in respect of which such disposition shall be made."

Lands were devised, subject to prior limitations, upon trust for B., the second son of A., for life, with remainder to B.'s first and other sons successively in tail male, with similar remainders to the third and other sons of A. and their sons. The will contained a proviso that, on the happening of a given event, the trusts in favour of B. and his issue male should "be postponed to and take effect in remainder next immediately after the trusts in favour of the other sons of A. and their issue male."

In 1872 B. and his eldest son, with the consent of the tenant for life in possession, executed a disentailing deed under section 15 of the Fines and Recoveries Act, 1833, and conveyed the lands in fee. In 1883 the given event happened. In 1891 the tenant for life died, and the plaintiff, the eldest son of A.'s third son, became entitled to the lands for an estate tail in possession, unless barred by the disentailing deed.

Held (affirming the judgment of Kekewich, J.), that the plaintiff's estate was an estate which would have taken effect in defeasance of the estate tale in respect of which the disentailing deed had been executed, and was, therefore, barred by virtue of section 15 of the Fines and Recoveries Act, 1833.

TITHE:—

1. Hop grounds or market gardens—Rent-charge in lieu of extraordinary charge—Liability to land tax—Extraordinary Tithe Redemption Act, 1886 (49 & 50 Vict. c. 54), ss. 3, 4, sub-section 5.—The annual rent-charge payable under the Extraordinary Tithe Redemption Act, 1886, in lieu of the extraordinary charge previously levied under the Tithe Commutation Acts, is not liable to land tax.—Carr v. Fowle, Q.B.D. 365—[1893] 1 Q. B. 251; 62 L. J. Q. B. 177; 68 L. T. 123.

2. Rating of owner of tithe rent-charge—Arrears of rates due before passing of Act—Deduction of, from tithe rent-charge accruing after Act—Repeal—Saving of existing rights and liabilities—Tithe Act, 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 8), s. 6.—By section 6 of the Tithe Act, 1891: "Any rate to which tithe rent-charge is subject shall be assessed on and may be recovered from the owner of the tithe rent-charge . . . . and so much of any Act as authorizes any rate on tithe rent-charge to be assessed on or recovered from the occupier of any lands out of which the tithe rent-charge issues is hereby repealed."

At the date of the passing of the said Act certain rates upon a tithe rent-charge, of which the appellant was the owner, were due and in arrear, owing to the neglect of the overseers to demand payment thereof from the occupiers of the lands out of which the tithe rent-charge issued. The tithe rent-charge for the period in respect of which the said rates were due had been paid to the appellant in full. After the passing of the Act the overseers, purporting to act under section 8 of the Tithe Act, 1837, demanded payment of the said arrears of rates from the occupiers of the land, who paid them, and were allowed the amount thereof by their landlord, the respondent, out of the half-year's rent becoming due next after such payment. Subsequently thereto a half-year's tithe rent-charge became payable by the respondent, as owner of the land, to the appellant. The respondent claimed to deduct therefrom the amount which he had allowed the occupiers out of their rent in respect of the said arrears of rates so paid by them.

Held, that, having regard to the provisions of section 6 of the Tithe Act, 1891, the payment of the arrears of rates by the occupiers was a voluntary payment which they were not entitled to deduct from their rent, and that the respondent was consequently not entitled to make the deduction claimed from the tithe rent-charge due to the appellant.—In re Tithe Act, 1891, Roberts v. Potts, Q.B.D.—[1893] 2 Q. B. 33; 62 L. J. Q. B. 436.

TORT:—

Joint tortfeasors—Discharge of one from liability—Right to claim against the other—Covenant not to sue—Release.—A covenant not to sue one of two joint tortfeasors does not operate as a release so as to discharge the other.

An agreement to accept a sum of money from one of two joint tortfeasors in full discharge of his liability, without prejudice to the right to claim against the other, ought to be construed, not as a release, but as a covenant not to sue.—Duck v. Mayeu, C.A. 56—[1892] 2 Q. B. 511; 62 L. J. Q. B. 69; 67 L. T. 694.

TRADE-MARK:—

1. Foreign trade-mark—Registration—Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 57), s. 103—Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks (Amendment) Act, 1885 (48 & 49 Vict. c. 63), s. 6.—Under sub-section 3 of section 103 of the Patents, &c., Act, 1883, a trade-mark which has been applied for in the country of origin, whether capable of being registered in that country or not, may be applied for here, but it will not be registered here unless it is a mark otherwise capable of registration under the law of this country.—In re Carter Medicine Co.'s Trade-Mark, CH.D. NOR., J. 13—[1892] 3 Ch. 472; 61 L. J. Ch. 716; 67 L. T. 747.

2. Label—Unregistered mark—Words "trade-mark" attached to unregistered mark—Use of registered mark not belonging to plaintiff—Misrepresentation to the public—Injunction.—A firm of retail dealers, who carried on business in several different branches of trade, registered a trade-mark for wearing apparel. They subsequently employed the same mark, with the words "trade-mark" attached thereto, upon the labels used in their tobacco department. No such mark had in fact been registered by them in respect of tobacco.

Upon the same labels the firm used a device which had been registered by R. in respect of tobacco, and had been assigned by him to W., an employé of the firm. W., having left the employment of the firm, granted a licence to G. to use his trade marks, and G. sold tobacco with a label similar to that of the firm. The firm commenced proceedings against G. to restrain him from passing off his goods as and for the goods of the firm. Upon motion for an interim injunction:

Held, that the use of the words "trade-mark" on goods, attached to a device, amounted to a representation to the public that that device was a registered trade mark.

Held, that there was also a representation that the device registered by R. was the registered trade-mark of the plaintiffs.

Held, that the plaintiffs, having been guilty of misrepresentation to the public, were not entitled to relief.

Injunction refused.—Lewis v. Goodbody, CH.D. KEK., J.—67 L. T. 194.

3. Old mark—Alteration—Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 57), s. 92—Name or initials of proprietor—Discretion of court—Essential and non-essential particulars.—A trade-mark registered as an old mark ought to be registered and kept registered just as it was used, and, in the absence of special circumstances rendering alteration necessary, no alteration of such mark ought to be allowed.

The circumstance that the proprietor of an old mark, whose name or initials form part of such mark, has transferred to another person the business in connection with which the mark has been used is not sufficient to induce the court to allow an alteration of the mark by substituting the name or initials of the new proprietor for the name or initials of the former proprietor.—In re Henry Clay and Bock & Co., CH.D. KEK., J.—[1892] 3 Ch. 549; 62 L. J. Ch. 143; 67 L. T. 614.

4. Registration — Action for infringement of one mark — Motion by defendant to expunge a different mark from register—"Person aggrieved"—Isolated user—Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 57), ss. 64 (3), 90.—Under section 90 of the Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883, requiring an applicant for rectification of the register of trade-marks to be a "person aggrieved," any person who is in the same trade as the person who has registered the mark which is alleged to be wrongfully registered, and who may at some future time, in the ordinary scope of his business, desire to deal in the article covered by the registration, even though, at the time of making the application to rectify, he has no present or immediate intention or desire to deal in it, is primâ facie a "person aggrieved."

In 1884 P., on behalf of G. & Co., a firm of sauce manufacturers, registered the words "Yorkshire Relish" as a trade-mark for a certain sauce, on the ground of user of those words as a trade-mark before the 13th of August, 1875. P. had previously, in 1876, on behalf of the firm, registered two other trade-marks, the characteristic feature of which was the device of a willow pattern plate, claiming for them (as subsequently in the case of the words "Yorkshire Relish") user as trade-marks prior to 1875. In 1891 P. brought an action against the B. Co., who were also sauce manufacturers, to restrain them from using what he alleged to be a colourable imitation of his registered willow pattern mark. The B. Co. then moved to expunge from the register P.'s "Yorkshire Relish" trade-mark, on the ground that they were "aggrieved" by it being there. The words "Yorkshire Relish" alone had, prior to 1875, only been used by P. on packing cases containing bottles of the sauce; the bottles of sauce were put upon the market with the willow pattern mark upon them. The B. Co. had not formed any definite intention or desire to deal in "Yorkshire Relish."

Held, that the B. Co. were "persons aggrieved" within section 90 so as to be entitled to apply to rectify the register; and that, upon the evidence, the user of the words "Yorkshire Relish" upon the packing cases had not constituted user as a trade-mark prior to the passing of the Trade-Marks Registration Act, 1875, and the words must accordingly be expunged.

Decision of Chitty, J., affirmed.

Principle in In re Apollinaris Co.'s Trade-Mark, [1891] 2 Ch. 186, 39 W. R. Dig. 237, extended.—In re Powell's Trade-Mark, C.A. 627—[1893] 2 Ch. 388; 69 L. T. 60.

5. Registration—Similarity—Rectification of register—Old mark—Deceptive user—Misleading use of words "trade-mark."—D., a British cigar manufacturer, applied to register as a new mark for manufactured tobacco containing the words "Star of Hope," and a marine picture with a small six-pointed star in the sky. The application was opposed by W. as the registered proprietor of two marks for the same class of goods. The first mark was registered as an old mark in 1877, and consisted of an eight-pointed star. This mark was chiefly used upon packet tobacco; but from 1870 to 1884 cigars were manufactured for W. by an English firm, upon which the mark was used as part of a label containing the name of an imaginary Spanish firm and the word "Habana." W.'s trade in cigars was comparatively small, and was subsidiary to his trade in packet tobacco. The second mark was registered in 1886 as a new mark, and consisted of a pictorial label, and by the side of the label an eight-pointed star, to which the words "trade-mark" were attached. W.'s goods were frequently ordered by the public as "star" goods. D. moved to expunge W.'s marks.

Held, first, that W. had no exclusive right to the name or design of a star; that, apart from such claim, D.'s mark was not calculated to deceive; and that D. was entitled to registration.

Held, also, that W.'s first mark was distinctive, and was not invalidated by the mode of user; first, because the misrepresentation accompanying the use of the mark upon cigars was not such as to destroy its distinctive character; secondly, because there had been no general or very extensive user of the mark upon cigars.

In re Wood's Trade-Mark, 32 Ch. D. 262, distinguished.

Held, also, that W.'s second mark was misleading, by reason of the position of the words "trade-mark," and ought to be expunged except as to the star, subject to an application being made by W. to amend.—In re Dexter's Application; In re Wills's Trade-Marks, CH.D. WRI., J.—[1893] 2 Ch. 262; 62 L. J. Ch. 545; 68 L. T. 793.

6. Unregistered trade-mark — Infringement — Intention to deceive — Evidence.—The plaintiffs had for many years made and sold belting for machinery which they called "Reddaway's camel hair belting," but had not registered any trade-mark. The defendants made and sold similar belting, which they called "The Bentham camel hair belting." An action having been brought by the plaintiffs to restrain the defendants from infringing their trade-mark and for damages, the plaintiffs gave evidence that their belting and no other belting was known to the trade as "camel hair belting"; but they offered no evidence to prove that the defendants had ever sold their belting as the plaintiffs' belting, or that any person had bought the defendants' belting upon the supposition that it was made by the plaintiffs. The judge, at the trial, stopped the case without hearing evidence for the defendants, and the jury, by his direction, gave a verdict for the defendants.

Held, by Lindley and Lopes, L.JJ. (A. L. Smith, L.J., dissenting), that there must be a new trial, in which it should be left to the jury: (1) whether the words "camel hair belting" had acquired in the trade the meaning of belting made by the plaintiffs; and, if so, (2) whether the defendants' description of their belting was likely to deceive purchasers, and to induce them to suppose that their belting was made by the plaintiffs, in which case the plaintiffs would be entitled to an injunction without proof of an intention to deceive.

By A. L. Smith, L.J., dissenting, that there was no evidence for the jury that the defendants had sold, or attempted to sell, their belting under circumstances likely to deceive purchasers; and that a verdict was properly directed for the defendants. —Reddaway v. Bentham Hemp Spinning Co., C.A.—[1892] 2 Q. B. 639; 67 L. T. 301.

7. Validity—Infringement—Rectification of register —Concurrent user—Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 57), s. 90.—The plaintiffs were brewers in Huntingdonshire, and had a large export trade in bottled beer and a small trade in this country. The defendants were brewers in Essex, and sold bottled beer in the Eastern counties, but had no export trade. Both parties sold beer in the north of London.

The plaintiffs were the proprietors of two trade-marks for fermented liquors and spirits registered respectively in 1879 and 1886 as new marks. Both of those marks consisted of a figure of a stout man in top boots with the words "John Bull Brand," and the plaintiffs' beer had become extensively known as "John Bull" beer. In 1884 the defendants or their predecessors, knowing nothing of the plaintiffs' marks, began to use for their bottled beer a label containing a somewhat similar picture of a stout man, coupled with the words "John Bull, Registered," and they continued to use this label after they knew of the existence of the plaintiffs' marks. The defendants' label was never registered as a trade-mark, though it had been entered at Stationers' Hall. The plaintiffs brought an action to restrain the defendants from infringing the plaintiffs' trade-mark, and also to restrain the defendants from passing off their beer as the plaintiffs'. Thereupon the defendants moved to expunge the words "John Bull" from the plaintiffs' trade-marks. It then transpired that the words "John Bull" had been used in connection with beer by a Sheffield firm of brewers, and that that firm had from 1875 to 1890 used those words to describe a particularly strong beer which they sold in Sheffield and its vicinity, but that such user had been finally abandoned in 1890, before the date of these proceedings.

Held, that, assuming that the Sheffield firm would have had a right to have the words "John Bull Brand" expunged from the register if they had applied in proper time, still it was clear that, apart from such objection, those words were, under the Trade-Marks Registration Act, 1875, capable of being added to the plaintiffs' mark of 1879, and as they had not been complained of by the only persons who had a right to complain, they ought to be allowed to stand unaltered.

Held, also, that the plaintiffs' mark of 1886 was only objectionable inasmuch as it embodied the mark of 1879, and it would be idle to strike out the words in question from the latter mark without striking them out from the first mark, in view of the very wide discretion conferred upon the court by section 90 of the Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883.

Held, therefore, that the plaintiffs' marks ought to be treated as duly registered trade-marks, with the lawful addition of the words "John Bull Brand"; and that the conduct of the defendants was such as to entitle the plaintiffs to the relief they claimed in the action.—Paine & Co. v. Daniel & Sons' Breweries (Limited), C.A.—[1893] 2 Ch. 567; 62 L. J. Ch. 732; 68 L. T. 801.

1. Abandonment of undertaking—Paper company—Application of parliamentary deposit—Depositors—Solicitors—Parliamentary agent—Creditors—Parliamentary Deposits and Bonds Act, 1892 (55 & 56 Vict. c. 27), s. 1.—The undertaking of a tramway company, incorporated by Act of Parliament, and in respect of which the necessary parliamentary deposit had been made, was abandoned, no land having been acquired or work done.

Held, that, under the Parliamentary Deposits and Bonds Act, 1892, s. 1, sub-sections 1 and 2, all the creditors of the company, including the solicitors and parliamentary agents concerned in the promotion of the Bill, were entitled to payment out of the deposit in priority to the depositors; but,

Held, that, the company being a "paper company," neither the solicitor nor the parliamentary agent was entitled to payment of his costs out of the parliamentary deposit.—In re Manchester, Middleton, and District Tramways Co., CH.D. KEK., J. 631—[1893] 2 Ch. 638; 62 L. J. Ch. 752; 68 L. T. 820.

2. Winding up — Costs of liquidator — Parliamentary deposits—Tramways Act, 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 78), s. 12—Board of Trade Rules, 1884, r. 28—Parliamentary Deposits and Bonds Act, 1892 (55 & 56 Vict. c. 27).—Summons by the liquidator of a tramway company, which had been ordered to be wound up, for the costs of the Treasury and for his own costs and remuneration out of deposits in court to the credit of the company. The assets of the company being insufficient to pay its debts and the costs of the liquidation,

Held, that the costs of the Treasury must be paid, but that the court had no jurisdiction to order payment of the liquidator's general costs or of his remuneration out of the deposits.—In re Colchester Tramways Co., CH.D. NOR., J. 169—[1893] 1 Ch. 309; 62 L. J. Ch. 416.

3. Nuisance—Statutory powers—Electrical tramway —Interference with telephone—Injunction.—A tramway was constructed under statutory powers which authorized the use of electrical power as the motive power with the consent of the Board of Trade, provided that, in the event of electrical power being used, no act should be done whereby any telegraphic line of the Postmaster-General might be injuriously affected. The defendant, the lessee of the tramway, with the consent of the Board of Trade, worked the tramway by electrical power upon a system which the evidence showed to be a good, workable, economical system, and in use in other countries, but the effect of which was to disturb and seriously interfere with the efficient working of part of a telephonic system owned by the plaintiffs by interfering with the telephonic current. Different systems might have been adopted by the plaintiffs or defendants so as to obviate the disturbance.

Held, that an action for injunction or damages was not maintainable, as the disturbance caused to other systems must have been within the contemplation of the Legislature in sanctioning the use of electrical traction power on the tramway.

The court will not hold a railway or other company liable for the consequences of acts done under statutory powers merely because it has not adopted the latest scientific invention.

As a general rule the principle of Rylands v. Fletcher, L. R. 3 H. L. 330, applies to electric currents, so that a man who has created or called into existence an electric current for his own purposes, and who discharges it into the earth beyond his control, is responsible for damage which that current does to his neighbour.—National Telephone Co. v. Baker, CH.D. KEK., J.—[1893] 2 Ch. 186; 62 L. J. Ch. 699; 68 L. T. 283.

TROVER:—

Sale of goods—Delivery to shipowner—Shipowner not to accept goods without giving a clean receipt—No Clean receipt given—Refusal to re-deliver to vendor—Subsequent acceptance by vendee and payment of vendor—Liability of shipowner.—The plaintiffs, N. & Co., engaged with the defendants, who were shipowners, for the shipment of a large quantity of oil to Montreal during the season, and it was arranged that the defendants were to receive no goods on board unless a clean receipt were given. The plaintiff A. sold fifty barrels of oil to N. & Co., and delivered them to the defendants. The defendants received the oil, but refused to give a clean receipt for it. The plaintiff A. demanded re-delivery, which the defendants refused, as other cargo had been stowed on the top of it. N. & Co. having agreed to pay A. for the oil in cash in exchange for mate's receipt, refused to pay for the fifty barrels. A. brought an action against the defendants for conversion, and afterwards amended the writ by adding N. & Co. The consignees at Montreal accepted the oil and paid N. & Co., who thereupon paid A.

Held, that A. had waived the right of saying that the property in the goods had not passed to N. & Co., and therefore, since the goods were not his at the time that re-delivery was refused, no action lay for conversion; and, further, that no action lay for his loss of interest through the delay in payment to him of the price of the goods.

TRUSTEE:—

1. Appointment—New trustees—Existing trustee—Statutory power—Beneficiaries, wishes of—Jurisdiction of court—Trustee Acts, 1850 and 1852 (13 & 14 Vict. c. 60; 15 & 16 Vict. c. 55)—Conveyancing and Law of Property Act, 1881, s. 31.—The court has no jurisdiction under the Trustee Acts to appoint new trustees of a will against the wishes of an existing sole trustee desirous of exercising his statutory power of appointing new trustees under section 31 of the Conveyancing and Law of Property Act, 1881, even though the application to the court is made by a majority of the beneficiaries, and the existing trustee has himself no beneficial interest.—In re Higginbottom, CH.D. KEK., J.—[1892] 3 Ch. 132; 62 L. J. Ch. 74; 67 L. T. 190.

2. Appointment—New trustees—Trustee dying before testator—Power of representative of trustee to appoint—Conveyancing and Law of Property Act, 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 41), s. 31, sub-sections 1, 6.—Section 31 of the Conveyancing and Law of Property Act, 1881, does not enable the personal representative of the survivor of two trustees nominated by a will, but dying before the testator, to appoint new trustees of the will.—Nicholson v. Field, CH.D. KEK., J.—[1893] 2 Ch. 511.

3. Breach of trust—Enforcement of payment of trust funds—Alleged default—Liability.—By his will a testator gave his sons in succession an option to purchase his leasehold mill property at a valuation, payable by half-yearly instalments with interest. In addition to giving a bond, the son purchasing was to execute a mortgage. The sale moneys were to be invested upon some of the investments authorized by the will, and to be disposed of as thereby directed. The investment clause gave the trustees absolute discretion to invest in the securities named therein, or in case either of the sons should elect to carry on the testator's business, then upon security of the land, mill, and premises whereon the business should be carried on. The testator died in 1875. The eldest son exercised the option. The mill property was valued at £50,000. The trustees and the son agreed for payment of this sum by half-yearly instalments of £2,000. In March, 1877, the son executed a mortgage of the mill property to secure the £50,000. It being necessary that the son should obtain some further capital, a limited liability company was incorporated in March, 1877. It agreed to buy from the son the property comprised in the mortgage at a slight advance in price, and the equity of redemption was duly assigned to it. The company having subsequently failed, it was sought to fix the trustees with liability, and to establish against them a case of wilful default. The default alleged was that they did not get from the son the instalments of £2,000 half-yearly as they became due, and also in not compelling the payment of the instalments by the company as the owners of the equity of redemption by means of a foreclosure action or the exercise of their power of sale.

Held (affirming the decision of Chitty, J., 63 L. T. N. S. 665), that the trustees had done the best they could in the embarrassing position in which the testator himself had placed them; that no imputation could be made upon their honesty; and that, therefore, they were not liable to make good the loss.

Trustees are not insurers, and if they have and retain in their hands assets which, fairly valued, are sufficient to meet legacies which are not payable, but have to be held in trust, they are justified in paying other legacies payable pari passu with them, but payable at once. And trustees making such payments are not personally responsible to the unpaid legatees if the assets retained for them should in the result prove insufficient to pay them in full.

Fenwick v. Clark, 4 De G. F. & J. 240, and Frere v. Winslow, 45 Ch. D. 249, considered.

The conduct of trustees ought to be regarded with reference to the facts and circumstances existing at the time when they had to act and which were known, or which ought to have been known, by them at that time.—In re Hurst, Addison v. Topp, C.A.—67 L. T. 96.

4. Breach of trust—Investment on mortgage—Valuation—Statute of Limitations—Measure of liability—Consent of beneficiary—Impounding interest—Trustee Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 59), ss. 4–6, 8.—The trustees of a marriage settlement, in contemplating an investment of the trust funds on mortgage, through their solicitor instructed an experienced valuer to report on the property and advise them what sum could be safely advanced upon it. With the instructions was sent a letter containing the following words: "It is desired by both mortgagor and mortgagees that as much money shall be advanced as you can advise will be properly secured."

The solicitor who so instructed the valuer on behalf of the trustees was also the solicitor of the proposed mortgagor. The valuer, in his report, valued the property at £42,750, and estimated the net rental at £1,070. He at the same time wrote a letter to the solicitor advising that £30,000 might be safely advanced. The proposed mortgagor being dissatisfied with this sum, the solicitor had an interview with the valuer, and subsequently the latter advised that £35,000 might safely be advanced upon the property, giving as the ground of his opinion the fact that he thought increased rents might be obtained. The trustees thereupon, in 1878, advanced the whole of the trust fund, consisting of a sum of £34,612, upon security of the property. The investment was made with the written consent of the tenant for life, and at his instigation and request. Interest on the mortgage was duly paid down to 1890, when it was found that the security was insufficient.

In an action brought against the surviving trustees by the tenant for life and his infant children entitled in remainder,

Held, as between the infant plaintiffs and the defendants, that the investment of the £34,612 was a breach of trust, and that the defendants were jointly and severally liable to make good the same.

Held, that £26,000 was the largest sum which might properly have been advanced, within the meaning of section 5 of the Trustee Act, 1888; but

Held, as between the tenant for life and the defendants, that his right of action was barred by section 8 of the Trustee Act, 1888, and that his life interest in the whole trust estate must be impounded by way of indemnity to the defendants.—In re Somerset, Somerset v. Earl Poulett, CH.D. KEK., J. 536—62 L. J. Ch. 720; 68 L. T. 613.

5. Breach of trust—Liability of deceased trustee for breach of trust committed after his death.—The estate of a deceased trustee is not liable for a breach of trust committed after his death where he has left the trust funds in a proper state of investment at his death.—In re Palk, In re Drake, Chamberlain v. Drake, CH.D. NOR., J. 28.

6. Breach of trust—Primary and secondary liability—Solicitor—Constructive trustees.—As between persons appointed trustees and persons who have become constructive trustees of an estate, there is no primary and secondary liability in respect of a breach of trust, but all are equally liable.

In an action by cestuis que trust against their trustees in respect of certain alleged breaches of trust, the solicitors of the trustees were joined as defendants. In the statement of claim it was alleged in substance that the solicitors had become constructive trustees. Upon motion to dismiss the action as against the solicitors, Held, that, if the allegations were true, the solicitors and the trustees would be equally liable for breaches of trust, and that the action must be allowed to proceed.

Maw v. Pearson, 28 Beav. 196, considered and distinguished.—Cowper v. Stoneham, CH.D. STI., J.—68 L. T. 18.

7. Breach of trust—Statute of Limitations—Trustee Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 59), s. 8.—A testatrix gave all her residuary estate to two trustees in trust for an infant, to be paid to him at twenty-one. He attained twenty-one in 1880. In 1892 he took out a summons against the two trustees for administration of testatrix's estate. Only one of the defendants, who had been acting trustee, appeared. Plaintiff made no allegation of fraud. There was no evidence that defendant still retained any part of the trust funds, or had converted them to his own use. Defendant admitted that he had rendered no account to the plaintiff, but deposed that he had spent all the trust funds in maintaining the plaintiff during his infancy.

Held, that the Trustee Act, 1888, s. 8, applied, and that the summons must be dismissed, but, under the circumstances, without costs.—In re Page, Jones v. Morgan, CH.D. NOR., J. 357—[1893] 1 Ch. 304; 62 L. J. Ch. 592.

8. Breach of trust—Statute of Limitations—Trustee Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 59), s. 8.—M. was trustee under a will of certain funds which he was empowered to invest in real securities in England or Wales. He and his co-trustee, in March, 1878, advanced £10,000, part of the funds, upon mortgage of hop and fruit gardens in Kent, and the money was paid to the credit of the account of the mortgagor, which was overdrawn to more than that amount, at a bank in which M. was a partner. The investment turned out valueless, and this action was brought on the 20th of August, 1890, by a beneficiary under the will, alleging that M. had been guilty of fraudulent breach of trust.

Held, that section 8 of the Trustee Act, 1888, applied and barred the action, which could not be treated as an action to recover the proceeds of trust property "received by the trustee and converted to his use" within the meaning of sub-section 1 of section 8 of the Act, and so be excepted from the operation of the Statute of Limitations.—In re Gurney, Mason v. Mercer, CH.D. ROM., J. 443—[1893] 1 Ch. 590; 68 L. T. 289.

9. Costs—Breach of trust—Action against trustee—Costs, charges, and expenses subsequent to judgment in action.—The court will go as far as it can to give trustees their costs, charges, and expenses properly incurred. But where a trustee's own misconduct has occasioned the proceedings through which costs subsequent to judgment have been incurred, the costs are in the discretion of the court, and will not ordinarily be allowed to him.

10. Investments — "Securities" — Shares in joint-stock bank not fully paid up.—A direction to executors to invest "in such securities as they may think proper" does not authorize the purchase of shares not fully paid up in a joint-stock banking company with limited liability.—Murphy v. Doyle, C.A. (Ir.)—29 L. R. Ir. 333.

11. Liability—Acceptance of trust—Disclaimer—Signing receipt for legacy—Loss of trust fund.—By her will a testatrix, who died in 1866, directed her executors to pay to A. and B. a certain sum of money to be held in trust for the plaintiff, who was at that time an infant. A. and B. gave to the executors of the will a receipt for the legacy on an Inland Revenue form for presentation to the Inland Revenue authorities. The legacy was paid to A. and B. by a crossed cheque drawn in favour of both of them, but whether payable "to order" or to bearer" was not in evidence, nor was there any evidence that either of them had indorsed the cheque. In 1876 A., who was the father of the plaintiff, died in insolvent circumstances. In 1881 B. executed a deed-poll purporting to disclaim the trusts of the will. In 1892 the plaintiff for the first time became aware of the legacy, and called upon B. to account for the same. B. alleged that he had never accepted the trusts of the will, and that the receipt given by him was not intended to operate as an acceptance of the trusts, and that he had never received nor in any way dealt with the legacy.

Held, that, although the rule was that a trustee ought to execute a disclaimer without delay, yet there was no rule that a disclaimer must be executed within any particular time; that the evidence showed that B. did not mean to accept the trust, notwithstanding the fact that he signed the legacy duty receipt as well as A.; and that, although it was not necessary for B. to have done that if he were not a trustee, yet the court would be straining matters too far if it were to hold that that act alone constituted B. a trustee.—Jago v. Jago, CH.D. WRI., J.—68 L. T. 654.

12. Liability—Part of trust property stolen by his servant—Case of trustee remunerated for his services.—A trustee, remunerated for his services, employed a servant for the purposes of the trust, carefully selected and with a good character from his last employer, and properly intrusted to him the custody of the trust property, there being no negligence on the part of the trustee. The servant stole part of the property.

Held, that the trustee was not liable for the loss thereby occasioned to the trust estate.

Semble, the fact that a trustee is remunerated for his services does not add to his liability as trustee.—Jobson v. Palmer, CH.D. ROM., J. 264—[1893] 1 Ch. 71; 62 L. J. Ch. 180; 67 L. T. 797.

13. Vesting order—Service of petition on adult heir of sole trustee residing abroad—Trustee Act, 1850 (13 & 14 Vict. c. 60), s. 9.—The trustees of a will conveyed all their beneficial interest in a certain property to a purchaser. The legal estate in the property was in the heir, who was abroad, of a deceased sole trustee to whom the legal estate had been conveyed to prevent merger. On petition for a vesting order, Held, that, under the circumstances, service of the petition on the heir might be dispensed with.—In re Stanley's Trusts, CH.D. NOR., J. 343—62 L. J. Ch. 469; 68 L. T. 197.

14. Vesting order—Stock—Trustee Act, 1850 (13 & 14 Vict. c. 60), ss. 2, 35—Trustee Extension Act, 1852 (15 & 16 Vict. c. 55), s. 6.—In an order made under section 35 of the Trustee Act, 1850, and section 6 of the Trustee Extension Act, 1852, vesting the "right to call for a transfer of and to transfer" stock, in new trustees, it is not obligatory to insert the name of any transferee in the order, nor is there any general rule that the words "to any purchaser or purchasers" should be added; the insertion or omission of these words is a matter of discretion for the judge who makes the order.

In re Peacock, 14 Ch. D. 212, explained.

The word "stock," as defined in section 2 of the Trustee Act, 1850, comprises shares not fully paid up in any company or society.—In re New Zealand Trust and Loan Co., C.A. 457—[1893] 1 Ch. 403; 62 L. J. Ch. 262; 68 L. T. 593.

15. Vesting order—Government stock—Form of vesting order—Lunacy Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 5), s. 136, sub-sections 2, 5, 6; s. 139.—Upon the appointment of new trustees by the court the common form of vesting order in the case of Government stock is to be adhered to, which vests in the trustees the right to call for the transfer of the same, and to receive the dividends due and to accrue due thereon, and which further directs the trustees to transfer the same "into their own names," but if in any particular case a judge thinks it proper to depart from the usual form, and to make a special order, it is perfectly competent for him to do so.

In re New Zealand Trust and Loan Co., 41 W. R. 457, [1893] 1 Ch. 403, explained.—In re Gregson, LUN. 641—62 L. J. Ch. 764; 69 L. T. 73.

16. Vesting order—Government stock—Form of vesting order—Trustee Acts.—This was a petition for the appointment of new trustees of a will, and for an order vesting in the new trustees a sum of Consols.

Held (differing from In re New Zealand Trust and Loan Co., 41 W. R. 457, [1893] 1 Ch. 403), that the proper form of order should, after appointing the new trustees, go on to direct the trustees to transfer the stock into their own names.

Held, that that form, being established for the protection of the cestuis que trust, and being the practice of the Bank of England, should be maintained.—In re Joliffe's Trusts, CH D. KEK., J.—68 L. T. 747.

17. Vesting order—Death of surviving trustee resident out of jurisdiction—Administration in England—New trustees—Trustee Act, 1850 (13 & 14 Vict. c. 60), s. 25.—The surviving trustee of a marriage settlement resided and died out of the jurisdiction, intestate. Letters of administration to his estate were granted in England to a person resident there. New trustees were duly appointed under the provisions of the settlement. Certain stock was standing in the names of the deceased trustees in the books of the Bank of Ireland.

The court made an order, on the application of the new trustees, that the stock, and the right to call for a transfer, should vest in them.—In re Ewing's Trusts, M.R. (Ir.)—29 L. R. Ir. 449.

UNDUE INFLUENCE:—

1. Confidential relationship—Gift inter vivos—Setting aside.—L., a man of no means, and a member of a religious sect known as Exclusive Brethren, was employed as travelling companion to M., an epileptic subject of large fortune. While so employed he converted M. to his own religious views, and in consequence of such conversion M. left his home, and took up his residence with L., with whom he continued to reside in great seclusion for the last seven years of his life. During this period M., who was in a low and morbid condition, consulted L. on spiritual and temporal matters, allowed him to regulate his diet and his medicine, and placed nearly the whole of his fortune at his disposal. L. endeavoured to suppress all evidence of his monetary dealings with M. The aggregate amount obtained by L. from M. was £140,000.

Held, that the money had been obtained by the actual exercise of undue influence under the guise of religion, and ought to be refunded.

Semble, the money could be recovered also on the ground of confidential relationship.—Morley v. Loughnan, CH.D. WRI., J.—[1893] 1 Ch. 736; 62 L. J. Ch. 515; 68 L. T. 619.

2. Reversionary interest—Unconscionable bargain—31 & 32 Vict. c. 4, s. 1.—The plaintiff was entitled to a reversionary interest in £2,100 invested on mortgages, subject to a life estate of a lady aged sixty-three. The plaintiff had no other means except her interest in the reversion. She married in 1888, and her husband had no means and was without employment. In 1889 the plaintiff mortgaged the reversion for £400, at £7 per cent. interest, and borrowed two other sums of £50 and £52 10s., for which she gave equitable charges on the fund. In January, 1890, the plaintiff was in delicate health, and she and her husband owed an hotel bill and had no money to pay it. She had been trying to sell the reversion through a solicitor. She then executed a mortgage of the reversionary interest to the defendant, a moneylender, to secure £100 advanced at £60 per cent. interest. The deed was approved by a solicitor on behalf of the plaintiff, and acknowledged before a commissioner.

Held, affirming the decision of the Vice-Chancellor, that the mortgage was, under the circumstances, a hard and unconscionable bargain, and should stand security for all sums advanced only with interest at £5 per cent.—Rae v. Joyce, C.A. (Ir.)—29 L. R. Ir. 500.

VENDOR and PURCHASER:—

1. Conditions of sale—Building scheme—Sale by auction in lots—Restrictive conditions—Subsequent sale of unsold lots—Retainer of adjoining land by vendor—Liability of vendor in respect of restrictive conditions.—A land company put up for sale by auction in lots property which was described as "a small freehold estate divided into twenty-two convenient lots of sound building sites." The particulars specified the dimensions of the lots, and had a plan annexed which showed the position and boundaries of such lots, and also the existence of houses on adjoining land of the company. The conditions of sale provided that each purchaser was to covenant that no buildings other than dwelling-houses should be erected upon the land purchased by him; that every such dwelling-house should cost not less than £250, and that the building line as shown upon the said plan in respect of the other lands of the vendors should be observed. The property put up for sale in lots formed only a portion of the estate of the vendors, which was of considerable extent. At the auction some only of the lots were sold. A. purchased one lot and accepted the title. Before the completion of the purchase, however, the vendors claimed the right to sell the remainder of the lots free from the restrictive conditions, and A. then took out a summons under the Vendor and Purchaser Act, 1874, in substance to determine the question of right raised by the vendors, but in form to settle the terms of the covenants to be contained in the conveyance to him.

Held, that A. was entitled to the benefit of the contract by the vendors implied in the conditions of sale that they would, as to lots unsold at the auction, observe stipulations similar to those which the purchasers of those lots, had they been sold, would have been bound to covenant to observe; and that the conveyance to him ought to contain an expression of such an obligation on the vendors.—In re Birmingham and District Land Co. and Allday, CH.D. STI., J. 189—[1893] 1 Ch. 342; 62 L. J. Ch. 90; 67 L. T. 850.

2. Conditions of sale—Commencement of title—Contract for sale of fee—Condition precluding purchaser from objecting by reason of non-registration of vesting order of Land Commission—Validity of contract—Local Registration of Title (Ireland) Act, 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 66), ss. 22, 23, 25.—Lands were put up for sale under particulars which described them as held in fee subject to a terminable annuity payable to the Irish Land Commission. The conditions of sale stated that the title should commence with a vesting order of the Irish Land Commission dated the 31st of May, 1892, and that the purchaser should not be entitled to inquire into, or make any objection or requisition in respect of any prior title, but should conclusively assume that the order vested the property in the vendor for an estate in fee subject only to the annuity; that the property was subject to the provisions of the Local Registration of Title (Ireland) Act, 1891, that the vesting order was retained in the custody of the Irish Land Commission, and had not yet been registered under the provisions of the Act, nor in the Registry of Deeds, but that the purchaser should not make any objection, by reason of such non-registration, nor should he require the said vesting order or the conveyance to him to be registered, nor should the completion of the purchase be delayed with a view to such registration. The purchaser required the title of the vendor to be registered under the Act (section 28), contending that, as until this was done, he acquired no estate in the land (section 25), the condition was repugnant to the contract and void.

Held, that the contract was not void, and was binding on the purchaser.—In re Furlong and Bogan's Contract, V.C. (Ir.)—31 L. R. Ir. 191.

3. Contract—Ambiguity—Mistake—Variation between particulars and plan—Oral correction—Authority of agent—Conveyance—Rectification.—Trustees for sale put certain property, including two freehold houses, into the hands of an auctioneer to be sold. The property for sale comprised a scullery so situated that it might have belonged to either of the two houses. The auctioneer prepared a plan which clearly showed the scullery as part of Lot 2, but by some inadvertence it was in the particulars of sale clearly included in Lot 3. The person who subsequently became the purchaser of Lot 2, having before the sale called the auctioneer's attention to the discrepancy, was informed by the latter that the plan was correct, and that the scullery was included in Lot 2. He also orally pointed out the mistake at the sale, and informed those present that the scullery formed part of Lot 2. Lot 2 was sold, but Lot 3 was not sold. The conveyance of Lot 2 was made, after an interview on the subject between the solicitors of the vendors and of the purchaser, so as expressly to comprise the scullery. The purchaser, immediately after the execution of the conveyance, mortgaged Lot 2.

In an action by the vendors for rectification of the conveyance, Held, that under the circumstances no case for rectification had been made out.—Ellis v. Hills, CH.D. ROM., J.—67 L. T. 287.

4. Contract—Delay in completion—Wilful default of vendor—Interest—Execution of conveyance by attorney of trustee—Production of deed by solicitor appointed by the attorney—Receipt for purchase-money—Conveyancing and Law of Property Act, 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 41), s. 56—Trustee Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 59), s. 2 (1).—A contract for the sale of real property provided that, "if from any cause whatever, other than the wilful default of the vendors, any purchase shall not be completed on the said 10th of November next, the purchaser shall pay interest on the remainder of his purchase-money . . . . at the rate of £5 per cent. per annum from that day until the purchase shall be completed." At the date of the contract the vendors' solicitors were aware that one of the persons whose concurrence in the conveyance was necessary, a trustee mortgagee, was abroad, but that he had left a power of attorney under which the conveyance could be executed by his attorney. The purchaser refused to accept a conveyance executed by the attorney and produced by the vendors' solicitors, on the ground that he had notice of the trust, and that the receipt of the trustee for the purchase-moneys was necessary in order to give a valid discharge; and considerable delay was thereby caused in the completion of the purchase. The vendors claimed interest under the above clause of the contract of sale for the period from the day fixed for completion to the actual completion of the purchase.

Held, that, under section 56 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, the person producing a deed containing a receipt for the purchase-money must be the solicitor acting for the party signing the receipt; that the attorney could not appoint a solicitor to act for the absent trustee so as to produce the deed executed by the attorney, and receive the purchase-money, since that was a double delegation of the powers of the trustee; and that the vendors had been guilty of wilful default in procuring the proper execution of the conveyance, and that they were not entitled to interest under the contract of sale.—In re Hetling and Merton's Contract, CH.D. KEK., J.—68 L. T. 749.

5. Contract—Open contract—Form of conveyance—General words—Right of way—Reputed occupied or enjoyed—No special provision in contract—Right to limit general words—Conveyancing Act, 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 41), s. 6 (1)(2)(4).—Under an open contract for the sale of land with the appurtenances, the purchaser is only entitled to have such general words expressed or implied in his conveyance as he would have been entitled to before the Conveyancing Act, 1881, came into operation; and if the general words implied by section 6 of that Act are more extensive, the vendor is entitled to limit them accordingly.

Section 6 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, does not apply to contracts.—In re Peck and the London School Board, CH.D. CHL., J. 388—[1893] 2 Ch. 315; 62 L. J. Ch. 598; 68 L. T. 847.

6. Covenant—Building estate—Restrictive covenant—New building—Consent of original owner, "his heirs or assigns"—Meaning of "assigns."—In the conveyances and leases of portions of an estate which was being gradually disposed of in lots for building purposes, certain forms of restrictive covenants were inserted. In 1877 R. became the purchaser of a house and garden on the estate, and carried on a school there. By his deed of conveyance R. covenanted with G. D. (the owner of the estate), his heirs and assigns, to the extent that such covenant should run with the land, that he, R., would not "without the consent of the said G. D., his heirs or assigns," make any alteration in the messuage, or erect on the land any other messuage or building, wall, or fence, or do or suffer anything to be done which might be a nuisance, annoyance, or disturbance to G. D., his heirs or assigns, or his or their tenants in the neighbourhood. In 1883 an adjoining house and garden were conveyed to E. by a previous purchaser from G. D., and subject to a similar restrictive covenant. In 1890 R. erected a new schoolroom, with the consent of the successor in title of G. D. E. then brought an action against R. claiming an injunction in respect of an alleged nuisance and annoyance from the boys in the school (which he failed to prove), and also in respect of the new building erected without his consent as an "assign" of G. D.

Held, that, even if E. could enforce the covenant at all, there had been no breach of it, as the words "consent of G. D., his heirs or assigns," meant the consent of the owner for the time being of the estate in its broad and popular sense, and not of every subsequent lessee or purchaser of a plot.—Everett v. Remington, CH.D. ROM., J.—[1892] 3 Ch. 148; 61 L. J. Ch. 574; 67 L. T. 80.

7. Covenant—Building estate—Plots sold by reference to plan—Printed form of agreement — Restrictive covenants, whether implied as governing the whole estate.—When plots forming part of a building estate are purchased, having been selected by reference to a plan showing a number of building plots with a house on each, and a printed form of contract for sale containing restrictive covenants is used, but with written variations in the purchaser's particular case, the purchaser is not justified in assuming the existence of a building scheme with restrictive covenants like his own binding on all the other plots.

The plaintiffs bought at a fee farm rent several plots, part of a building estate, having been shown a plan of the various plots, each with a house upon it. In the course of the negotiations they were informed by the vendors that the houses to be placed on the plots were to be of a value of not less than £800 each, and that on certain plots a stable might also be erected. They signed a printed form of agreement, with written variations, one of the printed clauses being to the effect that a purchaser should not place on his plot any building other than a dwelling-house of not less than £800 value, except a greenhouse.

The plaintiffs, having built a dwelling-house of the required value on each of their plots, obtained conveyances of their plots, whereby they covenanted not to alter the external elevation of any of their dwelling-houses, and not to place any other building on any of their plots except a greenhouse.

The defendant, one of the vendors, subsequently acquired the interest of his co-vendor in some other plots, facing those of the plaintiffs, and erected thereon a billiard room, conservatory, and stables for the use of his own house. He did not thereby commit a breach of any covenant contained in the conveyance to him.

Held, that the plaintiffs had no right to assume, when they purchased their plots, the existence of a building scheme, with restrictive covenants similar to their own, binding on every plot, and had no right of action against the defendant in respect of the buildings erected by him.—Tucker v. Vowles, CH.D. ROM., J. 156—[1893] 1 Ch. 195; 62 L. J. Ch. 172; 67 L. T. 763.

8. Covenant—Building estate—Scheme—Rights of purchasers inter se—Injunction against departure from scheme.—A purchaser of two residential lots of building land, part of a building scheme according to a plan of which the purchaser had notice when he bought the lots, and a piece of land marked "lodge" on the plan (being a piece of land next a gate at the entrance to a private road on which the building lots were situated), was restrained by injunction from building cottages on the piece of land marked "lodge" on the plan, or from using the site for any purpose inconsistent with the scheme as disclosed by the plan.—Tindall v. Castle, CH.D. NOR., J.—62 L. J. Ch. 555.

9. Covenant—Implied covenant—Title—"Beneficial owner"—Fraud of third party—Conveyancing and Law of Property Act, 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 41), s. 7 (1) A.—In 1885 the defendant, being tenant for life of certain land, granted to B. a lease for ninety-nine years. B. executed three mortgages, by way of sub-demise, of the land so leased to him. In June, 1887, B., as beneficial owner, surrendered the term to the defendant for valuable consideration, without disclosing the mortgages. A few days later the defendant, "as beneficial owner," conveyed the land to B. in fee. B. subsequently, as beneficial owner, conveyed to the plaintiff in fee for valuable consideration, without disclosing the existence of the mortgages. In an action by the plaintiff against the defendant for breach of the covenant for title implied by virtue of section 7 (1) A of the Conveyancing and Law of Property Act, 1881, by reason of his conveyance to B. "as beneficial owner,"

Held, that the existence of the mortgages created by B., which constituted a defect in the defendant's title, arose from an act done by the defendant to which his implied covenant extended, and that he had, therefore, committed a breach of such covenant; and that, inasmuch as the covenant was one which ran with the land, and the plaintiff sued as assignee of the land in respect of privity of estate as distinguished from privity of contract, the defendant could not successfully set up the fraud of B., by which the breach had been induced, as an answer to the plaintiff's claim.

Decision of Romer, J., reversed—David v. Sabin, C.A. 398—[1893] 1 Ch. 523; 62 L. J. Ch. 347; 68 L. T. 237.

10. Covenant—Square—Covenant to keep "open and unbuilt upon"—Public urinal—Breach of covenant.—By the original conveyance in 1876, under which the plaintiffs held a certain house, all mines and minerals thereunder, and all powers and privileges for working the same, were reserved to the defendants, the grantors; and it contained a covenant by the defendants that "the garden or open space" in the centre of the square in which the house was erected should for ever thereafter be "kept open and unbuilt upon." The garden was surrounded by railings and was unbuilt upon. The plaintiffs had no right to use the surface of the garden. The square being on a slope the garden was supported at the lower end by a retaining wall, and the defendants had commenced excavating about forty-six square yards at this end of the garden, and erecting a urinal of the improved modern kind, with an entrance through the retaining wall, the space so excavated being intended to be covered with a cemented and glazed roof, projecting very slightly, if at all, above the adjoining surface of the garden. The plaintiffs thereupon brought an action and then moved for an interim injunction to restrain the defendants from proceeding with the works.

Held, that the object of the covenant was, that the garden or open space in the centre of the square should for ever be kept open and unbuilt upon, so as to allow of the free access of light and air; that the same would not be interfered with by what the defendants proposed to erect; and that therefore the plaintiffs were not entitled to an injunction.—Graham v. Mayor, &c., of Newcastle-upon-Tyne, C.A.—67 L. T. 790.

11. Equity of redemption, sale of—Conveyance subject to mortgage—Implied contract to idemnify.—On a conveyance for value of lands subject to a mortgage, and expressed to be so conveyed, there is, in the absence of express agreement, an undertaking implied by law on the part of the purchaser to indemnify the vendor against personal liability on the mortgage.

This implication of law is not prevented from arising by reason of the deed of conveyance containing an express provision by which the lands conveyed are made primarily liable to the mortgage in exoneration of other lands of the vendor affected by it.—Adair v. Carden, M.R. (Ir.)—29 L. R. Ir. 469.

12. Sale of judicial tenancy (Ireland)—Failure of vendor to deliver abstract of title—Return of deposit—Interest—Vendor and Purchaser Act, 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 78), s. 9.—The conditions of sale by auction of a judicial tenancy provided that the order of the Land Commission fixing the rent should be accepted as sufficient evidence of the existence of the judicial tenancy. No mention was made of an abstract of title; but it was provided that the purchaser should make his requisitions on the title, if any, within four days after the sale. The vendor refused to deliver an abstract, and upon the purchaser declining to proceed without it, served a notice to forfeit the deposit and rescind the sale.

Held, that the conditions of sale did not relieve the vendor from the obligation to deliver an abstract, and the purchaser was entitled to the return of the deposit with interest and to the costs of investigating title, and to have these sums charged on the vendor's interest in the lands.—In re Priestley and Davidson's Contract, M.R. (Ir.)—31 L. R. Ir. 122.

13. Settlement—Power of sale by trustees, with consent of tenant for life—Incumbrances on life estate—Bankruptcy of tenant for life—Concurrence of trustee in bankruptcy and incumbrancers.—The trustees of a settlement were empowered to sell the property comprised therein, with the consent in writing of the tenant for life. They sold the property at a public auction. The tenant for life was bankrupt, and had incumbered his life estate. The trustees refused to procure any consent but that of the tenant for life.

Held, that the concurrence of the incumbrancers and the assignees in bankruptcy of the tenant for life was essential in order to effect the sale.—In re Bedingfield, Norris, and Herring's Contract, CH.D. NOR., J. 413—[1893] 2 Ch. 332; 62 L. J. Ch. 430; 68 L. T. 634.

14. Specific performance—Declaration of lien—Rescission.—A vendor having obtained judgment for specific performance of an agreement for sale and a declaration of lien, with liberty to apply,

On motion for rescission in lieu of enforcing the lien,

Held, that the agreement might be rescinded.

Henty v. Schroeder, 27 W. R. 833, 12 Ch. D. 666, distinguished.—Baker v. Williams, CH.D. NOR., J. 375—62 L. J. Ch. 315; 68 L. T. 634.

15. Succession duty—Sale subject to leases, but free from incumbrances—Leases at ground-rents—Duty payable in respect of increased value on determination of leases—Succession Duty Act, 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 51), ss. 2, 20.—Land subject to leases at ground-rents was sold subject to leases, but free from incumbrances, the contract making no provision as to the payment of succession duty.

Held, that the succession duty payable in respect of the increased value of the property on the determination of the leases, payment of which had been postponed in accordance with section 20 of the Succession Duty Act, 1853, must be borne by the vendors.—In re Kidd and Gibbon's Contract, CH.D. KEK., J. 507—[1893] 1 Ch. 695; 62 L. J. Ch. 436.

16. Unpaid vendor—Duty of vendor remaining in possession—Loss of tenants—Wilful default—Compensation—Specific performance.—Unpaid vendors of houses let in rooms to weekly tenants are bound, so far as they reasonably can, to keep the premises properly tenanted so long as they remain in their possession. When they know that the purchaser is confiding in them for the management of the property purchased, and cannot sue the tenants directly, if they employ a proper agent they must see that he does his duty with reasonable efficiency. If the results of the agency are unsatisfactory it is the duty of the vendors to report the same to the purchaser and consult with him as to what ought to be done.

Where on the hearing of an action for specific performance an account is ordered to be taken against the plaintiffs on the basis of wilful default, they are not precluded from showing on the inquiry by affirmative evidence that there is no real default on their part at all; but where they only rely at the inquiry on the materials before the court at the original hearing, they are not at liberty to contend on the further consideration of the action that a primâ facie case of wilful default has not been established against them.—Malone v. Henshaw, M.R. (Ir.)—29 L. R. Ir. 352.

VICTORIA, LAW of:—

1. Easement—Transfer of Land Statute—Certificates—Evidence to show abandonment.—In an action by the respondents to assert a right of way which had been granted by the appellant's predecessor by deed in 1839 over his land, and along the boundary which divided land retained by him from land conveyed to the respondent's predecessor, the appellant pleaded that it had been abandoned.

Held, that, abandonment being a question of intention, non-user by the respondent, coupled with user by the appellant for farm purposes, of portions of land, subject to the easement, when the easement was not required, could not prove an abandonment of the entire right, and were inconclusive to prove an abandonment of portions thereof.

Held, that the omission in the appellant's and respondent's certificates of title to their respective lands under the transfer of land statute to record the easement did not bar the respondent's claim or relieve the servient tenement of its liability. — James v. Stevenson and Others, P.C. — [1893] A. C. 162; 62 L. J. P. C. 51; 68 L. T. 539.

2. Local Government Act, 1874, s. 384—Compensation for damage past and future.—By the true construction of section 384 of the Local Government Act, 1874, when a ditch or drain has been made in virtue of its powers, an owner or occupier injuriously affected is entitled to compensation for damages to his land assessed once for all, present and prospective, irrespective of whether those powers have been negligently or properly exercised. —President, &c., of Colac v. Summerfield, P.C. — [1893] A. 3. Melbourne Corporation Act (14 Vict. No. 20)—Lane on private land—Rights of adjoining owners and occupiers.—Held, that when a lane set out on private land has been brought under the provisions of the Melbourne Corporation Act (14 Vict. No. 20), the Act does not confer on the adjoining owners and occupiers such a right of passage over it as precludes the owner in fee from ever resuming the control or exclusive possession of such lane.—Moubray Rowan and Hicks v. Drew, P.C.—[1893] A. WATERWORKS:—

1. Breaking up streets—Laying pipes—Notice—Plan—"Difference to be determined by two justices"—Special Act—"Extension" of works—Laying down pipes after expiration of period for completing works—Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847 (10 & 11 Vict. c. 17), ss. 28, 30, 31.—The "plan" required by section 31 of the Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847, to be furnished by a water company to the road authority before breaking up a road for the purpose of laying down a line of pipes, is a plan, not merely of the "breaking up" of the road, but also showing the mode in which the underground work is intended to be executed, so as to enable the road authority to judge whether the proposed work ought to be done without modification. If the road authority, after receiving such a plan, do not, in case of disapproval, themselves make some counter proposal, by plan or otherwise, as to the mode of carrying out the work, so as to create a "difference" to be determined by two justices under the section, the company may proceed with the work independently of the road authority.

Semble, where under a special Waterworks Act, incorporating the Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847, a water company has, within the period fixed by the special Act for the completion of the works, laid down a water main in a road according to deposited plans and sections, the company may, after the expiration of the period, lay down a second main, having regard to section 28 of the General Act, and particularly where the special Act gives them power to "extend, enlarge, or alter any of their mains or pipes at any time, and from time to time as occasion may require, for the purpose of supplying the inhabitants within the limits of the Act with water"; provided the company complies with the requirements of the special and general Acts, as to notice and otherwise, before breaking up the road for the purpose.—East Molesey Local Board v. Lambeth Waterworks Co., C.A. [1892] 3 Ch. 289; 62 L. J. Ch. 82; 67 L. T. 493.

2. Purchase of mains and pipes and fittings—Principle of valuation—Practice—Appeal—Arbitration Act, 1889 (52 & 53 Vict. c. 49), s. 19.—The Stockton and Middlesborough Corporation Waterworks Act, 1876 (39 & 40 Vict. c. ccxxx.), provides for the transfer of the undertaking of a waterworks company to the "Stockton and Middlesborough Water Board," and empowers the board to construct further works to improve the supply of water in Stockton and Middlesborough and in outlying districts. By section 4 the limits of the Act for the supply of water are to include the company's present limits and certain specified places beyond such limits, and it is provided that the board "shall, when so required by the sanitary authority of any district beyond the boundaries of the boroughs of Stockton and Middlesborough respectively, sell to such sanitary authority all mains, pipes, and fittings belonging to the board within that district . . . at a price to be fixed, in default of agreement, by arbitration, and after such sale the board shall cease to supply water within such district."

In an arbitration under the foregoing section, the arbitrator made his award in the form of a special case for the opinion of the court, in which he stated that in fixing the price of mains, pipes, and fittings (sold by the board to the sanitary authority of an outlying district) at a specified sum, he took into consideration the loss of revenue earned by the board by the supply of water through such mains, pipes, and fittings; but if the court should be of opinion that this basis of calculation was wrong, he fixed this price at a lower figure.

Held, first, that an appeal lay from the judgment of a divisional court upon such special case to the Court of Appeal.

In re Knight and Tabernacle Permanent Building Society, 41 W. R. 35, [1892] 2 Q. B. 613, distinguished.

Secondly, that the basis of calculation adopted by the arbitrator was wrong, and that the price to be ascertained was the reasonable price of such mains, pipes, and fittings regarded as apparatus fitted in the ground and capable of earning a profit, but without any compensation to the board for the loss of the right of supplying water within the district.—In re Kirkleatham Local Board and Stockton and Middlesborough Water Board, C.A.—[1893] 1 Q. B. 375; 62 L. J. Q. B. 180; 67 L. T. 811.

WAY:—

1. Grant of right of way—Access to road—Abandonment of easement.—B. and T. were owners of adjoining lands, B. having a private right of way over T.'s land. In 1801, when B. was selling his land to X., the plaintiff's predecessor, it was agreed that B. should have the use of a new private road which T. had lately made on his land instead of the old way. That agreement was embodied in the conveyance made by B. to X., to which T. was for this purpose a party. B. thereby released his old right of way to T., who granted the new way to X. in these words, "to and from every or any part of the pieces or parcels of land hereinbefore described," thus giving to X. a right to come out upon the new road at any point at which he could get access to it. The new road did not exactly skirt the boundary of that part of X.'s land now held by the plaintiff, there being at that part an intervening strip of T.'s land varying in width.

X. made a gateway opening out of that part of his land now held by the plaintiff, and a track from it to the new road over the intervening strip, and that gateway and track had been used from the plaintiff's land ever since.

The plaintiff's land had for some years been fenced in along the intervening strip, in which the gateway was the only opening. Neither the plaintiff nor any of his predecessors had occasion to open out any other gate or to make any other track into the road. The defendant, who represented T., apprehending, however, that an attempt might be made to open out another gate, erected posts and rails along the intervening strip in such a manner as to prevent exit from the plaintiff's land at any but the accustomed place.

Held, that, in the absence of anything in the original grant expressly limiting the grantee to one line of access, or to access only at the points, if any, where his land actually adjoined the new way, and of anything to show that the right as claimed was unreasonable or destructive of the object of the grant, no obligation to elect one particular line of access could be implied.

Held, also, that there had been no manifestation of intention to abandon the easement.

Roberts v. Karr, 1 Taunt. 495, followed.—Cooke v. Ingram, CH.D. WRI., J.—68 L. T. 671.

2. Prescription—Lost grant—Tenants of common landlord—Questions for jury.—A. and B. were tenants from year to year of a common landlord. A. sued B. for obstructing a right of way. At the trial the judge, having explained to the jury the nature of evidence which would justify the presumption of a lost grant, and that in his opinion twenty years' user would in this case authorize them so to presume, left to the jury the following questions, the defendant's counsel not objecting: (1) Did the plaintiff for twenty years next before this suit enjoy, as of right and without interruption, the way claimed? Answer—Yes. (2) Did he so enjoy it for the forty years next before this suit? Answer—No. On motion to set aside the judgment entered for the plaintiff,

Held, that, although as a general rule it is a more satisfactory course to leave the question of lost grant expressly to the jury, the defendant was precluded, by the course adopted by him at the trial, and in the absence of specific objection and requisition, from relying, as ground for setting aside the verdict and judgment, upon the form in which the first question was left to the jury, and that the judgment should therefore stand.

Semble, there is no objection to presuming a lost grant of a right of way as between tenants from year to year of a common landlord upon sufficient proof of user.—O'Kane v. O'Kane, Q.B.D. (Ir.)—30 L. R. Ir. 489.

WILL:—

ANNUITY—

1. Charge on estate—Devise of estate in settlement subject to charge—Charge on corpus or income—Annuity in arrear—Mortgage or sale of settled estate to meet annuity.—The testator, by a codicil to his will, devised certain yearly rent-charges to his trustees to be paid to certain persons, and subject to and charged therewith he devised an estate to certain persons for life, with remainders over. The annuities having fallen into arrears, and the rents of the estate being insufficient to meet them,

Held, that they must be paid by a sale or mortgage of the settled estate.—In re Tucker, Tucker v. Tucker, CH.D. NOR., J. 505—[1893] 2 Ch. 323; 62 L. J. Ch. 442; 69 L. T. 85.

2. Gift until marriage—Limitation or condition subsequent — Succession duty — Legacy — Devise of residue.—A testatrix by her will bequeathed an annuity of £50 a year to each of the children of her deceased brother, and directed that the same should be payable from her decease for their respective lives or until any of them should marry, and that on the death or marriage of any the annuity to such child should cease and determine. There was no gift over in the event of such death or marriage. One of the children married in the lifetime of the testatrix, but after the date of the will. His wife was still living.

Held, that the proviso determining the annuities on death or marriage was a limitation, and not a condition subsequent or defeasance, and that the child so married had forfeited his annuity.

The same principles as to forfeiture apply in the case of a legatee who marries in the lifetime of the testator, but after the date of the will, as of one who is unmarried at the testator's death, but afterwards marries.

The testatrix devised a freehold house to trustees in trust for E. for life, with remainder over, and then devised all the residue of her property, real and personal, to trustees upon trust to convert it, and after payment of debts, &c., to pay all legacy and succession duty payable upon each and every of the legacies, and then to invest the surplus in lands and hereditaments, and to hold the same upon the same trusts as the house.

Held, that succession duty in respect of the life interest of E. was not payable out of the residuary estate.—In re King's Trusts, M.R. (Ir.)—29 L. R. Ir. 401.

3. Real or personal estate—Bequest to legatee and executors of annuity charged on renewable leaseholds—Subsequent grant of lands in perpetuity—Death of legatee intestate.—Testatrix bequeathed an annuity to E., her executors, administrators, and assigns, to be charged upon lands which were then held for years with a covenant for renewal. After the death of the testatrix a perpetuity grant of the lands was made to her executors. Subsequently E. died intestate.

Held, that the annuity formed part of E.'s personal estate.—Martin v. Haynes, V.C. (Ir.)—29 L. R. Ir. 416.

CHARGE OF DEBTS—

4. Exoneration—Real Estate Charges Act, 1854 (Locke King's Act) (17 & 18 Vict. c. 113)—"Contrary intention"—Intention—Evidence by will and subsequent deeds.—A testator, by his will, after reciting that it was probable that he might acquire the absolute interest in reversion in a sum of Consols, subject to preceding life estates, under some arrangement by virtue whereof he would obtain a transfer of the Consols to himself, upon his charging his real estate with an annual sum equal to the dividends arising from the Consols, devised his real estate, subject to any charge or charges that he might have made under the arrangement before referred to, for the payment of an annual sum equal to the dividends arising from the Consols, to certain uses, and disposed of his residuary personal estate in another way. The testator subsequently acquired the reversionary interest, and an arrangement was carried out under which the Consols were transferred to him, and he conveyed to the trustees, by whom the Consols were previously held, his real estate by way of mortgage for securing the re-transfer of the Consols at the end of six months, and payment in the meantime of interest equal to the dividends thereon; and by a contemporaneous deed, reciting that the transfer of the Consols to the testator had been made upon an agreement for the re-transfer thereof "in case such re-transfer should ever be required," the trustees and the tenants for life covenanted with the testator that if he punctually paid the interest they would not, during the lives of the tenants for life, require the re-transfer unless required for some purpose connected with the estate of which the Consols originally formed a part. The testator subsequently made a codicil to his will, but he did not therein refer to the above-mentioned transactions. The interest on the mortgage was punctually paid, and the re-transfer of the Consols was never required.

On the death of the surviving tenant for life, who survived the testator, the legatees of the residuary personal estate claimed that the amount secured by the mortgage was chargeable on the real estate in their favour.

Held, that upon the will and subsequent deeds there was sufficient evidence of a "contrary intention" within the meaning of the statute 17 & 18 Vict. c. 113, and that the real estate, in the events which had happened, was exonerated from payment of the mortgage debt.—In re Campbell, Campbell v. Campbell, CH.D. KEK., J.—[1893] 2 Ch. 206; 62 L. J. Ch. 594; 68 L. T. 851.

5. Payment of debts out of real estate—Debtor and creditor—11 Geo. 4 and 1 Will. 4, c. 47.—Debts or liabilities in the nature of debts provided for by the Act 11 Geo. 4 and 1 Will. 4, c. 47 are debts or liabilities which accrued in the lifetime of the obligor or covenantor.

Therefore, where the assignee of a lessor sued the devisee of the lessee for rent becoming due after the lessee's death,

Held, that the action was not maintainable.—M'Carthy v. Clerke, EX.D. (Ir.)—32 L. R. Ir. 75.

CHILDREN—

6. Lapse—Children as a class—Issue taking by substitution—Wills Act (1 Vict. c. 26), s. 33.—The 33rd section of the Wills Act, preventing lapse in case of gifts to a child or other issue of the testator, does not apply where the devise or bequest is to children as a class.

The principle is, that the section leaves the construction of class gifts unaltered, and that the gifts are still to be read as gifts to those only who survive, and not as gifts to the possible members of the class who die in the lifetime of the testator; and that the gift in regard to those children who so die is not to be treated as a gift to individuals.

Where G., a possible member of such a class of children, died in the testator's lifetime, leaving issue that survived the testator, and there was never, in fact, any other possible member,

Held, in conformity with the above principle, that the 33rd section did not apply.

Olney v. Bates, 3 W. R. 606, 3 Dr. 319, and Browne v. Hammond, Johns. 210, 7 W. R. Dig. 101, considered and followed.—In re Harvey, Harvey v. Gillow, CH.D. CHI., J. 293—[1893] 1 Ch. 567; 62 L. J. Ch. 328; 68 L. T. 562.

7. Life estates—Remainder to trustee—Trust for sale and division among a class—Revocation of life estates—Ascertainment of class—Acceleration.—A testator devised a house to G. T. J. for life, and after his death to E. J. for life, and after the death of the survivor to a trustee upon trust to sell and hold the proceeds in trust for his children then living, and issue then living of any deceased child or children, in substitution for their parent or parents, in equal proportions. The testator revoked the devises to G. T. J. and E. J. for life. G. T. J. and E. J. survived the testator.

Held, that the devise to the trustee took effect immediately upon the death of the testator, and that thereupon the trust for sale arose.

Held, also that the time for ascertaining the class to take under the trust in favour of the children and issue of any deceased child or children was when the trust for sale arose, and not the date of the death of the survivor of G. T. J. and E. J.—In re Johnson, Danily v. Johnson, CH.D. STI., J.—68 L. T. 20.

8. Residuary gift—Children to attain twenty-one—Period of distribution—Ascertainment of class.—A testator directed that all his property should be sold, the proceeds to be invested and interest to accumulate; and after paying all legal demands the residue to remain until the children of A. by his wife B. should arrive at the age of twenty-one years each, then the whole to be divided equally between them. There was a gift over in the event of none of the children attaining twenty-one.

Held, to be a gift for the benefit of all the children of A. and B., born or to be born, and not to be distributable until all such children attained twenty-one. There were three children of the marriage living, of whom two had attained twenty-one. A. and B. were still living, the wife being forty-two years of age. An application was made on behalf of the two elder children for the payment to each of them of one-third of the fund representing the testator's estate.

Held, that the application must be refused, as the class of children who were entitled could not as yet be ascertained and the period of distribution had not arrived, but having regard to the improbability of there being any after born children, the court would order the dividends of their prospective shares respectively to be paid to the two children who had attained twenty-one on their undertaking that such shares should remain till further order as security for the benefit of future members of the class entitled, should there be any.—Pilkington v. Pilkington, M.R. (Ir.)—29 L. R. Ir. 370.

9. Specific devise of English real estate—Child legitimated by subsequent marriage—Domicil—Foreign law.—The testator specifically devised a share of real estate, and also a share of personalty, to trustees upon trust for his son, Harry Grey, for life, and then for his children. Harry Grey, who afterwards became Earl of Stamford, acquired a domicil at the Cape of Good Hope, and died there, leaving one son, John, born before marriage, and other children born in wedlock. According to the law of the Cape, John was legitimated by the subsequent marriage of his father and mother.

Held (following the cases of In re Goodman's Trusts, 29 W. R. 586, 17 Ch. D. 266, and Andros v. Andros, 32 W. R. 30, 24 Ch. D. 637), that John Grey was entitled to share in the personalty, and that the rule laid down in Doe d. Birtwhistle v. Vardill, 2 Cl. & Fin. 57, 7 Cl. & Fin. 895, that an ante natus son could not inherit English land, related only to the descent of land on an intestacy, and did not affect the case of a devise to children, and that John was, consequently, entitled to share in the specific devise of real estate.—In re Grey, Grey v. Earl of Stamford, CH.D. STI., J. 60—[1892] 3 Ch. 88; 61 L. J. Ch. 622.

CONSTRUCTION—

10. Cease to carry on business—Sale of business to company—Managing directors.—A testator bequeathed his business, together with a leasehold messuage, to his sons. The will contained a proviso that, if the sons ceased to carry on the business, the leasehold messuage was to fall into residue. The sons sold the business to a limited company, of which they were appointed managing directors for life, and all the shares in which were held by them or their nominees.

Held, that the proviso was not repugnant to the gift, and that the testator's sons had ceased to carry on the business within the meaning of the proviso when they sold it to the company.—In re Sax, Barned v. Sax, CH.D. NOR., J. 584—62 L. J. Ch. 688; 68 L. T. 849.

11. Bequest of property "not included in marriage settlement."—Personal property was put in settlement on the marriage of A. with B. The trusts were (inter alia) for A. for life, then for B. for life, and ultimately, in the events which happened, as to one moiety for A. absolutely. By his will A. bequeathed all his property "not included in the above marriage settlement" upon trust for four of his children.

Held, that the moiety of the trust fund reserved to A. absolutely passed under the devise.—Walsh v. Green, M.R. (Ir.)—31 L. R. Ir. 338.

12. Contingent remainder or executory devise—Cesser of life estate on "being taken in execution by any process of law"—Appointment of receiver for judgment creditor.—A testator devised a freehold estate to his son for life, and after his death among all the children of the son born or to be born who should live to attain twenty-one, in equal shares as tenants in common in fee. By a subsequent clause he directed that if the son should attempt to dispose of his life interest, or should become bankrupt or insolvent, or the estate devised to him "should be taken in execution by any process of law for the benefit of any creditor or creditors," then the gift to him should become void and cease as if he were dead, and the estate devised to him should "thenceforth absolutely vest in and belong to the person or persons who under the devises and limitations hereinbefore contained would be next entitled thereto." A judgment for debt having been recovered against the son who was in possession, the judgment creditor obtained the appointment of a receiver of the rents. At this time the son had two children, one of age and one under age, and he afterwards had other children.

Held, by Kekewich, J., that the appointment of a receiver was a taking in execution within the meaning of the clause, and that the son's life estate determined. This decision was not appealed from.

Held, by the Court of Appeal (affirming the decision of Kekewich, J.), that as the limitations to the children of the son on the determination of the life estate by forfeiture did not take effect on the natural determination of the prior estate they were not contingent remainders, but executory devises, and took effect in favour of all such children of the son whenever born as attained twenty-one.—Blackman v. Fysh, C.A.—[1892] 3 Ch. 209; 67 L. T. 802.

13. Cumulative legacies—Presumption—Rebuttal. A testatrix by her will gave the dividends or interest on £1,000 to M. for life; and on M.'s death gave the £1,000 to B., daughter of M.; but should B. die in the lifetime of M. the testatrix bequeathed the £1,000 to M. absolutely. By her first codicil the testatrix recited and revoked the bequest of £1,000, "and in substitution therefor," bequeathed £500 to B. By a third codicil the testatrix purported again to revoke the bequest of £1,000, "and in substitution" bequeathed £500 to B. By her first codicil testatrix bequeathed £300 to M., and by her third codicil she bequeathed £300 to M.

Held, that the presumption that legacies given to the same person are cumulative was rebutted in the case of the legacies to B., but that the legacies given to M. were cumulative.—In re Armstrong, Mayne v. Woodward, V.C. (Ir.)—31 L. R. Ir. 154.

14. Devise of house and land "now in my own occupation"—Land subsequently acquired by testator and occupied by him with the house—Subsequent codicil confirming will—Wills Act (1 Vict. c. 26), s. 24—Mortgage of subsequently-acquired land by testator's heir—Sale by mortgagee—Right of bene- ficiaries under will to follow purchase-money.—A testator by his will, made in April, 1873, devised a freehold cottage with all the land thereto belonging, described as "now in my own occupation" to two trustees upon trust for his wife during her life, and after her death for his children, who were five in number, in equal shares. In September, 1873, the testator purchased two fields adjoining the cottage and occupied them with the cottage till his death. In 1877 he made a codicil by which he substituted his wife and his two sons as trustees and executors of his will, and confirmed his will in other respects. The testator died soon after the execution of the codicil, and the will and codicil were proved by his widow and one of his sons, who was heir-at-law. In 1885 a deed was executed by the widow and the heir-at law by which, in consideration of £75 expressed to have been advanced to the widow and the heir-at-law, the heir-at-law "as beneficial owner" conveyed the two fields purchased by the testator in 1873 to C. in fee by way of mortgage. C. had notice of the contents of the will and codicil, but was advised that the two fields did not pass by them, but descended to the heir-at-law. In 1890 C., under his power of sale as mortgagee, sold the two fields for £300 freed from the mortgage. An action having been brought by the testator's three daughters against the heir-at-law and C.

Held, affirming the decision of North, J., (1) that on the true construction of the will and codicil the two fields passed to the trustees with the cottage; (2) that the plaintiffs had a right to adopt the sale and to follow the purchase-money in the hands of C.; but that C. was entitled to retain his costs of the sale as mortgagee, and any part of the mortgage money which he could show to have been advanced for the purpose of the trust estate.—In re Champion, Dudley v. Champion, C.A. —[1893] 1 Ch. 101; 62 L. J. Ch. 372; 67 L. T. 694.

15. Devise in fee—Subsequent sale of devised property—Mortgage to testator — Wills Act (1 Vict. c. 26), ss. 23, 24—Conveyancing Act, 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 41), s. 30.—A testator, by a codicil to his will, devised as follows:—"I devise the cottage and garden walled round, bought by me from John Lewis Parry Evans, to the said J. H. absolutely." At the date of the codicil he was seised in fee of the property so devised. He subsequently sold the property, taking a mortgage of it from the purchaser to secure part of the purchase-money. He died during the continuance of the mortgage.

Held, that the benefit of the mortgage debt did not pass to J. H. under the devise.

Decision of Bristowe, V.C., reversed.

Decision in Moor v. Raisbeck, 12 Sim. 123, approved, though dicta therein not approved.—In re Clowes, C.A. 69—[1893] 1 Ch. 214; 68 L. T. 395.

16. Donee of a right of pre-emption of lands—Lands subject to incumbrances.—There is no fixed rule of law that a donee of a right of pre-emption of lands at a fixed price, conferred on him by will, necessarily takes the lands as a devisee subject to incumbrances.

Held, under the circumstances of the case, that the donee of an option of purchase of certain lands at a fixed price under a will, subject to incumbrances, was entitled to a conveyance of the lands discharged from these incumbrances.

Earl of Radnor v. Shafto, 11 Ves. 448, considered.

Dictum of Smith, M.R., in In re Davison and Torrens, 17 Ir. Ch. Rep. 7, disapproved.—Given v. Massey, M.R. (Ir.)—31 L. R. Ir. 126.

16a. Forfeiture clause—Life interest—Assigning or attempting to assign.—Under a will the tenant for life's interest was to be forfeited if he assigned, charged, or incumbered his interest, or attempted to do so. The tenant for life borrowed money, and gave the lender a document which was in form an equitable assignment of part of his interest. No notice of the document was given to the trustees, and it was subsequently cancelled. Evidence was given to show that, as between the parties, the document was not intended as a charge or assignment, and that it would have been a fraud on the bargain to have so used it.

Held, that evidence to show the real meaning of the document could be received, and that there had been no forfeiture of the life interest.—In re Sheward, Sheward v. Brown, CH.D. KEK., J. 685.

17. Forfeiture clause—Vested remainder—Attempt to assign—Inoperative settlement.—Life estates were given by a testator to his two sisters (both since deceased), and the survivor of them, and subject thereto to all testator's nephews and nieces equally who should attain twenty-one, with a proviso that, in case any of the nephews or nieces should, during the life estates, or either of them, assign or in any manner dispose of their expectant share in testator's estate, or attempt so to do, they should forfeit all benefit under testator's will. A niece of testator's, having attained twenty-one and married during one of the previous life estates, executed a post-nuptial settlement, in which she included her reversionary interests under testator's will. This settlement was inoperative.

Held, that the post-nuptial settlement was an attempt to assign within the meaning of the will; that the niece's share under the will was therefore forfeited; and that the clause relating to forfeiture would apply equally to a share vested, but subject to be divested, as to a contingent share.—In re Porter, Coulson v. Capper, CH.D. NOR., J. 38—[1892] 3 Ch. 481; 61 L. J. Ch. 688; 67 L. T. 823.

18. Lease—Rent—Covenants—Fine on renewal—Liability—Trustees—Cestui que trust—Income or capital.—Trustees of a will held a renewable lease upon trust for successive life tenants, with remainders over, and the residuary personal estate of the testator upon trust out of the income to pay all the costs, charges, and expenses of executing the trusts of the will with divers trusts of the residue.

Held, that the trustees, and not the life tenants, were the persons liable to observe the covenants and to pay the rent and outgoings, which, on the true construction of the will, should be paid by them out of the income, and that the fine and expenses of renewal of the lease should be borne by the beneficiaries rateably, according to their enjoyment of the lease.—In re Baring, Jeune v. Baring, CH.D. KEK., J. 87—[1893] 1 Ch. 61; 62 L. J. Ch. 50; 67 L. T. 702.

19. Name and arms clause—"Entitled to actual possession or receipt of rents and profits"—Time for forfeiture—Profitless estate—Receipt of part of rents only.—V. by will gave hereditaments known as the E. estate to trustees upon trust to manage and receive rents and to permit his wife to reside in the mansion-house, and, subject thereto, to stand possessed of the E. estate in trust for Charles T. for life, with remainder in trust for his sons successively in tail, and in default for the other sons of Mary I. successively in tail, and in default for M. R. V. for life, with remainder to her sons successively in tail. And he directed that every person who, under the foregoing trusts, should become entitled as tenant for life or in tail to the actual possession or to the receipt of the rents and profits of the E. estate, and who should not then use and bear the surname of Varley, should within one year after he should so become entitled take upon himself and use the surname of Varley together with his or her own family surname. And in default that the limitations in favour of such person should absolutely determine, and the said E. estate should go to the person next in remainder under the limitations aforesaid. Provided that the determination under the said proviso of the interest of any such person for life should not prejudice the contingent remainders to his issue, but that in every such case the E. estate should remain to the use of the trustees during the life of such person, upon trust to pay the rents to the person entitled to the next vested remainder. The testator died on the 5th of February, 1875. The E. estate was charged under the testator's marriage settlement with an annuity, the payment of which more than exhausted the rents, and the persons entitled under the will could not receive any actual profit. Charles T., the tenant for life under the testator's will, died without issue on the 4th of April, 1889, and without having taken the name of Varley. The sons of the testator's sister Mary then living were Thomas and Richard. Thomas did not take the name; Richard took it on the 30th of January, 1891. The testator's widow was still living.

Held, that, nothwithstanding the fact that the estate produced no profit beyond the charges, and the fact that the widow was entitled to occupy the mansion-house, Charles T. became entitled to the actual possession or receipt of the rents and profits of the E. estate within the terms of the will on the testator's death, and that he forfeited his life estate at the expiration of one year from that time; that the time for forfeiture only began to run against Thomas on the death of Charles; that Thomas, not having taken the name within a year from that date, had forfeited his estate tail, but Richard, having taken the name within a year from the forfeiture of Thomas was entitled to the property for an estate tail.—In re Varley, Thornton v. Varley, CH.D. NOR., J.—62 L. J. Ch. 652; 68 L. T. 665.

20. Name and arms clause—Condition—Voluntary assumption of surname—Licence from Crown to quarter testator's arms—Gift over—Rule against perpetuities—Impossible condition—"Heiress."—A testator bequeathed to the son of his daughter A. who should first attain twenty-one and should before attaining that age have taken and borne the surname of H. and the arms of the testator certain articles therein specified; and in case there should be no son of A. who should attain that age and fulfil the condition, then to the son of his daughter R. on the same terms; and the testator devised and bequeathed his residuary estate upon trust to convert and invest the same, and to pay the income to his widow for life, and after her death, in case the eldest son of his daughter A. should then have attained the age of twenty-one and should have taken and borne the surname of H. and the arms of the testator, to pay and transfer the residuary fund to such eldest son; but if such eldest son should have attained twenty-one, but should not have taken the said surname and arms, then to the younger sons of A. according to seniority of birth subject to the like conditions; and in case there should be no son of A. who fulfilled these conditions, then to such son of the testator's daughter R., or the eldest, if more than one, as should attain twenty-one and should before attaining that age have taken and borne the said surname and arms, with a gift over as to the residuary estate to all the daughters of A. who should attain twenty-one or marry. A. had five daughters, all of whom attained twenty-one. R. had one son, who attained twenty-one after the death of the testator's widow. In an action by the daughters of A. claiming the property under the gift over on the ground that R.'s son had not taken the name and arms before attaining twenty-one, the Vice-Chancellor held, upon the evidence, that the defendant had complied with the condition as to taking the name, but that, as the defendant had not obtained the Royal licence to quarter the testator's arms till after he had attained twenty-one, he had failed to comply with the latter part of the condition, and that the property vested in the plaintiffs.

Held, on appeal, that there was evidence on which the court might act that the defendant had assumed the name before attaining twenty-one, but that the arms had not been in fact taken or borne by the defendant before attaining that age, and that therefore he had not complied with the condition.

Held, also, that the application to other purposes by the testator of a fund originally intended by him to defray the expense of obtaining the Royal licence did not render the performance of the condition impossible so as to excuse the defendant from complying with it.—Bevan v. Mahon-Hagan, C.A. (Ir.) —31 L. R. Ir. 342.

21. Remoteness — Power of appointment — Rule against perpetuities—Effect of invalidity of power on subsequent limitations.—A testatrix by her will bequeathed a sum of money to trustees upon trust for her stepdaughter C. A. for life, with remainder to her husband for life, and after the death of the survivor for the children of the marriage as the parents or the survivor of them should appoint, and in default of appointment for all the children of the marriage who, being sons, should attain twenty-one, or, being daughters, should attain that age or marry under that age, share and share alike. At the death of the testatrix C. A. was unmarried, but she had since married F., and she and her husband were now living. The question was raised whether the trusts of the sum of money were to any, and what, extent void, having regard to the rule against perpetuities.

Held, that, even assuming that the power of appointment conferred upon a husband of C. A. who might survive her might be invalid, the trusts in favour of the children, in default of appointment, were not thereby invalidated, inasmuch as the intention of the testatrix was that the money should go to C. A.'s children unless their interests were effectually displaced by the exercise of the power of appointment.—In re Abbott, Peacock v. Frigout, CH.D. STI., J. 154—[1893] 1 Ch. 54; 62 L. J. Ch. 46; 67 L. T. 794.

22. Remoteness—Bequest to charity for ever—Gift over to individuals if general system of education established.—A te tator bequeathed certain moneys to trustees upon trust to invest the same, and to establish and continue for ever certain day-schools in Wales, and he declared that, if at any time thereafter the Government should establish a general system of education, the trusts should determine and the moneys should go to the residuary legatees under his will. Under the Elementary Education Acts, 1870-90, a general system of education was established.

Held, that, upon the true construction of the will, there was an immediate disposition in favour of charity in perpetuity, followed by a gift over, under which the residuary legatees took a future interest, to arise upon an event which need not necessarily occur within perpetuity limits; and that, therefore, the gift over was void.—In re Bowen, Phillips v. Davies, CH.D. STI., J. 535—[1893] 2 Ch. 491; 62 L. J. Ch. 681; 68 L. T. 789.

23. Residuary gift—Gift to charity—Charity not named.—By his will, dated 1849, a Dissenting minister gave his residuary estate to trustees upon trust for sale, and subject to life interests to certain persons; he proceeded: "I do give and bequeath the whole of my property to the following religious societies, viz." No religious societies were named in the will.

Held, that there was no general intention to devote the residue to charity, such as the court could execute or recognize, and that as between the next of kin and the Crown the former were entitled.—In re White, White v. White, CH.D. KEK., J.—67 L. T. 706.

24. Residuary gift—Lease—Assent by executors as to part of residue.—Testator bequeathed the residue of his estate, including the lease of a colliery, to trustees, who were also executors of his will, on trust for his son on his attaining twenty-one years of age. On the son's attaining that age the trustees let him into possesing, but made no formal assignment of the lease, and there were still debts due from the testator's estate.

Held, that the assent of the executors was sufficient to pass the property in the colliery, and that it was competent for them to assent to the bequest of part of the residue of the estate without assenting to the rest.—Austin v. Beddoe, CH.D. NOR., J. 619.

25. Survivors—Longest liver.—Pecuniary legacies were severally given to four persons during their natural lives, and in case of the demise of any of them without legitimate issue his or her proportion to be divided amongst the survivors. The last surviving legatee died without leaving issue.

Held, that his legacy fell into residue.
